HAS it ever occurred to you that a number of wives put far too great a strain on their husband's affection by claiming a number of small and unnecessary attentions and services from him? When he comes home at night, after a hard day's work, what he needs is a cheerful wife, an appetising meal waiting, slippers, and an easy-chair afterwards.

Perhaps this is what your husband does find, but it is not always the case. Many wives begin at once with a series of little claims and demands. They think of every small job that needs doing; there is a blind-cord that has to be repaired, or a stiff window to be shut; the gas-burner needs a new mantle; a picture has fallen and must be re-stringed. The man rouses himself from his first after-tea smoke with as good an appearance of cheerfulness as he can master, and proceeds to do the tasks one by one.

A very simple exercise that will chase colds away quicker than bottles of medicine!

Some of them the wife could easily have done herself; the rest might have waited till the inevitable plumber or carpenter came in to do other odd requirements. But the lady of the house has not thought of this, and she hovers about poor "hubby" while he is busy doing his best. She hinders him by making useless suggestions; she calls him to other jobs before he has finished the first, and, what with one thing and another, a good part of the evening has gone before he returns to his chair and picks up his evening paper.

But the trouble is not yet over. He cannot rest in his chair for five minutes without being called upon for some small service or other. He must cross the room to pick up her ball of wool, open or close the window, let the cat out, or go into the passage to hear if baby is crying.

Perhaps the poor man bears it all without a murmur, or with nothing more than a smothered sigh; perhaps he gets restive at last and "kicks" a little.

But whether he bears it like a saint, or whether he is pushed to open rebellion, the wife is making a mistake. The willing horse should never be urged too far. It is right that a husband should do what he can to ease the burden that lies on the wife; he should be ready to do rough or heavy jobs that are unfit for her; but as a general thing it should be understood that he has done his part when his day's work at business is over.

The home should be a haven of rest, not a place of constant worrying little services. The wise wife may delight to know that her husband is willing to do all these things for her, but she should not be too ready to ask his help. When real occasion comes the man will rise to it; but it should be the pride of the wife to give him an easy, comfortable time when he comes home.

Some men are driven to stay out in the evenings just because they do not find peace at home.

A little want of thought, a little too much exaction, on the part of the wife, has been the beginning of great misery, the "rift within the lute," the first step towards drifting apart. The harm is done not by want of heart, not by lack of affection, but by simple carelessness and, perhaps, a little selfishness.

FIT IN FIVE MINUTES.

If you suffer from constant colds in the winter, practise this simple breath-giving exercise—you'll find it will make you ever so much stronger in no time.

NONE of my readers want to catch colds this winter, I am sure, for though a cold seems at the time a thing that doesn't matter much, yet in the long run it often matters a great deal, for it leaves one very run-down and seedy.

The following breathing exercise is splendid for keeping off colds and strengthening the lungs. It teaches the lungs to work equally, too. Very often, you know, one lung expands quite nicely and the other is lazy and doesn't fill half as full of air as it should.

Stand just as the girl in the photograph is doing, right hand on the hip and left arm curved above the head, keep the mouth tightly closed, and take a long, deep breath, then change arms and breathe again.

Do this in front of a looking-glass, and if one lung expands more than the other, hold the arm that is over the weak lung above your head and breathe three times with it in that position before changing arms.

If both lungs seem to work equally, simply breathe holding first one arm above the head, then the other. If this exercise gives you palpitations, it is better not to do it. I am just mentioning this fact in case any of you have weak hearts which need special exercises of their own.

Smart Blouses

Perhaps you're feeling rather sorry that high-necked shirts are very fashionable once more. But I don't think that you will mind when you see the fascinating models described here by our Dress Expert, for they are all so pretty and original that no one could help :: falling in love with them at once. ::

Two very pretty shirts (Nos. 1616 and 1617), showing how effective the new high collars can look.

WHEN a friend of mine, who is always very well primed in coming fashion gossip, told me last year that high collars were coming in again, I was really quite upset, and hoped very much that for once she would prove to be wrong. Low collars are so comfortable and becoming, and I had grown to like them so much, that I did not at all relish the idea of returning to high ones once more.

But when I saw some of the newest blouses and discovered how cunningly the quaint little high collars were planned, I was soon reconciled to the change, and now I'm just as enthusiastic over them as I can be. You see, though they're high at the back, they're mostly quite low in the front, and, therefore, perfectly comfortable, and besides, they don't look so undressed under a coat as some of the low collars used to.

No. 1616 is an example of the prevailing fashion, and very pretty it is, too. It is a model that would make up very well in almost any sort of blouse material—Aza, delaine, washing silk, or a soft satin would all look very nice. Do notice the fascinating way the opening at the neck is filled in with a little ribbon velvet tie loosely knotted into a small bow. The sleeves, too, are most graceful, caught in as they are round the wrists with velvet to match the tie.

The next blouse, No. 1617, is another very smart model. You will see that the coat collar has been adapted here to suit the new fashion, and it really looks very nice with the open V in the front and the graceful turnover piece at the back. The sloping line of the yoke, too, is another really smart idea, giving very much the same effect as a raglan sleeve. Here, again, the choice of a suitable material would be quite a simple matter, as this type of shirt makes up well in almost anything.

No. 1618, at the bottom of the page, is a blouse more suitable for afternoon or evening wear, for, though it is quite simply made, if carried out in fine silk or crêpe-de-chine, it would look wonderfully smart.

If you're a person who likes to wear brown, you couldn't do better than make this model up in a soft shade of brown crêpe-de-chine, and have biscuit-coloured chiffon for the pretty roll-over collar, and frilly trimmings down the front and on the sleeves.

The last blouse, No. 1619, may be thought too severe by some people, but quite a number of folk find that very plain shirts of this type suit them splendidly, and with them I'm sure it will find favour at once. This model, especially, has a very military look—another fact which is sure to add to its popularity in these days of warlike fashions.

(These patterns are cut in three sizes—W. 22, 24, and 28—and can be obtained for 6½d. each, post free, from the Pattern Department, "Home Notes," 18 Henrietta Street, London, W.C.)

The GIRLS HE LEFT BEHIND HIM

By BERTA RUCK.

"Two's company, three's none," as we all know, and when the two are a handsome young soldier and an adorably pretty but feather-brained little coquette, the poor third feels very much out of it all. But when she is of the stuff Ethel Smith was made of, she keeps a stiff upper lip through the darkest days, and wins through in the end!

NEW READERS START HERE.

"Good afternoon. Is Madame Whatshername here?" inquired the fashionably dressed lady who had just alighted from the beautiful grey car. "No—well, then you can do my thingymyjig—I mean my wig, for me."

Poor Ethel Smith, the pretty assistant at the smart Beauty Culture Establishment in Bond Street, smothered a sigh. She had so been wanting to get off punctually at six o'clock to-day for Harry Freeman's birthday party! But the appearance of this client made this wish quite impossible. Assistants in beauty culture establishments had no right to wishes of that sort, however, so she hid her disappointment under a cheerful smile and led the customer into one of the little grey-curtained cubicles at the far end of the shop.

Everything has a bright side if you can only manage to find it, and Ethel found that even being kept late when you were aching to get away was not so bad when the customer was as amusing and talkative as this one was. She seemed to take rather a fancy to the pretty, refined-looking girl who attended her so deftly, and when she finally left she gave Ethel her card saying:

"Remember that if you find yourself at a loose end on account of the war, you can come to me!"

Ethel put it hastily into her purse, and in her anxiety to get to her very extra special birthday party, promptly forgot all about it, little thinking how useful that card was going to be to her in the future.

It didn't take her long to get ready for the party when she once got home, for the amusing customer had been so complimentary about her appearance in the black dress that she wore in the shop that she made up her mind not to change it. So in the end she didn't get to the Freemans' house very late—in fact she arrived before the hero of the evening, Harry Freeman, had returned from the City.

Taking her upstairs, Phyllis Freeman introduced her to a pretty girl whom Ethel recognised as a customer who had come into the beauty shop that very afternoon. It was with a very sinking heart that Ethel noticed the fragile prettiness of Miss Trixie Beresford, for Phyllis Freeman had accompanied the introduction with a murmured aside of "Harry's latest"—words that seemed to poor Ethel like the death-knell of all her hopes. For it must be admitted that pretty Ethel Smith had long ago quite hopelessly and irrevocably lost her heart to dashing young Harry Freeman, and although the young man was quite ready and pleased to have Ethel as a friend, he seemed well content to let matters remain at that.

When the girls came downstairs they found that the hero of the hour was still missing, and when time went on and he still didn't turn up, his parents decided that they would have to start supper without him. They had hardly sat down when the maid opened the door and announced that a young soldier had called. Before anyone had time to answer the door opened and in strode Harry Freeman!

Two Strings to His Bow.

IN another minute the new "Tommy" had dropped into the empty place between Trixie Beresford, in her ravishing pink frock, and Ethel Smith in her black, and was trying to answer forty questions at once, and to stay an enormous appetite with chicken and tongue at the same time.

Between the mouthfuls he proceeded to tel how long this idea of enlisting had been at the back of his mind; how he had, as a matter of fact, applied three days ago, and had finished up with the formalities late this very evening. "When I first put this uniform on!" he concluded merrily. Then, in answer to an anxious, reproachful look from his mother, he added, "It's all right, mater. I didn't tell you before because I didn't see the use of worrying you before it was all settled. And besides, I thought it would be fun to take everybody by surprise."

He said "everybody," but all his eyes, as Ethel Smith quickly and unhappily noticed, were for one person especially; they were for the dainty, ravishingly-dressed little blonde with the rose-coloured frock and the rose-tinted cheeks. It was to her he turned as he added, "I really thought the best thing, the only thing to be done was to enlist."

Ethel Smith's eyes were bright with pride for him; he had expressed what she felt any young man ought to be feeling in the present crisis.

But little Trixie Beresford pouted distractingly, and said, "Oh, of course it's all very well to be a soldier, but I don't see why you couldn't have been made an officer."

"Only because putting in for a commission would have meant waiting so much longer," explained young Trooper Freeman gently to her. "You see, I wanted to get into a cavalry regiment, because I've always been supposed to have a knack with horses; also I'm keen on getting out, without months and months of hanging up and delay, to France."

A CUP OF COCOA INSIDE NEXT WEEK'S NUMBER.

"How soon do you expect to go, then?" asked his mother. And Ethel was amazed at the calmness and the gentle, steady smile of the mother who had said, not so long ago, that she knew she couldn't bear that nerve-racking trial of being a woman with a son in the firing-line. Mrs. Freeman was yet another of those women who, when it comes to the point, are so much pluckier than they would admit themselves to be.

And Ethel, apparently engrossed in helping the trifle on to her cut-glass plate, listened with all her ears while Harry explained his plans, explained how he'd been taken, because of being an old Territorial with a knowledge of horses, into a regiment that expected its marching orders in a week or less; how it would be London barracks for a week or so, then Paris—and after that, who knew?—the trenches, he hoped, as soon as possible.

"We'll drink to that!" said Harry's father sturdily. "No, not claret-cup; there should be a dozen or so of champagne in the cellar left over from Phyllis's twenty-first birthday. Fetch it, Maud! That's right. Now fill the glasses. Now, Harry, my boy, here's many happy returns of to-day to you, and wishing you all that you wish yourself!"

"Thanks awfully, father!" said the recruit, boyishly. And he went round the table, clinking his glass against the glasses of the other young people.

He would have looked deep into Trixie Beresford's eyes as he touched his glass to hers, but the girl who was a born coquette fixed them sideways on the buttons on his tunic as she held out her glass.

In her spoilt vanity she hoped that this would hurt him deeper than any sword wound. She, to test her own power, would not look at him.

"Oh! Very well, then!" thought young Harry with a mental shrug of the broad shoulders under that same khaki tunic. For he was of the type of lover who does not invariably respond to indifference by added devotion. That was a mistake on Miss Trixie's part. Harry would have agreed with the Elizabethan poet:

"If she be not fair to me,
What care I how fair she be?"

Certainly Trixie Beresford was the prettiest girl he'd ever seen, but if she had the bad taste not to appreciate honest admiration, well, there were other pretty girls! There was one on the other side of him, Ethel Smith, looking lovelier of face and figure than he'd ever seen her before.

He'd never really noticed her good looks, until one day, early in the summer, when a curl of her brown hair, blowing against his face, had sent a sudden, unexpected thrill through him. And then she'd turned away before he could so much as look into her eyes.

He'd take a good look into them now, by Jove!

So he said, softly, "Here's luck, Ethel!" And it was into the clear, grey-blue depths of Ethel Smith's eyes that the young soldier gazed deeply and admiringly and questioningly while the glasses rang out to the tune of fairy wedding bells.

This, we may as well admit at once, was not the sort of behaviour one expects from a young hero.

Making eyes (it was nothing less) making eyes at one pretty girl because another pretty girl had denied him her glance! Appearing perfectly ready to make love to either of them—the coquette in pink or the beauty in black satin—whichever of them seemed most responsive! With a heart divided between those grey-blue eyes of Ethel's and those red, red lips of Trixie's! It was disgraceful. It was no excuse to say that young Harry Freeman was at an impetuous and susceptible age—twenty-four, and that he was uplifted by the excitement of the step he had just taken, the entering upon a new life! He had just become a soldier—yes, but was that any reason why he should behave in a way that the voice of scandal attributes to a sailor? (They may flirt with two or more girls at once, it seems.)

No; young Trooper Freeman did not deserve the

passionate adoration which was being lavished upon him at that moment by at least one of the girls beside him.

He was not good enough for a girl like Ethel Smith. Perhaps the brutal truth is that no young man alive is really "good enough" for the thoroughly nice girl who worships him!

But what difference does that make? The girl continues to worship him as he is—just as Ethel continued to worship Harry Freeman. "Oh, it's almost too good to be true, but I think he must care for me!" she was saying to her own tumultuous young heart as she sat there, outwardly composed enough, beside the guest in khaki. "I do believe he cares at last, else why should he have looked at me like that just now?" Then came the throbbing, thrilling wonder, "Will he tell me so before he has to say good-bye?"

The Flirt's Revenge.

MISS TRIXIE BERESFORD was the kind of girl to whom it's a necessity of life that the most important young man upon the horizon of the moment shall be, in the eyes of all beholders, her own undisputed property. Now, at that birthday-party of his, young Trooper Harry Freeman was undoubtedly the centre of attraction.

There clung about his well-set-up figure all the glamour of heroism—in khaki.

None of the other young men at this gathering were in uniform. And each of them looked perfectly conscious that at this period of English history, for a young man to be not a man and a soldier, means that he is an object of pity. Pity, because obviously he is for some reason unfit, or unable to serve his country.

One of these young men at the Freeman's was so short-sighted that he could not (without glasses) see across a room. No shooting for him.

Another had a game leg. This would let him down after a day's marching.

The third was heavily in debt. This would have to be repaid before he could, with strict honour, risk a life that was so mortgaged.

The fourth could not be spared to the front, so useful was his own work at home, for he built aeroplanes.

The fifth was a big, florid, stout young man of thirty, whose firm (Patterson's) manufactured Army boots, and was doing very well out of this war. He, as he told everybody, could not possibly leave his business to go and enlist.

It followed therefore that the boy who, to celebrate his twenty-fourth birthday, had donned the King's uniform, was the hero of the hour.

Of course, he ought to have been unmistakably at Miss Trixie's chariot-wheels. Yet—he wasn't. Because she had coquetted, because she wouldn't smile on him at once, he had actually sought—and found—consolation by turning to another girl. Trixie had seen that glance of his into the grey-blue eyes of Ethel Smith.

And she determined that there shouldn't be many more glances of the kind to follow. Her intuition told the little flirt that this other girl (under the gaiety with which women disguise the agony of parting with their soldiers) this Smith girl was achingly serious.

"But she needn't think that she's going to cut out little me," was Trixie's callous summing up of the situation, as the party rose from the table, "because I'm not going to have it. Let her wait and see!"

* * * * *

In the drawing-room after supper the young men were allowed to bring their cigarettes and pipes as they gathered round the piano where gentle, grey-haired Mrs. Freeman played accompaniments to all the songs that they knew; old friends, tried favourites like "Swannee River" and "There is a Tavern in a Town." After these choruses Ethel Smith was begged to sing a solo.

"That new thing," Phyllis stipulated, "the women's recruiting song." (It was new then.)

And Ethel, pink and white and golden brown in the rosy-shaded lights, stood there in her dead-black, becoming gown, and gave them "Your King and Country Need You." She had a rich and tuneful voice. She contrived to get a swing as of the tramp of a regiment into the last lines. Simple and obvious enough, a superior person would consider them. But, like most simple things, they met the case:

"'We shall want you and miss you,
But with all our might and main
We will cheer you—thank you—kiss you
When you come back again.'"

She sang for Harry alone.

And even if he did not quite grasp the full meaning of the little quiver in her voice at the last notes of the song, someone else in that room did.

"She thinks she's going to have him to kiss when he comes back, does she?" thought Trixie Beresford, sitting there looking prettier even than before on the white fur hearthrug where she'd settled herself down like a Persian kitten before the glow of the fire. "Well, we'll see about that."

"Now, Harry, your turn!" chorused the others.

"Yes, come on!"

"You tip us a stave, old son!"

"Mr. Freeman! Trooper Freeman!"

"Give us something appropriate to the occasion."

"Yes, 'Tipperary'!"

"Oh, goodness, Harry is going to sing!" mourned his sisters with mock tragedy, as the young soldier sprang laughing to his feet and strode across the room to the side of his mother on the piano-stool. "Cotton-wool sound-dampers for two, please!"

Harry, from whose handsome throat proceeded a voice resembling that of a corn-crake with a cold in the head, proceeded to warble the refrain only of the soldiers' marching-song:

"'It's a long way—join in, you fellows!—to Tipperary,
It's a long way to go—(Phyllis, if you make me laugh——!)
It's a long way—(eugh, eugh! Crumb gone the wrong way!)—to Tipperary,
To the sweetest girl I know—(that's you, mater),
Good-bye, Picca — (excuse me, wrong key) — Picca- — (try again)—Piccadilly!
Farewell, Leicester Square!
It's a long, long, long, long—(sorry, I thought there were some more longs)—way to Tipperary-rare-tweedledeedee!
My heart—(a violent thump on the right side of his tunic)—'s right there! Sclah!'"

Thunderous applause greeted this (from a musical standpoint) distressing performance.

The singer stood laughing, clearing his throat again. His sister Phyllis, having made a dash out into the front garden, came back with a branch of laurel, which she thrust into the top of his boot by way of acknowledgment. One of the other girls (a cousin) took a blue velvet ribbon out of her hair and tied it to his shoulder-strap.

"Thanks! Small contributions gratefully received. Any more comforts for the troops?" sang out Master Harry. "Who else has got something for me? Gold sleeve-links and diamond cigarette-holders two paces to the front!"

Ethel, plucking up heart of grace, turned to him at this.

"Harry! I—I did bring you a birthday present!"

"Oh, I say, sweet of you! What is it?"

She handed it to him on the pink palm of her hand—the gold safety-pin.

"Oh, swank!" exclaimed Harry gaily, fastening it in the collar of his tunic. "Shan't I be taken for an orf-icer!"

He had not begun to thank the flushed, grey-blue eyed girl who had handed it to him when there came a tiny pull at his khaki sleeve on the other side. He turned. Trixie Beresford, the picture of girlish prettiness, had risen from the hearthrug and was standing very near him, all soft appealing eyes and scarlet parted lips.

"I wondered if you'd take something from me?" she murmured, in a voice as soft as her look. "Of course it's nothing. But, just as a mascot—a keepsake! So that you don't—don't quite forget me, Harry, here's this."

"This," was her own handkerchief, a wisp of cambric trimmed with lace and scented with Phul-Nana perfume.

Harry's frank expression changed suddenly as he took it, glancing down into the alluring face of the girl who offered it.

"I didn't think you'd anything for me, Trixie," he said, as he tucked away the tiny scented handkerchief inside his tunic, inside his grey Army shirt, and where he considered, after all, that such a gift from such a girl belonged—next to his heart. "Look here, I haven't had a word with you this evening! Come and sit here!"

"Of course I care for you," Trixie told the handsome young soldier at last. "Would I allow you to do this if I didn't?"—(See page 250.)

Yes; we will not attempt to defend Harry, weathercock of fickleness as he was.

And the end of that party found the golden-haired coquette sitting almost in the pocket, as the saying is, of the young soldier who had started the evening by whistling her down the wind. It was she who was turning him round her highly-manicured little finger. And she kept him there with smiles, with glances that would have gone to a head more steadily poised than that impulsive and auburn-haired one of Harry Freeman.

A glance of a very different sort she shot, just once, in the direction of Ethel Smith, sitting there, with a sudden chill upon her, talking to the builder of aeroplanes.

That glance said, frankly and vulgarly, "There! Who's got him after all?"

Lights Out!

"I SHALL have to get back to barracks, I'm afraid," said Harry at last.

And his words were the signal for the party to break up.

The stout young man, who had been hovering in vain about the golden-haired beauty in pink, now thrust himself definitely forward and asked if he might 'phone for his car to take Miss Trixie home.

"Thank you so much," purred Miss Trixie with one of the glances which were for masculine consumption only, "but I think I'm going in a taxi part of the way with Mr. Harry Freeman!"

This was encouragement undreamt of by the auburn-haired young soldier. In the most desperate hurry he jerked himself into his khaki overcoat, picked up his Service cap and cane, and said good-night hastily all round. Ah, the cruel, brutal things men do—not knowing!

He never guessed that his casual farewell sounded "Lights out" to the hopes of a girl who was all his—the other pretty girl, Ethel Smith, who stood there with the rest watching him off with a gay smile on her fresh face and in her girlish heart the conviction that life was a desert, and that the last happy moment which she had ever known was the moment when Harry Freeman had looked deep into her eyes over the bubbling golden wine in which they had drunk his birthday toast.

Harry, in the taxi-cab, acted on an impulse that had been born during the last hour. He turned eagerly to his pretty companion in the rose-pink satin evening cape that harmonised with her gown. "Trixie," he muttered quickly, "I thought I shouldn't get another chance to speak to you, and I want to speak to you before I go away. You can guess what it's about, can't you? Little girl, I want you to promise me that you'll marry me if I come back alive."

Flippant Trixie was almost tempted to reply, "Well, I can't if you don't, can I?" However, this was the kind of remark which she often thought, but never made aloud, thereby proving her wisdom. She merely laughed softly, and said "Very well; if you like I will be engaged to you."

"Sweetheart! Can you really mean it?" cried young Harry, hardly able to believe his own good fortune. But it was all true; Trixie was thinking to herself, "Well, why not? It'll be rather amusing to be engaged to a man who's right bang at the Front, and getting letters from him, perhaps when everybody is so full of the war. And the Freemans are quite well off, and Harry's quite nice-looking, and so devoted to me. And it will be a very nasty one," was her final unworthy thought, "for that other girl that I've taken a dislike to—that girl in the black frock. Oh, I think he's quite worth while being engaged to!"

And in answer to Harry's ardent question, she told him at last, "Of course I care for you. Would I allow you to do this if I didn't?"

"This" was the kiss which she allowed Harry to take from her soft cheek. She was a little bit nervous that she had put just a suspicion too much of the Two-and-a-half Rose upon her lips.

"Darling," said Harry fervently, "there isn't a man going out with the Army who's got such a sweet and true and perfect little sweetheart as the girl I'm leaving behind me."

And at that moment, in her bare little bedroom, Ethel Smith, the other girl he was leaving behind with scarcely a thought, was crying herself to sleep.

Poor Ethel! Things look very desolate for her, don't they? Harry has no suspicion of what he really means to her—will he find out before he leaves her?

WHAT YOU CAN DO.

Knitting may sound tame compared with fighting, but you won't shirk the first because you would prefer the second, I know!

IT'S a well known fact that it is not in the doing of the right thing but in the going on doing it that true pluck lies, and I think many women are realising the fact very keenly just now. It was hard to say good-bye when "he" went off to serve his King and country, but it is harder to keep cheerful and brave in his absence; it was a wrench to knock off little luxuries when the pinch was first felt, but it requires a lot more determination consistently to manage without them; and in the same way it seemed but a light task to knit our first muffler or pair of socks or mittens, whereas now we don't realise, because we don't want to do so, that woollen comforts for our men are always wanted, always eagerly welcomed, and will be to the end of the war.

We mustn't lose our interest or serve less willingly now that the first excitement is past. We are shirking every bit as much as the fit man who stays at home. "Wool is expensive and hard to obtain," you say. Not if you will write to me, stating clearly what you want. You will find prices quoted on this page (low ones, too!) for all kinds of comforts; directions for working have been published in HOME NOTES—look them up in your back numbers, and then send for the wool. Your help is needed—won't you give all you can?

WHY I LET MEN KISS ME.

An article from a girl who doesn't believe in being too prudish. Next week I shall publish a chat giving the - - opposite point of view. - -

IT seems to me that a great deal of nonsense is talked about kissing, and lots of girls seem to think it the deadliest crime to be kissed by any man who isn't a relation or engaged to them. Very often they rule out even such innocent salutes as those given under the mistletoe. Personally, I never heard such rubbish!

It seems to me that there's no harm in either flirting or kissing, when both parties understand that they're only a pleasant game and not to be taken seriously, and they certainly do help a girl to know men well, and so make a wise choice when real love comes to her.

Mrs. Grundy.

The way the world's arranged, it's almost impossible for a girl to get to know a man well enough to decide whether she wants to marry him, unless she allows him to flirt with her. Of course, grannies and maiden aunts hold up horrified hands, talk about the modesty of girls when they were young, and so on, but I'd rather have the disapproval of a few old-fashioned people than make the ghastly mistake of marrying a man I didn't really care for—wouldn't you?

If a few kisses, lightly meant and lightly taken, can save me from tying him and myself when we were never intended for one another, then I think the price is small, and I am more than willing to pay it.

For, after all, kisses, like other things, only mean what you put into them. They may be the greatest thing on earth, or they may be insignificant enough to be forgotten as soon as given. Perhaps lots of people won't agree with me, but, personally, I can always get more intimacy out of a hand-clasp than a kiss. Kissing is so much a matter of habit; we kiss people regularly every day of our lives, and even doing so to a new person is not such a great thrill.

When Kisses were Common.

I wonder if you know that kissing was not always held to be the sign of intimacy that it is now. In the middle ages the kiss was the ordinary form of salute and the handshake the rarity. Everybody kissed everybody else, and thought nothing of it, and this is true of many foreign countries to this day. In France, even two men, if they are related, frequently kiss each other, while the sign of real affection and friendship between two people is for them to shake their left hands.

Do you think I have justified my point of view about kissing? Put in a nutshell, it is that the kiss itself is nothing; the feeling which prompts it may make of it, like the handshake, either a trifle or a sacrament.

The Dreadful Weakness Influenza Leaves

THE LITTLE DRESSMAKER

Our Little Dressmaker is the most popular of all the people who write for "Home Notes." She is a dear little woman, who took up dressmaking when her husband died so that she might earn a living for herself and her children. What she doesn't know about dressmaking isn't worth knowing, and she also has the happy knack of telling other people how to set to work. If you are in any difficulty, write to her, c/o "Home Notes," 18 Henrietta Street, Covent Garden, W.C.: she will be only too pleased to help you.

ISOBEL'S WAR—

I EXPECT you have noticed for yourself what a lot of feeling there is going about amongst people now against extravagance in any kind of way. Even those who are not suffering from the war feel that they really ought not to spend anything on luxuries. We in the dressmaking trade take great notice of this, and I have come to expect it almost as a matter of course for my ladies to say:

"Now, Little Dressmaker, whatever you make must be useful and good, but as little elaborate and fanciful as can be."

And I have found that specially with regard to underclothes. I do a good deal of underclothes making, it being work that I have always had a liking for, and, in time past, I was rather well known for some of my dainty and out-of-the-way styles in nightgowns and camisoles.

But there is no demand for them now at all, and what I am asked for is "something plain, please, and comfortable, and just as ordinary as you like."

Dainty but Practical.

It rather goes against the grain for me to make anything perfectly ordinary—somehow I don't seem to be able to take an interest in it—and when a lady came in the other day and wanted me to make her half a dozen "good, old-fashioned comfortable nightgowns," I was quite distressed, till I found that, by just a little thought and arrangement, those nightgowns could be made every bit as dainty as one of those frilly, short-sleeved, low-necked things.

There's so little trimming on this nightgown that you wonder what it is makes it so very, very dainty and becoming. I think, myself, it's the comfortable, clinging cut it's got—and maybe, too, the sets of narrow tucks on the shoulders. Anyway, it's a splendid pattern, and you'll use it again and again.

—TIME NIGHTGOWN.

If you look at the picture I am sure you will agree with me. That was the shape I used for my lady, and she was really delighted with it. Nothing could be more practical, now, could it? And yet with the collar cut down just a wee bit at the throat so as to get the fashionable line of the neck, and those little tucks, it is as sweet as anyone could wish.

Cutting it Out.

You will find it an excellent shape for making up in either flannel or cotton. I did my six in Horrockses' longcloth, with an edging of nice Torchon lace round the collar and cuffs, and all sorts of fancy bows. I can't resist bows, and I put a yard of ribbon into each, and they were all of different colours—lavender and pale yellow, as well as the ordinary pink and blue.

If you are thinking of doing this shape yourself, you will need 4¼ yards 36 inches wide for the medium size, and about 2 yards of lace for a trimming. The lace is put on nearly flat, but it has to be eased just a little at the corners of the collar to keep it from rucking up.

Fold the stuff and put the pattern on it in the way shown by Diagram I. Notice that the straight edges of the back, front, yoke and collar must go to a fold. If I were you I should cut the yoke double; it will make a cotton nightgown stronger in wear, and will give a little extra warmth on your shoulders to a flannel thing that is to be used in winter. It isn't as if the collar came down at the back, for it doesn't; it goes quite narrow behind and hardly gives any warmth here at all.

DIAGRAM I.

When you're cutting the nightgown, keep the straight edges of yoke, collar-band, centre front and centre back to the fold.

If you are going to have tucks, you must start by making these on both the fronts. There is enough material allowed for nine pin tucks on each side, and if I were you I should run them by hand. But perhaps everyone won't care to take the trouble of doing this; some may prefer to have two or three big tucks, or others prefer just to gather the fronts into the yoke. Gathers will do quite well, though, of course, some may not think them as dainty as tucks.

Hand Sewing is Best.

Run and fell the under-arm and sleeve seams. I should like you to do them by hand if you have the time; of course, it does save trouble if you put them through the machine, but you don't get nearly as dainty a look when the thing is finished. Put the fronts and back in between the doubled edges of the yoke and lining, in the way shown by Diagram II. Tack them into place first, and try on the gown, just to see if the yoke sits nicely. Then, if it does, you can stitch the join by hand or by machine.

* * * *

Allow Good Turnings.

Please remember to take a good hold on the back and front. I have known ladies who were so afraid to waste material that they only just caught in the merest edge, and then, of course, it pulled out again the first time the nightgown

The fronts and the back are put in between the yoke and yoke lining, just like you see here.

IN the cold weather, cream is one of the most valuable foods you can possibly have. Not only is it delicious and highly nourishing, but it keeps up the bodily warmth in the most wonderful way.

The trouble so far has been the price in Winter. "Milkmaid Cream"—real cream—thick, rich, and pure—no preservatives, no "additions"—is as cheap in Winter as in Summer!

Just you try "Milkmaid Cream" with any kind of fruit—bottled, stewed, tinned or dried; try it with porridge or other breakfast cereal; try it over pies, tarts, and puddings—it's a treat you can afford; even during War time!

went to the wash. Three-quarters of an inch isn't a bit too much to put inside the yoke.

Cut open the centre front fold for a depth of about 8 inches. Now cut two straight strips of stuff 8 inches long by 2 inches wide, and put them on as facings to both sides of the split in the way shown by Diagram III.

Putting on the Collar.

Stitch the facings by machine, and at the place where they end sew down a little patch of material which will keep the split from tearing down into the body of the garment. Some people work a buttonhole and loop instead of putting the patch, so that when there is any drag on the front the strain may come on the loop, and not on the material. You can do whichever you prefer.

DIAGRAM III.

Managing the opening down the front.

Sew on buttons, and work buttonholes to close the fronts. Hem the collar round its un-notched edges, and sew on lace frills to the hems. Then run and fell the notched edge of the collar to the neck with the notches matching.

You will want a button and buttonhole to fasten the ends of the collar together at the throat. The ribbon bow is not meant to be tied, it is only tacked on to make the gown look pretty.

Set the upper edge of the sleeve into the armhole, with the sleeve seam about 2½ inches in front of the under arm seam. Bind the raw edges with strips of material cut on the cross to make them neat.

DIAGRAM IV.

Sew the gathered end of the sleeve neatly on to the edge of the cuff.

* * * *

The Cuffs.

If you have had tucks on the front, you must run a few little tucks also on the cuff by way of a finish. There is space allowed for three pin tucks, but if you have only gathers you can leave the cuff quite plain, just finishing it off with a frill of lace.

Join up the ends of the cuff. Run and fell the notched edge of it to the wrist with the notches matching. (Diagram IV.). Then turn it back halfway up, so that it makes the double shape shown in the picture.

Be very careful about this cuff or you will find that you have got the tucks and frill on at the wrong side. Remember that when you are putting the cuff on to the sleeve, the tucks and frill must be inside, so that when you turn it back they may come to the outside and show nicely.

Make a double hem about 2 inches wide round the bottom of the gown, and then it is finished.

HOW TO LEARN SHORTHAND.

THERE is no doubt that during the present period of war there are a number of ladies and gentlemen who have a great deal of leisure. The Holborn Hall College have anticipated this by arranging a special course of study, whereby anyone may qualify for secretarial work in three months, and the course—if preferred—may be carried on in their own homes. The College can confidently guarantee this. Each student is taught individually, and study carried on under ideal conditions (the principal and his staff taking a personal interest in each).

Shorthand, which is usually considered such a difficult subject, need no longer strike terror to the feminine mind, as many excellent appointments are secured, one of the recent successes including that of Lady Assistant Secretary to the London Association for the Blind. This was obtained after only ten weeks' study.

BEAUTY DOCTOR TELLS SECRET.

A Beauty Doctor Gives Simple Recipe to Darken Grey Hair and Promote its Growth.

Miss Alice Whitney, a well-known beauty doctor, recently made the following statement: "Anyone can prepare a simple mixture at home, at very little cost, that will darken grey hair, promote its growth and make it soft and glossy. To half a pint of water add 1 oz. of bay rum, a small box of Orlex Compound and ¼ oz. of glycerine. These ingredients can be bought at any chemist's at very little cost. Apply to the hair twice a week until the desired shade is obtained. This will make a grey-haired person look 20 years younger. It is also fine to promote the growth of the hair, relieve itching and scalp troubles, and is excellent for dandruff and falling hair."

The Secret of Happiness:

IT IS HEALTH!

SO BEAR IN MIND THAT

STEEDMAN'S POWDERS

CORRECT THE SLIGHT STOMACH TROUBLES WHICH MAKE CHILDREN SO FRETFUL

FOR LOVERS ONLY.

Valentine's Day—the fourteenth of February—is the day for lovers, and this very interesting little article by MOLLIE KENNEDY tells you of some of those old superstitions which are still believed in by country folk in certain parts of the country.

IN our grandmother's days beautiful valentines passed between lovers and friends, for of all times in the year, St. Valentine's Day seemed to appeal to them as a suitable day on which to give presents. Dainty filigree satchets, delicately perfumed, and prettily decorated with artificial flowers, pierced hearts, or smiling Cupids, met the eye in every stationer's window, where now only ugly representations bearing vulgar doggerel are to be seen.

But although town-dwellers never celebrate St. Valentine's Day, in some parts of the country many of the quaint and pretty old customs are kept up by the country folk.

In Warwickshire the village maids keep up the old Valentine custom. They go out before dusk—or, as they say, "just afore milkin'-time"—and pick from the nearest holly-bush a small twig. In this they cut a slit, and then, having written the name of their lover on a piece of paper, they thrust this into the slit. The charm must now be worn next to their heart until the following morning, and it is believed that during the night, if this lover will be the future husband, the girl will dream of him.

Other Quaint Customs.

To render such a charm doubly sure, it is necessary for the girl to write the name in her own blood. Many a village girl will shyly try to hide the cut or scratch on her hand next day where she has cut herself for this purpose.

Your lover's name on a slip of paper inserted into a holly-twig brings happy dreams.

In Oxfordshire the same rite is pursued, but the twig is put under the pillow, and it is believed that the first person seen—or, as some say, spoken to—on the morning of St. Valentine will be the future spouse.

In other parts of the Midlands the girls each pick bay-leaves. These are pinned at the corners of the bed, and the fifth in the middle of the pillow. Sometimes village lads, as well as their sisters, will follow out this rite. As the clock strikes twelve, he who desires to know his fate must get out of bed and eat an egg, filled with salt, shell and all. A vision of the future will come in the dreams that follow such a repast!

Those who are brave enough to face the ordeal must go to the church porch an hour before dawn, shoeless and hatless, and having fasted a day beforehand. They must stand facing the east, and, as the first streak of dawn appears in the sky, must repeat the following lines:

"Good morning, Valentine,
Good morning, Valentine,
Morning dawn will show me mine.
Good morning, Valentine."

It is believed that after repeating this either the spirit of the future partner will appear, or, as the watcher goes home, he will meet her in the flesh.

* * * *

What a Magpie Signifies.

An old Welsh woman once told me she saw her husband appear thus, and a few weeks later, at a mountain fair, recognised him as the spirit she had seen. They were married and lived happily, and old Bessie had a firm belief in this superstition.

In some parts, magpies are believed to be birds sacred to this day. In Devonshire and Cornwall it is considered very unlucky to see a single magpie on St. Valentine's Day, but if two are seen joy and good luck of various kinds will follow. Should there be three, then the course of true love will be smooth, and a wedding will be in the near future, and if four magpies should cross one's path, then news of a birth may be expected.

It is considered very unlucky to see a magpie on St. Valentine's Day in some parts of the country.

In Oxfordshire the same superstition prevails, and the following doggerel rhyme is quoted:

"One's sorrow,
Two's mirth,
Three's a wedding,
Four's a birth."

It is generally believed, also, that should a magpie cross one's path on the morning of St. Valentine's Day that a death in the family will follow, and I well remember an old lady who resolutely refused to go any further, turning back at once, on seeing one cross the road, although the postponement of her visit meant financial loss to her.

NEXT WEEK!

A FREE CUP OF COCOA FOR YOU!

NEXT WEEK!

—Inside every copy of HOME NOTES, and a simple picture contest which means a prize of £50 for somebody—and over a thousand other prizes as well.

YOU have had many welcome presents given away inside HOME NOTES during the past —patterns galore, charming toys for the children, and dainty coloured plates. Next week I am presenting you with quite another type of gift which I am sure you will find very acceptable indeed. It is neither more nor less than a packet of cocoa which will make a large breakfastcupful of this delicious beverage. All you have to do is to follow the directions carefully—adding water, milk, and sugar in the usual way—and you will enjoy your cup of cocoa as much as the chubby little maid who will smile at you from the cover. Tell your friends about this offer so that they, too, may take advantage of my splendid gift.

First Prize £50.

The picture letter competition which I published in HOME NOTES a little while ago was the most popular contest we have had for a very long time. You will find a similar letter in HOME NOTES next week, and over one thousand prizes are waiting for the fortunate individuals who read it most correctly. Just look at the prize list

THIRD PRIZE	£10	0	0
Two Prizes of	£5	0	0
Two Prizes of	£3	0	0
Two Prizes of	£2	0	0
Fifty Gifts value	£1	1	0
Fifty Gifts value		10	6
One Hundred Gifts value		5	0
Eight Hundred Gifts value		2	6

One thing I want you to remember, and that is that this competition is complete in next week's HOME NOTES; you have only to read the one letter in order to compete for these splendid prizes. When you think how very welcome a money prize will be to you just now, I am sure you will make up your mind to set to work as soon as your newsagent delivers next week's copy to you. You had better order it from him straight away and tell your friends to do the same; if you don't, he may be sold out when you pay your weekly visit!

Free Patterns As Well.

But the free cup of cocoa is not the only gift you can get through HOME NOTES next week! Spring-cleaning time is coming, and I expect you are already thinking of overalls and dustcaps in which to arm yourself for the fray. The Little Dressmaker has anticipated your wants, and next week she will describe an attractive little get-up, which is just the thing you need. You will be able to get both patterns free in exchange for the coupon.

You will all be interested in the article, "Women in the Trenches," which you will find on the first page of this number. Next week the same contributor will tell you of women who bear the title of colonel in various regiments, although they never lead their men in a charge as their brother officers do. "Colonels Who Don't Fight," the writer dubs them, but it is by no means an accusation of cowardice as you will soon discover!

Of all the other features I can only say that they will be as bright and chatty as they always are. There is really not room to tell you about them here!

HOW TO OBTAIN YOUR ELEPHANT CHARM.

SO many of my readers have sent for my fascinating little mascots that I can hardly supply them fast enough! There are plenty left, however, and waiting to be sent off to you, for, of course, you want one. Shall I tell you how to obtain it?

1. You can send six penny stamps to ISOBEL, Elephant Dept., HOME NOTES, 18 Henrietta Street, Strand, London, W.C.

2. You can send three penny stamps and three of the accompanying coupons correctly filled in.

3. Or you can send six of these coupons correctly filled in.

Ask your friends to let you have the coupons out of their papers, and then show HOME NOTES to friends who do not generally read it.

OUR "UNSEEN FRIEND" PAGE. CONDUCTED BY ISOBEL.

"SEEING THE CROOKED."

There comes a time in the life of most people when they need a real, true friend, who, though unseen, will try to help and guide them through trials and difficulties, who will try to make crooked things straight, and confused things clear. And this is what I want to do for you if you will trust me with your doubts and difficulties, whether they touch your outer or your inner life. I can help you through this page, or privately, if you like to send me a stamped, addressed envelope.

AMONGST all the letters of congratulation I had on HOME NOTES' twenty-first birthday there was only one that sounded a discordant note. It had no address and was merely signed "A DISAPPOINTED WOMAN." She did not ask for any reply, but I am so sorry for her that I hope she will see this little chat about her letter, and that it may perhaps help her to feel less disappointed.

She began by saying that she had taken HOME NOTES since the first number, and still likes it better than any other paper, and her disappointment has nothing to do with our little paper. But she went on to say: "Twenty-one years is a long time to look back upon, and as I do it, I must confess that the contemplation of them does not give me much happiness or satisfaction. I wonder if you, Isobel, looking back over them, see also, as I do, all the ingratitude, the selfishness and the unkindness that is so rife in the world—and that has often made my life a burden. I hope you may have been spared this, but I could write out a long list of the people I have helped who have never thanked me, and of the people I have advised who have never followed my advice, but, who, nevertheless, when landed in troubles of their own making have looked to me to extricate them."

> Who seeks for heaven alone to save his soul,
> May keep the path, but will not reach the goal;
> While he who walks in love may wander far,
> Yet God will bring him where the blessed are.
> H. VAN DYKE.

She wrote a good deal more, which I need not quote, and I can't tell you how sorry I am for anyone who has so utterly missed the joy of life, and who is undoubtedly one of those who—to quote Ruskin—"have looked for the crooked and found the crooked."

* * * *

What About the Pleasant Memories?

I wonder, poor "DISAPPOINTED WOMAN," if you have no memories of the people who have been grateful for your help and advice (probably a far larger number than the ungrateful ones, if you could only remember them). For myself, looking down the years behind me, I could, if I chose to search my memory, no doubt find some few people who have expected much of me without any right to expect it, and who have never appreciated the help I gladly gave them at the time, and am glad I gave them now. But they are of no account compared with those who looked to me for help, and found it and valued it.

"I was poor and in direst need and you helped me over my hard times." "I was friendless and you befriended me." "No one loved me; my heart was hungering for affection and my soul cried out for love in vain, till you came and spilt love over me with no niggard hand." "I had fallen by the hard roadway of life, and you raised me to my feet and pitied and helped and gave me a fresh start."

Your Duty to Warn Your Friend.

Do no voices cry such words as these to you, "DISAPPOINTED WOMAN"? Could you not make a list of such as these, a list bright with love and gratitude instead of that black, dreary list of ingrates you remember so bitterly? I do not like to think that such an old friend—all my readers are my friends, but I have a specially warm corner in my heart for those who bought that now so odd-looking little paper dated January 16th, 1894—can find nothing but regrets and disappointment in twenty-one years. To please me, and because it will make you so much happier, won't you try to readjust your ideas and write and tell me you have done so?

"L. T. H." sees that a young girl she only knows very slightly is in danger of being led into undesirable ways through her friendship with a man many years older than herself, who is taking advantage of her youth and ignorance. The girl has no mother—only a father, who knows nothing of what is going on, and "L. T. H." asks me what she can do to warn and help her.

I think the only thing you can do is to speak to her and tell her exactly what you have told me in your letter. However slightly you know her, you can't risk letting her get into trouble without at least trying to warn her. She may not follow your advice, but I think you ought to give it.

You set me a hard task, "GRACE DARLING," when you ask me how you are to find out if "the one in France," of whom you are so fond, really returns your love, and I'm afraid I cannot tell you in what way you can ask him without appearing "forward." You tell me that you have twice given him up for no reason whatever, but each time he has seemed very willing to make it up, and you wonder if the fact of your feeling more drawn towards him since he went to the Front is a proof of "his love." I don't understand how your feelings can be any proof of his, but I certainly think that if you are as fond of him as you say, you had better give up the various other young men of whom you tell me, and keep to him. If your own instinct can't tell you whether he returns your love or not, I fear I can't help you to find out.

Always your friend, Isobel.

AUNT HILDA'S LETTER.

February 13th, 1915.

MY DEAR SUNBEAMS,—

You haven't had a Court Competition for such a long time that I expect you've almost forgotten what they are. Well, only members of the Court of Queen Sunbeam can enter for these competitions; so if you aren't one already, hurry up and join!

Queen Sunbeam, you know, often visits hospitals to see the poor little sick children, and the last time she went she took with her all the pretty Christmas cards you sent. I wish you could have seen how delighted the little boys and girls were with them! One little boy especially seemed to be enjoying himself more than the others, and when Queen Sunbeam asked him what made him look so happy, he told her that it was his birthday, and that, as he was nearly well again, the nurses had let him choose his four favourite things for tea.

Now, what do you think he was having? I want you to guess and write what you think on a postcard, then send it to AUNT HILDA, Court of Queen Sunbeam, 18 Henrietta Street, London, W.C., not later than Tuesday, February 23rd. The prizes will be:

Twenty promotions to the next rank for the twenty subjects who guess all the right things, or make the fewest mistakes

A promotion for every officer of the Court who guesses all the right things or makes only one mistake.

And a surprise prize for each prize-winner as well, whatever his or her rank.

Remember it was a birthday tea, Sunbeams, so perhaps it will help you to remember what you had on your last birthday.

And now make haste and turn to the last page of THE ROUNDABOUT and read about my lovely special contest. I know you're all longing to do something for our brave men, so I'm sure you'll like my splendid idea.

Your own Aunt Hilda.

PEN'S VALENTINE.

And how she found it.

By ETHEL TALBOT.

"I'M sorry," said Mother, smiling bravely over the tea-table, "but I'm afraid there'll be no valentine presents this year. With Dad at the front, you know——"

"We don't want presents," said Jack and Pris, smiling back almost as bravely as Mother herself; "we'll forget that it's going to be St. Valentine's Day to-morrow. It'll be quite easy."

"Kite easy," echoed Pen, who couldn't speak very plainly, but who always tried with all her might to be exactly like the big ones.

But some things are easier said than done; this was one of them, and, though the children were as brave as possible, it wasn't easy to give up all thought of the valentine presents they'd had every year of their lives without talking about them a little sadly.

"Only, we mustn't let Mother know that we mind," said Pris sternly. "You see, as Valentine's Day is Dad's birthday as well, she——"

"Of course," said Jack, and "Torse," echoed Pen.

"And we might do something, you know," continued Pris—"something for Mother, I mean. What about making valentines, now? You and I, Jack, could draw them, and then we'd put them in the post, and they'd come at breakfast-time."

"Me, too!" said Pen; "I want to send Mother a valentine!"

"Oh, Pen, you're too small. You are, really." Pris was getting quite eager over her new idea, and didn't notice the sorrowful droop of her little sister's mouth. "You see, we've only just time to make them and put them in the post-box before bedtime. Do be brave, and don't make a fuss, and go to bed like a good girl, and in the morning the postman'll bring them, and you'll see them, you know."

"Yes be brave," said Jack; "you're too small, really, you know, to make a proper valentine."

Pen wanted to cry, but she knew that everyone has to be brave in war time—little girls as well as soldiers—for Daddy had told her so before he went away. So she trotted off to bed without another word, and tried her hardest to go to sleep.

But it wasn't easy, for she was thinking of to-morrow; she heard Pris and Jack run out to the post box at the end of the garden before they came up to bed, and she lay wondering and wondering what the valentines were like that they had made, and wishing with all her might that she could give Mother a surprise present too.

"I'll get up nice and early," said Pen to herself sleepily, "and I'll go down to my little garden and see if I can't find a flower for her."

That was the last thing she thought of at all until next morning, when a bird woke her by chirping on the window-sill outside.

The bird reminded her of valentines, somehow, and when she thought of them she remembered that the big ones had sent theirs by the postman and that she must get up quickly and go downstairs if she was to find something for mother as well.

It wasn't very light, but she managed her tapes and buttons somehow, and it wasn't long before she had crept downstairs; she could hear Mary working away in the kitchen and the front door was unlocked, so out she scampered and down the path that led to the children's gardens.

"There wasn't any flowers yesterday," said Pen to herself as she ran, "but p'rhaps as it's Valentine's Day there might be just one tiny one that's grown up for Mother."

But there wasn't; there wasn't even the weeest daisy; you see, Valentine's Day comes so early in the year, and somehow Pen hadn't thought much about that. She was feeling very miserable indeed, and very cold, too, by the time

JOLLY JUMBO AND HIS FRIENDS.

Ho! Sunbeams,—Do you like Hockey and Rain mixed, so you don't know if you're playing at divers or learning to swim? 'Cos that's how it seemed to us when we had our annual hockey match yesterday, and if it hadn't been for that clever, gemplemanly, sweetly-hijeous creechur of a Bruin—

I know we should all have been drownded. For the rain sploshed down like watercarts, and in a minutes the field was under water, and we looked more like submariners chasing a bomb than hockeyists after a ball. And just as we were starting to scream with miserbleness—

Bruin shouted, "Hey! before we get drowned, I've got an idea to save us! We'll use the hockeysticks as stilts, and wade home with dry foots, see? There are six sticks, so three can walk and three ride," and, "Ho, Mr. Lifeboatsaver!" we shouted, "what a splendoshous idea!"

So we pulled up the umbrellas we'd used for goalposts, and made stilts of the hockey sticks, and climbed on each others' backs, and off we went home, and Bruin only dropped me in the water six times, so I was nearly dry when I got into my bedroom!! But, ho! haven't we all got colds!

she had looked everywhere and had found nothing at all.

"If it wasn't war-time, I think I'd have to cry," she said to herself sadly when she'd looked everywhere "I almost think I'm going to, now."

A big tear was just squeezing itself out of one eye, and simply wouldn't go back when all of a sudden a sound from the gate made her stop and listen. Someone was coming up the garden path.

"It's the postman," sobbed Pen; "he's bringing the Valentines, and I haven't got anything to give to Mother."

She bent over the garden-bed, just in case the postman should see that she was crying, and she blinked back her tears as hard as she could.

"Pen," said a voice.

Pen started and turned. She knew that voice; it sounded like, yes, and it was—it was Daddy!

Up the path to the little gardens came Dad himself—Dad looking somehow pale and thin, and with his arm in a sling, but it was Dad, all the same, no one could mistake him, certainly not Pen.

"Oh, darling Daddy," she cried; "have you come home?"

"Why, of course I have," said Dad; "didn't Mother get word? Why, then, the letter must have been delayed; she'll get it this morning. Pen, let's give her a surprise."

"And a Valentine, too," laughed Pen; "Daddy, darling; will you be my Valentine, and let me give you to Mother?"

So that was how Mother got her best surprise-present of all, and that was how Valentine's Day turned out to be the happiest day the children had had since the War began.

SOME FAMOUS HUNTERS.

BERTIE BALEERO is bouncing and brave—
He will track the fierce mouse to its lair—
But he'll never go out when there's darkness about,
Because of the baffling bear.

Matthew Mackenzie is manly and proud—
No tiger can make him afraid—
But he's only to spy a small bluebottle fly,
And he turns a peculiar shade.

Cæsar Sardonna is seasoned to snakes,
And sharks never shock him a bit—
But the sight of a snail always makes him turn pale,
And a minnow will give him a fit.

There are many queer fads of these hunters of fame
Though Kenneth is cunning and bold,
And has caught kangeroos and the camel and moose,
He is frightened of catching a cold!"

MITTENS FOR SOLDIERS.

Prizes for the best pairs.

I KNOW you're all simply longing to do something for our brave soldiers, so I've been wondering how you could help them, and, after thinking very hard, I've got a splendid idea. The men's hands get very cold when they are fighting, you know, and you wouldn't believe what a difference a pair of nice, warm mittens makes! So I want all of you who can to make a pair and send them to me, and Messrs. Hawes Bros., of the South London Wool Warehouse, are offering a prize of a lovely work-box for the best pair sent in, and there will be twenty extra gifts for the twenty next best pairs. The closing date is March 15th.

All the mittens will be sent to Lady French for the troops after they have been judged. Now I will tell you how to make them.

Cast on 48 stitches, 16 on each of three needles, join in a round and knit 2 plain, 2 purl, for three inches. Then divide the stitches on to two needles only, making 24 on each needle, and knit right along on both the needles one plain row and then one purl row alternately for two inches.

You will not knit in a round as you did first, you see, but when you get to the end of a row, you will turn round and knit back again, as you would if you were working with only two needles. This makes the hole for the thumb. When you have done two inches of this, replace the stitches on the three needles, 16 on each needle, and knit 2 plain, 2 purl for 20 rounds. Then cast off loosely and the mitten is finished.

How are you to get the wool? Well, send me 9d., and I will post you plenty of beautiful khaki wool and needles, too, or if mother has a set of four steel needles, size 12 or 13, send 7d. for the wool only.

"I want to sing it, too!"

FORM OF ADMISSION.

FRIENDSHIPS THAT HURT.

There's nothing more beautiful or helpful in the world than a real friendship, but when the feeling is all on one side it's a very different matter. If you ever discover yourself drifting into an affair of the kind, you would do well to remember the sensible advice given in this sympathetic article.

It seemed quite natural to Molly that a younger girl should bring her little tributes of homage—

I'M not particularly keen on Violet Graham myself. I see what it is in her that makes people call her so fascinating, but she has no fascination for me. Her personality—which is certainly rather an unusual one—interests me, but that is all.

I like Molly Peters the better of the two friends. She's a year or so younger than Violet, and, in many ways, her character is less strong. She's not at all a remarkable girl, but she's nice and simple and affectionate. Indeed, you might say that her affectionateness was rather too much of a good thing as far as it concerned Violet.

Violet and I, with two or three others who don't count—had been working in the same office for more than a year when Molly arrived. She was shy at first, and Violet was kind to her, as any decent girl is to a shy stranger. And little Molly promptly repaid Violet's kindness by falling head over ears in love with her.

I've always had a trick of watching people in a quiet way of my own, and I watched Molly and Violet pretty closely because they interested me. At first the older girl hadn't a notion of what was happening. She's blessed with a pretty good opinion of herself, and it seemed to her only right and natural that a newcomer, whom she had honoured by her gracious attentions, should show gratitude by waiting on her hand and foot, bringing her little presents of flowers, and so on. She was quite nice to Molly in a rather condescending way, and, as part of that niceness, she asked the girl to tea with her one Saturday. Molly flushed and sparkled with pleasure at the invitation.

"Oh, I should simply love it!" she cried.

Little Attentions that Mean Nothing.

It's delightful to any girl with a good heart—and I'm sure that Violet is very good-hearted—to be able to give so much enjoyment so easily. Therefore it wasn't very long before she asked Molly again, and soon they had arrived at the Christian name stage of intimacy.

Violet has rather caressing manners, which are natural to her. She uses them quite without thinking. For instance, I'm sure it meant nothing to her to rest her hand lightly on Molly's shoulder as she passed the younger girl's desk, to call her "child" and "chick," to slip her arm through Molly's when they walked together, and so on. But it meant a great deal to Molly. A touch of the hand or a little caress from Violet set her all in a glow and a tremble; she counted her days from "the time I went out last with Vi," and was continually on the strain in order to make herself more than ever pleasant and attractive to her idol.

That sort of thing went on for a few months, and then there came the inevitable row. Molly grew jealous—as she was bound to grow, sooner or later.

It happened that my work and Violet's fell together at that time, and Violet did me the honour of taking rather a fancy to me. I didn't return it, for, as I said before, she doesn't happen to appeal to my special taste. But that didn't matter to Molly. She was jealous, and she suffered as only a jealous girl in love can do.

She grew heavy-eyed and pale. She lost a great many of her light-hearted, cheery ways, and was, in consequence, very much less attractive than when she first came to the office. After a while, she grew "scratty," and began to say sharp things to Violet.

The Inevitable Result.

Violet was tired of me by that time, and had slipped along into a light-hearted friendship with someone else. She didn't go back to Molly. Why should she? She had never had more than a passing liking for the girl at her best, so it wasn't to be expected that she should stick to her when she had lost her brightness and had fallen into a chronic state of bad temper.

I hoped that they would drift right apart, and make an end of the business. But, as they worked in the same room, Molly didn't have any chance of forgetting her trouble. She brooded over it, and went down and down in health and capacity, doing her work worse and worse each day, till, after repeated warnings, she at last got notice to leave.

It happened that we were the last two in the room that evening; and, while she was putting away her books for the night, Molly suddenly broke down, laid her head on the desk, and simply howled. It must have taken a great deal of really bad, interior suffering to produce such bitter, broken-hearted crying as that.

—But that they did not mean nearly as much to her as her adorer hoped caused a deal of heartache when the fact became apparent.

She let me comfort and pet her, "because Violet threw you over too, so you know what it's like," as she sobbed.

I didn't tell her that Violet had never had the chance to throw me over. I only petted and soothed her, took her home with me to supper, and, afterwards, persuaded her to come across the road with me and see my doctor, who is splendid at giving people tonics which pull them together when they are a bit run down.

His bottles, backed up by a fortnight's holiday, did her a world of good, and afterwards she took another post, where she still is. I see her now and then, and sometimes she comes to spend Sunday evening with me. Last time she came she spoke about that unhappy business with Violet.

"It was no one's fault," she said, "but it gave me my first taste of real unhappiness, and—and doesn't it seem to you rather a pity and a waste of energy when you look back on it now? It does to me."

I'm not sure of that, for I think that Molly is all the better girl for it—quieter and steadier and more tender than she was before. But if such an experience had happened to the wrong person, it might have been a very harmful one.

Please, you older girls who have to do with young ones, be careful how you handle them. You may hurt them so terribly, without meaning it in the very least.

Be kind—yes, by all means. Be friendly and helping and pleasant and obliging. But don't, on any account let the thing slip into one of those passionate adorations, unless, of course, you are prepared to return it from your side, and be the other girl's one-and-only, just as you are hers.

Real, true friendships seldom begin in this way. They found themselves on something more solid than thrills and feelings. A real friendship must always be mutual and fairly well balanced. If all the ardour is on one side, and the other party simply allows herself to be worshipped—well, then, there's something wrong about it somewhere.

As soon as you realise that this is happening to you, please pull up sharply or you may go on into all sorts of troubles. The pull may hurt a little, but, when the first jerk is over, you won't mind it at all, and neither will the other girl. The time will come, sooner or later, when she will thank you from her heart for sparing her the long agony which poor Molly endured.

ARE YOU IN "DIGS"?

If you are, I hope you're not content with an uncomfortable, cheerless room, for there's no reason at all why you shouldn't be quite cosy, as this practical lodger points out.

I'VE lived in lodgings for several years now — quite ordinary lodgings, and several different sets of them—because my work has obliged me to move about a good deal. But I've never yet been uncomfortable, and folks often say:

"How pretty and homely your room looks! It's a pleasure to come here!"

I'll tell you how I manage.

In the first place, I have a gas ring, which simply holds me together. It's only a tiny three-jet affair, which cost seven-and-six, including the rubber tube, but it's worth a fortune to me. I can fix it on to any ordinary gas jet or gas fire.

A fire is best, of course, because then the ring can stand on the flat hearthstone by the stove and be perfectly safe and comfortable.

What Could Be Handier?

But a gas jet works quite well, too, for the tube is long enough to allow the ring to stand on an ordinary chair or chest of drawers. Underneath I have an old japanned tin tray—one of the sixpenny sort—and the ring always goes on that, so that if anything which is cooking on it happens to spill or boil over, there may be no harm done to the furniture.

I boil my own hot water for washing on the gas ring, I fill my own hot bottle, I make myself a cup of cocoa if I come in late and tired at night; or, if I want to have a little private tea-party, or a couple of friends, all that I need do is just to buy some cakes and make tea myself for them when they come.

Two Excellent Ideas.

Wherever I have moved I have always taken with me a small hanging cupboard, with a good strong lock, which, when it is nailed up on the wall, contains my teapot, cups and saucers, and anything in the way of cake or biscuits that I may chance to buy.

I simply hate the habit some girls have of keeping food or sweets in the drawers with their clothes. I think it's such a messy plan. All my eatables go into my "larder," and stay there until I want them.

Another thing that goes with me everywhere is my dressing-room screen. It's quite an ordinary screen, covered in dark green canvas. One side of it is as blank and innocent as screens usually are. This is the side which the public see. The other is very carefully covered with all sorts of toilet articles, sewn, clipped or nailed on.

Removing Unsightly Objects.

There's a large flat shaving-mirror, supported on two strong strings stretched across from one side to the other of the frame. I can turn the screen into any position I like, so that I always have a good light on my glass. That's such an advantage, I think. Then there's a sponge-basket which holds all my washing things, and another basket of the same kind which takes my brush, comb and hand-glass. A third basket, rather smaller, holds anything in the way of bottles that I may chance to have—hair-wash, medicine, skin lotion, and things of the sort. I have a row of hooks, too, from which I can hang my powder-puff, ties, and anything else that needs to be near at hand.

When you have a screen of this sort, you don't need to use a dressing-table at all. I always get the landlady to move the toilet table out of my room at once. When that is gone, I have quite a nice amount of extra space. Then I move the wash-stand into a corner and put the screen round it, leaving the rest of the room exactly like a sitting-room.

What about the bed? you say. Well, I have a coloured bed-cover of heavy damask—it was once a library curtain—and a pillow-case of the same.

After the bed has been made in the morning, I arrange the cover over it and slip the case on the pillow, transforming it into a cushion. When that is done, the bed—even if it happens to be an aggressive brass-and-iron affair — looks quite ornamental and makes a very comfortable seat.

"VALENTINE."

Last Valentine's Day I wooed Pierrette;
The scene was a costume ball—
She flaunted a frock of hyacinth blue,
A frilly collar and all.
In a cosy corner dimly lit
We whispered our dreams of bliss,
And Pierrette nestled within my arms,
And gave me her lips to kiss.

This Valentine's Day I'm khaki-clad,
And up to my ears in mire;
I'm doing my level best to dodge
The enemy's shrapnel fire.
And all I can kiss, her photograph—
Pierrette of the laughing eyes
That were dim with the mist of unshed tears
When she whispered her fond goodbyes!

DOROTHY ROSE.

THANKS TO THE QUEEN!

A FACTORY-GIRL GARDENER.

Photos, Barratt.

The open-air work and active life suits the ex-factory girls down to the ground.

Planting young fruit-trees proves most interesting and novel to the city-bred girls.

From factory-girl to gardener is rather a step, isn't it? This article, by a girl who was thrown out of work by the war, tells you how the "Queen's Work for Women Fund" helped her to make the change, and what it has been doing for her since.

FACTORY-GIRLS we were, but we're buck-navvies now! The Queen's Fund done it, and what they call the Central Committee on Women's Employment.

"What say we go to the country, Flo?" my pal says to me after we'd been three months looking for work. Every morning we'd been out after it, till we were fair sick of it. And, you know! yer food fair sticks in yer throat when you haven't earned it. So when Kate heard this tale of teaching factory-girls to be gardeners, I said quick, "I'm on!"

We told the lady at the Labour Exchange that we wanted to go, and she wrote to the Central Committee at 8 Grosvenor Place, an' some lady come and asked us a lot of questions—were we unemployed through the war, an' were we over eighteen, an' were we willing to go and live at Radlett—a place about an hour down the line from St. Pancras.

We said "Yes" to them all, an' then she told us we could have training in gardening, fruit-growing, and market-gardening for a year, an' the Queen's Fund would pay us twelve shillings a week all the time. We'd have to keep ourselves, but we could take lodgings in the village or live in a house the Committee's got, and, anyway, she'd see we got a good dinner every day for threepence.

* * * *

We Wouldn't Come Back for Anything.

We'd be under an expert lady gardener, she said, and the land was all ready for thirty of us to start straight away, for a Mr. Phillimore had lent it. The fruit trees and the bulbs were there wait-

"I'm not going back—not me!" is the general sentiment of the gardening colony; and certainly this member looks as if she meant it!

ing for us to put in, an' the spades, an' the tools an' all. We were to grow vegetables for ourselves and sell the other stuff at a market near by.

It sounded all right! An' me an' Kate went off with the first lot of girls. Factory-girls most of us were, and one typist, and a lady's maid.

"I'll give you a week," my mother said, "and you'll come home crying," but I've proved different. Three months we've been here at Radlett, and when we went home for Christmas they thought we'd come back for good.

They soon saw different. Why I was wishin' to get back after the first two days, and so was Kate! The houses seemed to be tumbling on top of you. An' I wouldn't have missed the New Year party Miss Taylor give (she's the superintendent) for much. It was all right! It was fancy dress, an' I won the prize in kilts. The whole thing only cost a shilling.

Our Lodgings.

Miss Taylor is a good sort. If it hadn't been for her I don't think many of the girls would have stuck it at first. An' it took a bit of stickin'. I never thought as I should like the work.

We got used to it all of a sudden. Boots come from a friend in London, an' they seemed to put heart into us. We got sweaters, too, an' warm stockings. I don't mind the cold now, nor the wet, nor nothing but the wind, it fair cuts through your back. But there'll be plenty 'll want our job in the Spring. We're buyin' that time now, I reckon.

Kate an' me lives in lodgings in the village. Half the girls lives at the Committee's house, an' half in the village. Very comfortable we are, only they're old folk, an' we can't budge for upsetting 'em.

"We're getting old an' we like to get to bed,' they say. They don't seem to see we're young. An' now we have to be in at nine o'clock. I'd be as happy as a sand boy if it wasn't for that.

We do have a bit of sport all the same. There's a piano at Common Lane House, an' one of the girls plays, an' we dance after dinner, an' after tea, an' at night when the fancy takes us.

Then on Saturdays we have sing-songs—all the latest! That's when we don't go to London.

All the lessons are given to thoroughly appreciative pupils—even ploughing is tackled in an energetic spirit.

One girl's young man pays her fare up every Saturday.

Kate an' me's been planting plum trees. I thought as I should never like it at first, but now I can do the measuring an' sighting it's very interesting. We have to get them straight on four angles, then you see them straight whichever way you look down the field. We made a hedge, too, with a path between. We've got four fields to plant, an' we work in three lots. We've got a bed of bulbs—narcissus and hyacinths—and another of cabbages, an' we planted plum trees an' apple trees, an' we've got currant bushes and gooseberry bushes in between. Oh, we've learnt a lot.

We're Getting Quite Experts Now.

We can do the planting all by ourselves now, with just the forewoman about, an' we've done the clearing the ground an' putting manure in, and the bulbs under the trees, and washing the tools on Saturdays. We look after hens, too, and get lots of eggs every day.

Some of the girls want to be poultry farmers, an' two is goin' out to Australia to have a plot of land of their own. Me an' Kate's not going away, but we wouldn't mind being gardeners here.

We were frightened of the country at first, and we wouldn't move out without a lantern at night, but we never think of it now.

Kate an' me had two country chaps, but we couldn't put up with them; they were too slow. They wanted us to do all the talking. I like a fellow who's a bit chatty on the road. The people here say we're too hot. They do laugh at the things we say. An' we laugh at them, too.

Our landlord says, "Come into bed all on yous!" An' when I asked the postman if there was a letter for Kate he says "Ne'er a one." I just turned round to Kate and said, "Ne'er a one, Kate!" and we both exploded.

Love From Miss Macarthur.

On Sundays we go for joy rides in Mr. Phillimore's motor. He's a gentleman! He teaches us how to make toys in the evening. That's what we do on wet days, but we get sick of it then. We'd all much sooner be out than in.

Miss Macarthur came to see us one Saturday. We saw her in a motor in the village. She was all in a hurry; she'd just got a few hours off. She doesn't have much time, does she? But she saw us, an' the house, and now she sends us her love!

They took our photos, but I don't care about being exhibited in these clothes. They're all right for here, but when they show up in the papers in London, they look funny, I think. We've fine colours, though, an' we think we're a bit improved by the country!

Anyway, I'm not going back. Not me!

THE BOY.

A true-to-life story told by DORAN G. KERRIE.

WHEN a whole week had passed and still The Boy's place remained empty, Elspeth guessed what had happened. He had enlisted.

He was just the kind who would go first of all. Elspeth wondered if he had a mother or sisters to worry about him, and somehow decided against it, because of that lonely look his face wore.

She had named him The Boy, not that he was so very young in years, but because his eyes were so youthfully frank and clear, and shy, too, and just a little wistful. Elspeth was lonely, too, and understood the wistfulness, liked the clean mind she divined behind the eyes and the swift smile with which he would do her some little service, at once chivalrously distant and boyishly eager.

So she missed The Boy. For over a year both had lunched at the same little restaurant, and she had looked up often from her book to find his frank eyes discreetly studying her, or he, laying down his paper, had been aware of the gaze of two brown ones flitting quickly away.

And at last they had grown to be friends, though all the words they had exchanged (Elspeth counted them one day), amounted to "Thank you!" (for the salt), "Do you mind passing the sugar?" "Allow me!" (when he opened her stiff umbrella), and "Isn't it horribly wet?" and "Horribly!" There wasn't apparently any reason why these two people of all those who visited the dingy little lunchroom should feel the pull of sympathy between them. Yet there it was—Elspeth had to confess it, and The Boy knew it too.

He had the most audacious fancies sometimes. When life was particularly grey and he particularly lonely, he thought how glorious it would be to have a girl like that to sympathise with him, and chase away his gloom with the kindness and merriment of her eyes, and tease him just a little.

When Elspeth was sad one day and her eyes a little red, how she would have blushed to know that The Boy was tucking her under his arm and marching her off to a green nook by the river, making her pale cheeks pink with a big kiss, and telling her that he was going to face all her troubles now!

And because The Boy was chivalrous, and a trifle modest and shy, he searched his head in vain for a plan by which a fellow might decently get to know her; and because she was an understanding sort of girl, Elspeth understood this, and liked him more for it. If both privately wished for a big fire into which he would plunge through flames, and get up an impromptu introduction by rescuing her—well, thoughts are free in a free country.

Now the war had come and The Boy had gone. His going made somehow an astonishing blank in existence. As the weeks went by, Elspeth began to realise what it had meant to her to see that quiet young face each day, and to dream that some day . . . well—anything might happen. For now nothing could happen.

She wanted somehow to mother him—to write and ask him if he had enough blankets, to knit him socks and mufflers. She wanted to tell him little things that happened, little jokes, little thoughts—how was it that she knew so well just how he would understand them?

Weeks wore into months, and then one day The Boy came back. Straight and brown and soldierly in his khaki, he walked down between the tables, found a seat opposite her, and faced her over the dingy tablecloth. For an instant their eyes met in an involuntary look of recognition, then Elspeth bent over her plate conscious of warm cheeks and hands that trembled. The Boy's lunch arrived, but he did not make his usual bold attack upon it—rather a series of small skirmishes that at last stopped all together. Elspeth, looking up, found his eyes fixed upon her, and understood. He meant to speak at last.

Just at this crisis, Fate, with its usual contrariness, sent along a cheery, well-oiled Knut to clap The Boy loudly on the back and say, "Why, old chap—you back? Thought you were off ages ago! Well—I'm going to sit down and hear all the yarn!" In spite of entire lack of encouragement from The Boy, he dropped into the seat beside him, and the opportunity was lost.

"Nothing to tell, I'm afraid," said The Boy briefly. "We're off to France some time this month, that's all, and I've got a day's leave."

"To say good-bye, eh? You've come home, I suppose?"

"Haven't got a home," said his companion, with a smile that was a trifle grim.

"Oh—come to see your girl, then?"

"Haven't got a girl."

"Then why on earth come up to dirty old Town?" (Elspeth, who had a lump in her throat, knew why. He had come to say good-bye to her before he went to fight. And now——)

"Well," went on the other, "no accounting for tastes. Look here, old man. I shall expect to hear what's happening out there—drop me a post-card!"

"If I remember," said The Boy dryly, conscious of a wild desire to run the Knut out by the collar of his coat.

"No—I say—don't forget! Look here—give me your regiment and things, and perhaps I'll write and remind you." He drew out pencil and envelope. "Private Peter Cole, No. 2713, A Battalion, —— Regiment, Expeditionary Force." "I shan't forget. I'd go myself, you know, but they won't let us off at the bank." His voice flowed on in a never-ending stream, while the clock crept relentlessly nearer to the hour of two, when Elspeth must be back at her typewriter or take the stern consequences.

Two o'clock.

Elspeth rose, pulling on her gloves with trembling fingers. She felt cold and comfortless, and her eyes were wet with tears. She dared not look at The Boy, though she felt his gaze upon her. In her distress, forgetting altogether the book she had brought with her, she was half-way up the room before The Boy's voice behind her made her turn.

"Excuse me—your book!"

There he stood, as she was never to see him again, straight and strong, and brown as his uniform. What his eyes said made speech unnecessary. She took the book and then he held out his hand. "Good-bye," said he.

"Good bye." For an instant in that crowded room, hands, hearts and eyes met at once. Then Elspeth fumbled at her coat, and, with what tried bravely to be a smile, she held out a tiny bunch of white heather. "For luck," she whispered.

The Boy said nothing. When Elspeth turned at the door for a last look she saw him still standing there, holding the heather in his hand and gazing after her.

That was how they met and parted.

Then began for Elspeth the weary time of waiting, the hopes and fears, the opening of papers with trembling hands, the feverish scanning of casualty lists, the shudder of relief when the last of the "C.'s" was passed and there was no news of him. But no news was good news, and that and the wintry sunshine had got into Elspeth's heart one day and made her unusually cheerful and full of wild hopes and happy dreams.

And, then, riding to her lodgings at night in the train, she looked down the long list and she found his name.

Private Peter Cole, No. 2713. . . . Seriously Wounded.

At first her brain was too numb to feel pain. She read on mechanically till she reached a little batch of names at the end, headed: "Previously reported seriously wounded, now reported dead."

At last the truth broke on her.

He was dying—The Boy, her Boy, was dying.

"Poor thing," said the woman who had been next to her when Elspeth had left the carriage. "Bad news, I s'pose. Did you see her face?"

"Ah, it's a terrible thing, this war," returned her neighbour.

"Private Peter Cole, seriously wounded, No 2713, Stationary Hospital, Paris."

The Boy's story was being told briefly. There was only one more line to come. On the day when this second note appeared Elspeth went without lunch to buy a glorious, red scented rose, and that evening she sat down in her lonely room to write a letter. It didn't matter now what she said to him. All she prayed was that it might reach him before he died, so that he might feel and know that somebody thought of him and loved him, that he might not be lonely on the dark way; it was hard to see for tears.

She packed the red rose tenderly in a bed of moss, and in the box with it she slipped one little note:

"Soldier Boy,

"I love you. There is no need to say more because you understand everything. I am proud of you—and proud, so proud that you love me, too. I shall love you for ever."

The Boy's voice behind her made her turn. "Excuse me—your book!"

She sealed up the packet and sent it on its way to the war-swept land of France.

The last line of the story brought no shock. She had known it would be there. She only wished dully that she knew he had had the letter.

"Private Peter Cole . . . Dead . . ."

Dead.

Well, life must be lived. Why? No need to ask why, with so much misery at one's elbow. One must go on living, it seemed, so long as there was something to be done for any other human creature. The Boy had given his life for his country. She, too, would give as much of her life as work left her in helping her country. She must forget her own sorrows in helping others to bear theirs.

At last came one particular morning when life seemed endurable no longer. At work everything had gone wrong; the day was grey and rainy and cold. A chill crept into Elspeth's heart and body. She had worked too late the night before; at lunch time she could eat nothing, and even a cup of tea failed to revive her. She felt useless, lonely, sad. She rose wearily at last, and went out into the street.

And there stood—The Boy . . .

The next thing Elspeth was conscious of was an arm supporting her and a voice, very far away, saying: "Are you all right now, darling? What a fool I was to startle you!"

She looked up dazedly to see The Boy's face bending over her. They were in the wide dark doorway of an empty warehouse. The Boy's face was thin and white, but superbly happy, in spite of the anxiety with which he now regarded her. His right arm was in a sling, and she saw after that he walked with a limp. "Sweetheart!" said The Boy.

Elspeth's face grew suddenly rosy. Then she remembered. "But it said—the newspaper said—"

"Yes, I know, dear, but I pulled round after all. My arm will get right in time, but not my leg—I shall always walk with a bit of a limp. They say I'm no good for any more fighting. It's easy to see how the mistake came about, for I did nearly die, dear. Do you know what pulled me through?"

As Elspeth could make no answer, he went on: "It was a withered rose and a letter from the dearest, bravest, little girl in the world, and said 'I love you.' I was dying then, but when I got that I simply had to live. I had to live so's I could come back and say how I loved you, too.

"So here I am, dearest. I ought to feel it wrong to ask you to share life with such a broken, battered old wreck as I am. But I know your brave heart—I can't even pretend it will make a difference. Does it, sweetheart?"

Shyly Elspeth stooped and pressed her lips to the arm that lay in the khaki sling.

"Yes," she said. "I love you more, Soldier Boy."

LIKE A LIVING SKELETON

Indigestion, Palpitation, and Headache cured by Dr. Cassell's Tablets, the All-British Medicine.

Mrs. King, Portsmouth.

"My cure by Dr. Cassell's Tablets was nothing short of a miracle," said Mrs. King, of 9 Vernon Road, Copnor, Portsmouth. "Certainly they saved my life," she continued, "for before I took them recovery seemed out of the question. I was like a living skeleton, and the pain at my chest and round my left side was terrible. I suffered frightfully with headaches and palpitation, and often went almost blind with dizziness and sickness. Nothing would remain on my stomach. I was in bed for weeks at a time, getting weaker and more wasted; for doctor's medicine and other things I tried did no good at all.

"But when I got Dr. Cassell's Tablets what a blessed relief! I grew steadily better, and now I am just full of health and strength."

"SAY 'THANK YOU'!"

Just because you like a thing, or think it pretty, you mustn't take it for granted that a child will agree with you. Children have quite different standards of judging things from grown-ups, and delight in the quaintest and most out-of-the-way things. But read for yourself and see.

WHEN my grandmother was a little girl, she was taught to say a grace in which she thanked "God and my good parents" for her dinner. My mother was always being reminded of all that her parents had done for her by "giving her food and clothes, and a good education, and a roof over her head." I, myself, had it constantly impressed upon me that I owed my parents a debt of gratitude for every single thing they did for me. But I wasn't grateful—not a bit of it. And I don't believe that, if the truth were known, it would be found that my mother or grandmother were either.

Children don't feel gratitude for the big things of life—food, clothes or education. These things are facts, just as fresh air and sun are facts, and they take them for granted in just the same calm way. If you want to win their whole-hearted gratitude and their passionate adoration, you must set to work on some other basis.

They Love Unexpected Pleasures.

Because children deal mostly in little things, those who have to do with them should always be very careful and tactful in the ordering of the details which concern them. A tiny, unimportant promise made and forgotten will seem a terrible omission to a child; a fraction of unfairness in nursery dealings will be magnified by him into a colossal wrong. Therefore, it is essential that you should observe the greatest possible exactitude in all your dealings with him, for one tiny chance injustice or unkindness will be quite sufficient to blot out from his mind the memory of months of patience, love and care.

Then, when you want to give him pleasure, you must start by setting aside your standard of what pleases you, for his will not be at all the same. Children like such strange and unexpected things, and they like them so intensely that no amount of grown-up-planned pleasure could fill their place.

For instance, I remember last Christmas taking my youngest boy, Cyril, to the pantomime. He enjoyed himself—oh, yes, he enjoyed himself all right—but he was not wildly enthusiastic. I had spent a good deal of time and trouble and money on giving him this treat, and I was just a trifle disappointed when I saw the polite boredom with which he sat through it.

Well, two or three nights later, about half past six in the evening, when I was putting Cyril to bed, a Punch-and-Judy show suddenly appeared in the lamp-lighted street outside our house and began to give a performance. Cyril was wild with excitement and enthusiasm. Might he go? Oh, please mightn't he go out and see it just for a few minutes?

"Very well," I said. "Pull on your stockings and boots again, and put your coat over your dressing-gown. Then you may run out for ten minutes."

* * * *

"Everyone Has His Own Taste."

Cyril sprang at me and literally dragged me down to my knees by the force of his grateful hug. And when he came back again—the oddest little figure you can imagine, with his red dressing-gown trailing under his winter coat—he was full of gratitude.

"I've had a lovely time, mummy. Thank you so much for letting me go. It was ripping!"

Never, as long as I live, shall I forget the dismal, aching boredom with which "treats" filled me in my own childhood. I hated being taken to the Tower, and the Lord Mayor's Show, and to visit my cousins, and all the rest of it. Side by side with the memory of these nightmare "treats" is a joyful remembrance of one day spent in a garden where a little stream ran between green banks, and there was a quiet-eyed woman who smiled at me and said:

"Even if you do fall in, you can be dried, you know. I'll ring a bell for you when tea-time comes," and then went, and left me to be happy in my own way with the dear, delightful running water.

Find out a child's own private taste, and then gratify it as far as you can. I feel sure you will find that the child not only thanks you with his lips, but loves you from the bottom of his warm and grateful little heart.

OUR COOKERY CHAT.

MY MOTHER'S MARMALADES.

A special article by the daughter of an old lady who is widely known and justly celebrated for the excellence of her home-made marmalade.

MY mother has made marmalade at home for the last thirty years, and it has always been excellent. She does several different kinds, because she says that tastes vary almost as much with regard to the flavour of marmalade as they do with regard to the strength of tea or the exact point to which meat ought to be cooked. So, though she herself prefers the kind that is made by the recipe I will give you first, she always keeps a supply of the others on hand.

She says that many folks, who are not quite "up" in all the little secrets of marmalade manufacture, make a mistake by setting to work too early in the year. When the oranges are very much at the beginning of their season, they have far more pips than are to be found in them later on. Put off your making till the middle of February, if possible, and then the fruit will be at its perfection.

Don't go in for cheap oranges—they are always a mistake. Of course, you needn't have the best Seville, either. Those that are sold at about eighteen for a 1s. are quite right.

My Mother's Favourite.

This makes rather a thick marmalade of a good, deep amber tint. It is hardly sweet at all, and so it pleases people who do not care about sugary things.

6 Seville oranges 1 lemon.

Cut the fruit up into thin slices, carefully removing all the pips. Weigh it, and to each pound of fruit allow three pints of cold water. Put all together in a deep basin. Cover the basin with a newspaper, and let it stand for three days.

Put the mixture into the preserving pan. Boil it up. Draw it to the side of the fire and let it simmer there till the fruit is tender. Every now and again you should use your spoon to draw a fairly thick bit of peel to the side of the pan, where you can try the tenderness. When the spoon goes easily through the peel the fruit is cooked enough.

Weigh it again, and to each pound of fruit allow a pound of white sugar. Boil it again for one hour, stirring it now and then, and taking off the scum as it rises. Try a little on a plate, and when it sets into jelly on becoming cold, the marmalade is done.

Put it into dry pots which have been warmed a little to prevent them from cracking. When cool, cover it with brandy paper and store it in a cold, dry place. It will keep quite well for a year or more, if necessary.

Important.—1. Stir right down to the bottom of the pan.

2. Skim very clean. Not a trace of scum must be left.

3. Use good quality sugar. The cheap kind makes so much scum that it is very wasteful.

4. If you want to deepen the colour, boil the marmalade very fast for a few minutes just before taking it off the fire. Mind it doesn't burn.

The One I Like Best.

This is made with a mixture of sweet and Seville oranges. I prefer it, myself, because it is not quite so definite in taste as the other. It is clearer and more jelly-like, and the colour is more golden than amber.

1½ dozen of best Seville oranges 1½ dozen of sweet oranges.

Allow one lemon to each two pounds of oranges.

Wipe the fruit and weigh it. Make a note of the weight, so that you may not forget. Grate the yellow part off the rind of the Seville oranges and off half of the sweet ones also. Put the grated rind into a little muslin bag and tie it up.

Remove all the under skin from the oranges and also from the lemons, so that you have only the pulp left. Put the pulp into the preserving pan with a pint of water to each pound of fruit, which you have weighed at the start. Add the bag of scrapings, and boil the whole for an hour.

Skim out as many of the pips as possible. If you take pains you will be able to get all of them, I expect. They must not be boiled in the marmalade longer than can be helped, as they are apt to give it a bitter taste.

At the end of an hour strain the mixture through a fine sieve. Measure the juice, and allow one pound of sugar to each pint, with one pound extra for the gratings.

Turn the gratings out of the muslin into the juice. Boil all for half an hour or more. You will know when it is done by the fact that the gratings float about in the mixture instead of settling down at the bottom of the pan, as they did at first.

It is perfectly delicious when done—like Golden Shred, but nicer, I think. The method is more troublesome than the first about which I have told you, but I should like you to try it just once, in order to prove what a delightful result it gives.

Important.—1.—Take care to grate the yellow skin only—not even a scrap of the white underskin.

2. Get the pips out as soon as you can.

3. If you want a little touch of sharpness in taste, grate up the lemon rind and tie it into the bag with the other rinds.

Lemon Marmalade.

Make this by the first recipe, substituting lemons for oranges. Allow one pound of white sugar to each pint of pulp. It comes out pale and clear, and it is excellent for use in cakes or tarts, though, personally, I do not very much care for eating it on bread and butter.

Sometimes, in order to give a better colour to lemon marmalade, my mother scrapes up the red part of a large carrot—not the yellow inside, but only the red outside—and adds this. It deepens the colour splendidly, and does not spoil the taste at all.

(Next week: Pancakes for Shrove Tuesday.)

A WET DAY SURPRISE BOX.

A toy that will cost you nothing and amuse the children for hours.

If the bairns become fretful long before bedtime on wet days, start a surprise box for your boys and girls—a box full of the most delightful surprises imaginable, a box which is a treasure trove of wonderful things to the kiddies. It will not be either a bother or expense, for children love the quaintest little scraps of things and will play quite happily with anything provided it is novel.

Lock it if You Can.

Any sort of box will do for the purpose, though it is better to have one that will lock. It is impossible to tell you exactly what to put into your surprise box, but everything must be as surprising and exciting as possible—some striking penny toy, picture postcards, foreign stamps, odd bits of stuff that will make dolls' clothes, dolls' shoes fashioned from old kid gloves, a new story book—anything that children love. There is no reason to spend money upon the things—almost every week housewives throw away lots of suitable trifles.

Remember, though, that the surprise box must be a very extra special treat, only produced on wet days or when one of the little people is ill.

FRY'S "Troop Tins" Chocolate is a ready-made food-confection and takes up little room. It is made up in dainty cases which can be used for Cigarettes. No more acceptable offering can be sent our gallant sailors and soldiers. Its Food Value is undeniable, making it a boon afloat, in the trenches, or on the march.

A SPLENDID HOLDALL.

Make one for your soldier-boy—it's a present he'll thoroughly appreciate.

THIS holdall would make a most delightful present for anyone who is going to the Front. It can be made quite easily at home, and as it is small and light to carry, it will be found very much more convenient than an ordinary ready-made affair.

Use a piece of strong waterproof material one yard long by ½ yard wide. Divide it into three parts crossways, in the way shown by the diagram. Sew on strips of material over the end parts to make two large and two smaller pockets.

Before putting these strips on you must bind their free edges with American cloth stitched on firmly for the depth of about three-quarters of an inch. You must bind the sides of the little pockets in the same way.

After you have sewn down all the pockets, you must bind the holdall all round along the outside edges with strips of American cloth about an inch wide. This cloth can be stitched on by machine to make it stronger. Then you must have a little bar of material in the centre of the holdall, stitched in three divisions, so that it will hold small articles.

Just the thing to make for your own particular soldier—he'll find a holdall like this ever so useful!

* * * *

Everything He Needs Most.

Now, on to the outside of the holdall you must sew four strong slots of material through which straps can be passed, and then use an ordinary strap with a handle for the fastening. It should not be a very long one, as it will not be required to go round more than once, and it is best to keep everything as small and light as possible in order to make the piece of baggage more easy to carry.

The following should be the contents;—

In one large pocket: A pair of pyjamas; a flannel shirt; socks; felt slippers.

In the other large pocket: A towel; two coloured handkerchiefs.

In one small pocket: Twelve sheets of writing paper and twelve envelopes; one pencil.

In the other small pocket: A sponge in a bag; nail brush; soap.

In the little slits in the centre: Tooth brush; comb; a tube of boracic ointment.

A holdall filled in this way would be perfectly invaluable to a friend who is going to the Front, and it is a little gift that can be made quickly and inexpensively by the merest amateur.

WHITE LIQUID PETROLEUM

THE SAFEST AND BEST APERIENT

Vaseline

ODORLESS AND TASTELESS

(TRADE MARK REGISTERED)

WHITE Liquid "Vaseline" has been used for many years with the utmost satisfaction, both by physicians and surgeons in the treatment of various diseases. Recently it has attracted world-wide attention by its use as a mechanical lubricant in chronic and general constipation and stasis. It has also proven valuable for the relief of old and standing adhesions and many diseases pertaining to the stomach, alimentary canal and intestines, as well as for use in abdominal surgery and in chronic and rheumatoid Arthritis.

By lubricating the passages and the intestinal tract, the White Liquid "Vaseline" offers a sure relief in cases of Flatulence and Dyspepsia. It assists an overtaxed system to free itself of undue burdens, to assimilate nutriment from food, and to expel the wastes and poisons of the body in a perfectly free and healthy manner, and is a useful aperient which may be safely employed for the youngest of infants. White Liquid "Vaseline" is the original liquid paraffin so widely used and recommended by the medical profession.

It cannot be too strongly urged that all due precaution is necessary in employing any curative agent internally. Hence it is well worth while insisting upon the Chesebrough Company's White Liquid "Vaseline."

In bottles, 1/-, 1/9, and 2/6.

CHESEBROUGH MANUFACTURING CO. (Consolidated), 42 Holborn Viaduct, LONDON.

Booklet telling of the many sovereign uses of Vaseline (in all its varieties) post free on receipt of postcard.

BLOUSE LENGTHS GIVEN AWAY—

Not in ones or twos, or by the dozen; not even in hundreds, but BY THE THOUSANDS. Why shouldn't there be one for YOU?

COULD you think of a more acceptable present—in these hard times—than a dainty blouse length, one that you had chosen for yourself from a splendid selection of patterns sent direct to you from one of London's biggest West-end stores? That is the ideal gift which I have selected for hundreds upon hundreds of my readers and which I hope you may receive before many more weeks have passed.

I didn't decide upon blouse lengths without a good deal of thought, I can assure you, and for a long time I wondered whether it should be ready-to-wear blouses or material which you could choose for yourselves, and make up exactly as you please.

In the end I argued it out with myself like this: "Everybody wants blouses—but everybody doesn't want them the same size, the same colour and the same style." You can't send dozens of blouses for readers to choose from—the postage would be far too heavy—but you can send a splendid selection of materials—from which readers can choose the one blouse length which appeals to them most of all Then they can make up the material in their own favourite style, and it will fit better, look better, and please better than a "ready-made" they were not able to choose for themselves.

I spent yesterday morning busily selecting the patterns that are to come to you—and I really do think I have included something for everybody. There are crêpes, delaines, voiles, flannels and silks in all colours of the rainbow and in every type of pattern you could wish; some plain, some spotted or striped, and others with the newest of floral designs in delicate colourings ideal for spring wear.

"But how can I obtain one?" I expect you ask. Well, I'm not going to tell you quite all my secret to-day. Just wait—as patiently as you can—until next week, when you will find full particulars on the first page of HOME NOTES. For the present I'll just give you two little hints:

(1) My new scheme has something to do with patterns—all sorts and sizes of them—indeed, the very ones that you will require for your own and the children's clothes this spring. For everybody is turning "Home Dressmaker" nowadays, and it is really easy work when you have a good pattern to go by.

(2) These blouse lengths of mine are gifts, not competition prizes. You will have your first opportunity of obtaining one next week. Order your copy of HOME NOTES to-day, though, or you may find your newsagent sold out when you call.

COLONELS WHO DON'T FIGHT.

They don't actually go into the firing-line—these Colonels about whom S. BEATRICE PEMBERTON tells us—but they have, nevertheless, a great deal to do with success and failure in battle!

The wounded Russians in the ward of the Empress' hospital at Tsarskoye Selo, hail the Tsarevitch as a "chip of the old block" when he appears in their midst!

THE royal sovereigns and the great ones of the land who count it an honour to be Colonels-in-Chief to some of our leading regiments have an enormous influence on Tommy Atkins; they are able to inspire the fighters with loyalty and courage. It matters tremendously to the soldier that his King and Queen care. Ask any man in Queen Mary's Own Hussars and see how he'll glow with enthusiasm!

Before they left for the Front, Queen Mary, who is Colonel-in-Chief of the 18th Hussars, made a special journey down to their camp to review her loyal regiment and to wish the men God-speed.

"But I think," said a Royal equerry who accompanied the King and Queen to Brighton the other day, to visit the wounded in a hospital there, "I really think every regiment is 'Queen Mary's Own' since the war began!"

Down at Brighton, that day, our Queen's motherly heart was moved to admiration by the sight of a little Gurkha boy. This lad, whose quaint-sounding name is Bel, is only seventeen, but he and his brother Pim, though under age, found their way to the battle-front, and they were both very cruelly wounded. One had lost an arm, one a leg, and they had other terrible injuries.

But they smiled with delight when their Queen came near, and Bel looked such a child, as he gazed up into her face, that Queen Mary suddenly drew out the carnation she was wearing in her dress, and gave the blossom to our little hero. Neyer a V.C. was prouder, and I wasn't a bit surprised when the Ward sister told me next day, "Bel was far too happy to sleep a wink last night!"

Baby May-Blossom.

That little Gurkha soldier would like to see a photograph I have that I very greatly cherish. It shows Queen Mary sitting up in her pram—such an old-fashioned affair, it looks, too, with its two big wheels behind and one tiny guiding wheel at the front—and her proud father and mother, the late Duke and Duchess of Teck, are standing beside her small majesty. For she was always "Her Majesty" to them! The Duchess used to call the baby her "May-blossom." When the Princess Mary was a wee girlie, her mother, who idolised her, wrote describing the future Queen of England in these adoring words:

"She really is as sweet and engaging a child as you can wish to see; full of life and fun, and playful as a kitten; with the deepest blue eyes imaginable, quantities of fair hair, and a tiny rosebud of a mouth."

So our flower-loving Queen, from the day when her doting mother likened her always to some sweet-scented blossom, has chosen to shed fragrance around her path by kindly sympathies and acts of queenly graciousness, as when she put the pink carnation from her breast into the hot hand of the wounded soldier boy.

Our "Red-Cross Colonel."

The 19th Hussars, Queen Alexandra's Own, are very proud of their Colonel-in-Chief. And they

It is interesting to picture Queen Mary in her babyhood, as this little family group, taken in 1867, enables us to do.

The "Colonel whose helmet is always awry" is dearly beloved in her own regiment.

are not alone in their pride, for the Yorkshire regiment known as Alexandra Princess of Wales' Own also claims the Queen-Mother as its Colonel-in-Chief.

She is sometimes called "our Red-Cross Colonel" because her idea of war-time activity is making sure that the wounded lack nothing that tender nursing can give.

I don't know whether her daughter, Queen Maud of Norway, is a Colonel in her own country, but she showed a liking for cavalry in the nursery days at Marlborough House. The little princess had rather a wholesome dread of her stern grandmamma from Denmark. Queen Alexandra, then Princess of Wales, of course, was so young and gentle that the Royal children and their nurses noticed the difference when the Queen of Denmark paid them a visit.

Little Princess Maud was a great tom-boy and loved to ride her brothers' rocking-horse, but she well knew what an offence this would be in Grandmamma's eyes! It was amusing to hear her attempt to calm a very nervous Danish nurse-girl once, who quite obviously dreaded the imminent Royal inspection of the nursery.

"Don't be frightened of Grandmamma," she soothed, "she is really very kind. But please don't tell her I ride the boys' rocking-horse, will you?"

Peaceable War-Chiefs.

Of course, it would be quite impossible to mention every member of this noble army of Colonels Who Don't Fight. Lady French is one of the latest recruits. We may say she belongs to the newest of the New Armies, for she has been appointed Colonel-in-Chief to the Essex and Hertford Battalion of the Women Volunteer Reserve.

"I'm so glad," said one of the Amazons of this battalion, "that we've been given such a womanly woman for our Colonel, because although we're fighters we don't mean to grow masculine or forget our womanhood. See?"

Yes, I saw what the fair warrior meant, and I quite agreed that the gentle wife of Sir John French was an ideal Colonel if the valour that goes with quiet sweetness was to be enshrined in the heart of this new-formed regiment.

Then the pretty Princess Patricia of Connaught has a regiment bearing her name, and we've lately been hearing great things of these gallant fellows. "Princess Pat's Own" they call them. "Ready to do and die for her, bless her sweet face," grinned one Irish brave the other day, "and it's us that's aching to do both!"

Bel, the Gurkha lad, with the carnation which Queen Mary gave to him; needless to say, the youthful hero values it highly!

The Tsar's Daughters in Regimentals.

A British Army officer who has seen a good deal in past days of Russian High Society was speaking to me about the Princesses.

"I like the one with her helmet always awry," he said. I laughed, but when he cornered me I had to admit that I'd never seen a photograph of the Grand Duchess Tatiana in full regimentals where her helmet had been precisely "on the straight." And like my Army friend, I couldn't but admire that gay tilt—she looks ready for anything, as indeed she is!

The Grand Duchess Olga is a Colonel of the Lancers of the Guard, and wears a graceful Cavalier cloak and a busby with upstanding plume, which is quite correctly in the middle, as is seemly over that sweet, grave face.

But her younger sister has a jaunty air, and when dressed as an officer of the Imperial Hussars she is quite irresistible with that top-heavy helmet which will lurch over to the right!

* * * *

Mother and Son as Well.

Her Imperial Majesty the Empress is Colonel-in-Chief of the Hussars of the Guard, and the Tsarevitch Alexis, her long-waited for son, the pride of all the Russians, is Hereditary Grand Hetman of the Cossacks, and a princely little figure he cuts in his regimentals!

At Tsarskoye Selo, her favourite residence, the gentle Empress has established an immense hospital. Here these Royal ladies, who in the old days might not either visit or receive any not of Royal birth, are soothing the sufferings of common soldiers. Indeed the young Princesses have made it a rule not to minister to officers, but only to the men of the rank and file.

There is one exception, however. A common soldier was made an officer as a reward for conspicuous bravery on the field of battle, and this honour was conferred upon him as he lay, severely wounded, in the Royal hospital. But because his new dignity deprived him of the ministrations of his Princess nurse, all his pride was swallowed up in chagrin! Indeed his health was suffering, he fretted so much, and the baffled doctors told the Grand Duchess of his distress. She smiled, and went at once to his bedside. "You shall be my one and only officer," she said, "because, after all"—and she laughed gently—"I suppose you couldn't help it!"

The Tsarevitch, too.

Even the gallant young Tsarevitch is walking the wards at Tsarskoye Selo, with his Royal mother and sisters, and the soldiers lying there, seeing his likeness to his august father, say with pride a word or two in Russian which would best translate into our familiar phrase—"a chip of the old block"! So there is happiness in Petrograd even in these days of chastening, for it is a wonderful thing for a Royal House and a Great People to learn together the lesson of Love and Trust.

1.—A little-known cure for stopping a nose-bleed—tying a piece of string round the patient's left-hand little finger.

2.—Very effective, also, is the application of something cold—preferably ice—to the back of the patient's neck.

IF YOUR NOSE BLEEDS—

Try one of these remedies, and you'll find it will stop at once.

EVERYBODY knows that the ordinary way of stopping nose bleeding is to lie flat on the floor and hold a handkerchief tightly to the nose till the bleeding has passed. But there are some bad cases in which this is no good.

The first photograph shows a little-known, but very effective, cure. Tie a piece of string tightly round the little finger of the patient's left hand; pull it quite strongly, so that it hurts a little, and hold it so for a minute or more, telling the patient firmly meanwhile that the bleeding is going to stop.

The string compresses a tiny vein in the finger which communicates with the brain and thence with the nose, and the slight pressure on the little finger checks the flow of blood for a few seconds. I have found this cure quite successful even in very obstinate cases.

A remedy that is often employed is to apply a cold sponge or a large key to the back of the neck. If you happen to have a piece of ice in the house, that is better still. The cold object, whatever it is, should be put on for several minutes, and must not be removed till the bleeding has ceased. It should be applied just between the hair and the top of the collar, in the way shown by the second picture.

OUR VISITORS.

I am sure you will be intensely interested in this little sketch of some of our Belgian visitors, written by a lady who has been helping to entertain them.

A HOSTEL for Belgians has just been opened in our neighbourhood, and I was asked to go in there the other day and give a little help. Of course, I was delighted. Several ladies are in charge of it, and they have twenty-seven refugees—men, women and children—under their care. Our local doctor's wife asked me to go in and lend a hand at packing away some stores, but when she found out that I could speak French, she just took the things out of my hands and fairly bustled me downstairs to the large sitting-room on the ground floor where the refugees pass most of their days.

"Come and talk to them—do," she begged. "I can't understand a word they say. Their French is so difficult. And they are evidently pining for someone to talk to."

Dear me! What a talk we had! I was passed round from one group to another, who were all anxious to get a word with the lady who could understand their language. (It isn't proper French, in the case of the peasants, you know. It's Flemish, a sort of patois, like very broad Yorkshire dialect.)

They were mostly from Louvain, and just a few had come from Louvain to Antwerp, had been shelled out of Antwerp, and had passed on to England. The things that they have seen during the past couple of months would fill a library if they could be written. But, for some reason, which I cannot at all understand, they did not care to tell me tales of their sufferings and adventures—they much preferred to talk about their present circumstances.

Oh, yes! They were very happy—they were most comfortable—everyone was very good to them. One dear old soul, who was called by the others Gran'mère, ticked off on her fingers a list of the ladies who had done things for her since her arrival.

There was the lady with the grey hair who had given her clothes, and the nurse who had sat up with her through the first night, when she was so ill and frightened, and the young lady with the round face who came in the evenings and brought a machine to make music for them. (It was a gramophone, I suppose.) Gran'mère would pray for them all, but most for the young lady with the music! Ah! that music!

She would have gone on talking to me for hours, but just then I felt a pull at my sleeve and turned to look down on a little dwarfed woman, all in black, who wanted—oh, so badly!—to ask a question. Would I look in the paper and see if I could find any news of her sister Marie, lace-maker, of Louvain. They were in the house together when the Germans came, and they ran out together. But she—Philippa—could not go as fast as Marie, so they lost each other. That was weeks and weeks and weeks ago, but she had heard no word of Marie since.

I couldn't give her any news, but I could get her something else that she wanted—a lace pillow. Lace-making was her trade and she felt lonely without it to keep her occupied. She was delighted when I told her that she should have one, and she said she would make some lace for the ladies who had been so good to her.

It was always the same tale. "You are so good to us. We are so grateful. We shall never forget it." Even when a little grumble slipped out by mistake, thanks always followed it very quickly.

"Your country is very cold," was said to me several times. And the remark was always accompanied by a pathetic glance at the open window. I am afraid that our visitors don't much care for fresh air indoors. They don't mind going out as much as anyone pleases, but they like indoors to be really indoors, and the more stuffy they can get it the better they are pleased.

It is no wonder that the papers possess a great fascination for our Belgian visitors, for so many of them have yet to learn news of friends and relatives lost sight of in the hurry of their flight.

Work four of these corners. Seam them together, short ends to short ends, long ends to long ends. Get an oblong of linen just a little larger than the work. First hem the outer edges of the linen and the work together, then the inner edges, carefully hemming round the little corners. Then turn work over to wrong side. Cut linen away behind lace, leaving enough to turn in a narrow hem all round. Hem first the outer edge, then the inner edge.

IF YOU'RE GIVING A CHILDREN'S PARTY—

You will find the decoration idea suggested by the writer of this article quite an invaluable one.

DURING the winter months hardly a week passes without some children's party on a large scale. Sunday school scholars are entertained to tea, or the cripples of the neighbourhood have their annual treat, and this year many towns and suburbs are giving special parties for Belgian refugee children.

For a small party in one's own home it is easy enough to decorate prettily, but it is a much more difficult matter to give a big, bare schoolroom or hall a really festive appearance. One of the nicest ways of doing it is to make a rockery; in the middle of the room if it is a large one, or against the wall at one end if space is precious.

Begin by laying a piece of old oilcloth the size the rockery is to be on the floor, then edge it all round with a beading of wood secured to the oilcloth with putty. Flat blind sticks make an excellent beading, but whatever wood is used must be painted green.

Next you will want a number of branches of trees, not too thick and heavy, which must be tied or nailed together so as to form a kind of cage over the foundation. Leave plenty of small gaps between the branches, and let the highest part of the cage be in the centre for a middle decoration, or at the back for a wall one.

The next step is to throw some thin calico or an old sheet right over the cage. Then mix whiting with water to a consistency somewhat thicker than cream, and colour it either brown or green with a penny dolly tint. Pour this dye gently all over the calico before it has time to settle, taking care that every part of the cage is wet. A little sand sprinkled over the oilcloth will absorb any moisture that runs through.

The next day, when the dye has dried, your erection will look just like a rockery, for the calico will dry in a stiff and quite "rocky" manner and the gaps will have the appearance of cavities in the rocks. Fill all these spaces with little ferns, covering the tell-tale pots carefully with moss, and you will have the most charming of decorations to delight the children's eyes.

PATTERNS READERS HAVE ASKED FOR.

This is a new feature for HOME NOTES—which you will find in the third issue of our paper published during the month. If you want some special pattern designed on purpose for you, write to the Little Dressmaker about it now, so that she may include it amongst next month's "asked-fors."

A plain, well-fitting shirt that is specially meant for older ladies (No. 1624).

I ALWAYS keep in mind the things that ladies ask me for when they write to me, and even if I have not got room for what they want at the moment, I put it down on a bit of paper and make mention of it to the Editress, so that she may find a corner for the picture as soon as she has space.

She has very kindly given me a whole page this week so that I can get on it four of the patterns which my ladies have asked for a while ago. I am sure I hope they will give satisfaction to the readers who have been so patient and good in waiting for them.

First of all, there comes a frock for a little boy between the age of one and two years. This frock is neither a real baby's frock nor a tunic suit; it has the look of a tunic, and yet it is really a frock. You see, it is cut all in one, quite in the ordinary way, and then a big tuck is made round the hips to give a sort of tunic effect. As the child grows you can let out the tuck, and get quite a nice bit of extra length.

I should make the dress in fine blue serge for every day, with a white tucked collar and cuffs, and in white or cream for best. If you are a bit tired of sailor effects you can have a frilled collar for a change, and a bow, instead of the lacing at the front.

Dainty Styles.

Ladies who are rather stout are always telling me they find it so very difficult to get anything loosely fitting and comfortable and plain, that doesn't drag across the chest, or make the figure look quite shapeless.

I hope they will find this plain shirt blouse (No. 1624) right. You see, it has plenty of fullness at the front to give a nice soft effect, and yet the plain yoke on the shoulders keeps the shape from becoming at all baggy. The armhole is cut rather wide underneath, because a pattern of that shape wears so much better on a stout figure than a tightly fitted-up thing. The collar is the new high, double shape now so fashionable.

Both these patterns (Nos. 1622 and 1623) are very plain and useful, but dainty all the same; the camisole can be trimmed in any way you like.

Isn't this a dear little costume for a tiny boy? It's a cross between a frock and a tunic (No. 1621).

I can't at the moment call to mind who it was that asked me for a pair of buttoned-up drawers, but I know it was some young lady who didn't like ordinary open-leg drawers, and yet didn't care to wear dark knickers. I have had a pattern specially done for her, and I think it will be exactly what she wants, because, you see, it fastens up on the hips.

And in the same picture you will see a thing that I have been asked for a good many times lately—a very plain fitting camisole to suit a stout figure. Some ladies say that they find it difficult to get anything which doesn't make the bust seem bigger, because of the fullness and frills on the camisole. If you have this, you will find that it fits just as smooth as a knitted spencer would do, and yet looks dainty and pretty under a transparent blouse. (You will see some more popular styles in a month's time!)

(Nos. 1622, 1623, and 1624 are cut in three sizes, W, 22, 24 and 28, and No. 1621 for Child of from one to two, and can be obtained for 6½d. each, post free, from the Pattern Department, Home Notes, 18 Henrietta Street, Strand, London, W.C.)

"MILADI"

A Charming Child Story by Alice Gates.

"GOOD-BYE, darling — good-bye, Betty—Mother's own baby."

And Betty was set down, her clinging embrace loosed gently by Mother. Then—

"Remember, Mrs. Brewer, I rely on you—I trust you implicitly. The cheque will come regularly, but I am asking you for more than money can buy. . . . Be kind to Betty—but you will—I know you will!"

A swish of grey silken skirts. murmured protests and fervent sniffs from Mrs. Brewer, and the door closed on Betty's world. Mother had gone. She turned with unspeakable desolation in her little heart to the large woman in the grey dress and white apron, in whom Mother had relied so implicitly. Betty's lips quivered.

Mrs. Brewer had been Mother's own nurse when she was a child, but that was twenty years ago at least. In those days she had been the very epitome of the old-fashioned, perfectly trustworthy servant. It did not occur to Mother to question what the passing of years and the surroundings of her married life might have effected in nurse's character. She just thought that the mere fact of Mrs. Brewer's existence was a mercy, for she could never have forced herself to leave Betty with an utter stranger. Also, Mrs. Brewer accepted facts, especially when accompanied by a cheque, without too much questioning.

Mrs. Brewer was well-versed in the initial signs of grief or rebellion in the young.

"Now, Miladi, none of your tantrums with me," she said, briskly.

She didn't speak exactly unkindly, but Betty was vaguely conscious that she would rather have been punished than spoken to in that odd, hard tone of voice. Mrs. Brewer had called her a new name, too, and just in the tone of voice they use when they tease you. Miladi—she had said.

Mrs. Brewer was examining intently a slip of pink paper. Evidently it was a cheque. Timidly Betty touched her skirt.

"Please, it's not tantrums," she said. Her voice sounded a little tremulous and not quite controlled. "It's Mother going away—and everything, and please—please will you call me Betty?"

For a moment Mrs. Brewer regarded this piece of audacity speechless.

"Well I——. Now, look here, Miladi, I'm just going down the street for a few minutes, and you'll go into the nursery and play with those nice new toys Mamma has brought you. As for what I please to call you—a little girl like you settin' herself up against me—I never heard of such a thing."

So Betty was left in the large empty room that was to be her nursery with a wooden horse, a doll and a fairy-book. She sat down on the floor, very quiet and still, listening for the distant sound of the taxi that had borne Mother away, but none came.

* * * *

Life seemed to have cheated Penelope Harding of many things. She wondered sometimes how it had come about, and how she had ever lived through the interminable years of her married life. And then Paul died. There had been no pretence of sorrow over that. She was free, free once more, and now that she had got freedom it seemed an empty thing. She had come this voyage out to America to try and forget things. It was memory, she decided, that was holding her back and making her re-live the years of horror. If she could but forget and begin life over again as if that had never been. Of all pure, clean things in the world, she thought, the sea is the most directly refreshing. So, with nothing more definite than this in her mind, she set sail for America. And every day on the limitless stretch of water broke down some barrier in her mind and gave her new life.

And then she met Geoffrey Challoner. It was strange that with all the years of disillusionment behind, her heart went straight out to him like a child's.

To others he was just a typical, slightly-built young Englishman. To Penelope he was everything—the man her soul had cried out for through those years of darkness—the man she loved.

And Geoffrey Challoner, usually indifferent to women, was drawn irresistibly to this pale, sweet-faced woman. Her whole personality attracted him.

So the days passed by. On a voyage the days are very long, friendships are quickly made and as swiftly broken. And as they neared their destination this thought swept into Geoffrey's mind with desolating force.

This voyage had been different from any other because of her. Life with Penelope had suddenly become full of meaning—without her. . . .

They were sitting on deck together. The night was dark, and a stiff breeze was beginning to blow. He was leaning over, looking into the dark unseen rippling world they were racing through, quite suddenly he spoke.

"Penelope—you know very well. . . . I can't let you go," he said. "Stay with me. Be my wife."

Penelope's heart was beating fast. A certain forced numbness that had stood her in good stead through the years of darkness seemed to be failing her now; the first signs of palpitating life were throbs of joy that were like pain.

She looked up at him.

"Geoff," she said, "is it true—really true?"

He seized her hands and gazed down at her.

"You don't love me," he said, half incredulously, "it isn't true—it can't be. Oh! my love—Penelope."

And then she remembered.

"Geoff! you mustn't mind about my having been married before; it was a horrible mistake, but it's there—a fact. Do you mind?"

For a second his face clouded, but only for a second.

"That's gone and done with," he said, "it's nothing to us, it has nothing to do with us now." He gave a little laugh. "You'll think me silly," he said, "but I simply couldn't have stood it if you'd had a child of—his."

He drew her closer to him in the dusk.

"You forgive me that thought," he said, "you understand? It's because you're my love—mine—and I want you for my very own."

Just for a moment there was silence.

"Why you're shivering, Penelope!"

Geoffrey took up his coat from the chair and wrapped it round her.

"It's all right, dearest, you didn't mind my saying that?" he asked eagerly.

"It's all right," said Penelope.

The days passed slowly for Betty. It seemed to her that they were all very much alike after she had given up expecting that Mother would come to-day.

Of course, there were the days when the pink slip of paper came to Mrs. Brewer—Betty believed, direct from Mother—and because of that she always longed to be allowed to touch it, but for some reason not easy to deduce, this suggestion seemed to infuriate Mrs. Brewer more than anything else Betty did.

"Ah! Miladi," she would say, "people that wants to pry into other folks' business is apt to get their fingers bit off, and rightly."

And on these days Betty noticed that Mrs. Brewer always had business down the street, and would come back a little before bed-time with a rather flushed face and a tendency to give Betty more than her usual allowance of jam for supper.

"There, Miladi," she would say, as she gave it to her, "no one can say as I don't look after you well."

So the days slipped by. Betty went about just dully unhappy. But if you had asked her about it she could not have told you. She didn't understand why she was unhappy, she just knew that she was.

Weeks and months slipped by and it was now over a year since Mother had gone out of the door in her wonderful grey silk dress and had never returned.

It was late afternoon in Giles Street. Betty was sitting on the floor in the nursery. She had tried playing with Jemima, but, after all,

"I'm a coward, Geoff," said Penelope. "I had a child—Paul's child, my baby. I—couldn't face telling you, lest I should lose you."—(See page 290.)

Jemima was a doll — not subject to human frailities as Betty was, and Betty at this moment had an aching head and an intermittent shivering that made her feel curiously ill and dreamy.

Presently she lay down on the floor and slept, dreaming strangely. When she awoke, Mrs. Brewer was carrying her to bed. Betty didn't like being in Mrs. Brewer's arms, and said so. But for once this frank statement on Betty's part didn't seem to matter. Mrs. Brewer just tucked her up, and there was a frightened look on her face, Betty thought.

Then they lit a fire—a real fire—in her room, and that seemed to Betty wonderful, though she was too tired to think about it much.

"If only Mother would come," she murmured.

And Mrs. Brewer, bending over her flushed face, said:—

"Now, Miladi, don't you worry about Mother—Mrs. Brewer'll mind you."

And Betty said, "It's Mother I want." And still she was not slapped for this persistent obstinacy. Then, lulled by an overwhelming drowsiness and the monotonous sound of voices, Betty went to sleep.

She awoke to the sound of voices again. It was evening; a strange man was there talking to Nurse.

"It seems almost," he said, "as if the child had had some prolonged mental strain which has used up her strength." He looked searchingly at Mrs. Brewer. "Has she no mother?" he said.

Mrs. Brewer nodded wisely.

"She has—and she hasn't," she said. "I'm paid to take her place."

"Oh, indeed," said the doctor; "well, she should be communicated with if that is possible, and——"

A small, clear voice came from the bed.

"I want Mother," Betty said.

The doctor came and leant over the end of the bed.

"Poor little lass," he said. "Poor little lass."

Betty closed her eyes. And Mrs. Brewer, following him to the door, said in an urgent whisper, "You think she won't pull through, then, Doctor?"

Betty, half asleep, heard the words. It was what they had said of old Mr. Martin down the street last week, and he had died. Betty knew that he had died. She had seen the funeral pass.

Betty, flushed and shivering, struggled out of bed. She knelt down beside it.

"Please God, don't let me die," she said incoherently, "and send Mother, please."

It was just then that she caught sight of a crumpled envelope. It was Mrs. Brewer's—the kind the pink slips came in. Betty pulled out the sheet of paper; at the top it said:—

1 Carlton Terrace, W.

Betty stood shivering in an ecstasy of joy and fear.

"It's there she lives," she said; "that's Mother's home. I'm going to find Mother——"

She dragged on the little fur coat that Mother had sent her, and tremblingly put on her socks and shoes; then she walked unsteadily on to the landing and listened. There was not a sound. Mrs. Brewer had evidently gone down the street as she generally did about this time. Betty crept down the stairs, and, opening the front door, stood on the pavement.

A taxi was coming slowly along the street. Betty held up her hand.

The driver stopped.

"1 Carlton Terrace, please," she said eagerly.

For a moment the driver hesitated, then, the address and the coat together, and perhaps the tiny pathetic dignity of the child, decided him.

He shut the door, and started off for Carlton Terrace. When they reached their destination Betty clambered out. The singing noise in her head was odd, and how hot it was and yet so cold. She walked unsteadily up the steps—"Wait a minute—Mother will pay you," she said.

The man looked at her, then frowned perplexedly. "If that ain't a rum go," he said.

Betty rang the bell, and to the man who answered it she just said:

"Please, I want Mother."

And as he stood in blank astonishment she walked straight through the hall into the dining-room. It was full of lights and people.

Mother was there, as Betty had known she would be. Betty stood for a moment in the doorway, only a moment—then—

"Mother — oh, Mother — I want you!" she cried, and stumbled across into her mother's arms.

Mother started. Her face went as white as a statue Betty had seen Then Betty was in her arms, the little flushed, feverish face resting on her arm, and a general consternation among the guests; and, worst of all, Geoffrey staring at his wife with a look that might well have chilled any woman's heart.

Somehow the guests dispersed into the drawing-room, and at last Geoffrey stood alone, watching his wife bending over the little form, holding it as if she could never let it go again.

"Penelope——"

Suddenly she remembered. What must Geoff be thinking?

She looked up at him.

"Oh, Geoff, I've been very, very wrong, but I'm punished, indeed I am; try to forgive me. I'm a coward. I had a child—Paul's child, my baby, and when you said you couldn't bear it if I had a child to remind you of my—life before we met, I—couldn't face telling you, lest I should lose you. Oh, Geoff! Can you ever forgive me? It was wicked of me—but I loved you so."

Geoffrey Challoner's face softened strangely.

"Dearest," he said, "did you really love me as much as that! But when I said that I hadn't seen this baby-thing. What's her name?"

Betty stirred uneasily in her mother's arms.

"Say Betty, please," she said dreamily—"not Miladi."

SEND FOR HIM TO-DAY!

He has lots of luck stored up for you!

THREE PRETTY FROCKS.

The wide skirts are coming back again as fast as they know how; but these dainty indoor dresses have no excessive fullness round the ankles, in spite of the new decree, and yet they look thoroughly up-to-date and becoming! Which are you going to have?

I WANTED an office dress badly, war or no war, and after a successful visit to the sales and the acquiring of some really good patterns, I made myself a delightfully smart little frock that cost the merest trifle. I'll tell you all about it.

The style I chose in the end was No. 1627, but it took me a long time to finally make up my mind! No. 1626 is so very becoming with its quaintly trimmed bodice and the full tunic pointed in front—especially for tall, rather slim figures, that I nearly decided on it. I should have had the collar of white or delicately flowered silk, edged with a zig-zag of the charming Oriental braid you can buy in long lengths for very little at remnant sales. This braid would have been sewn into four tabs across the front of the bodice, too, and some fancy buttons down the fastening, at the belt, and on the cuffs, would have finished a really effective little get-up.

A very pretty dress, with a slight fullness in the pointed tunic (No. 1626).

A Dress For Best.

Then No. 1628, too, was hard to resist, though I realised from the beginning that it was really more of an afternoon costume than one for business only.

If I had wanted a new Sunday gown I should certainly have made it up for myself in that dull, putty-coloured cloth that is all the rage, with an underskirt of black velvet and the deep collar, revers and the cuffs of the same, and a tiny white silk vest at the neck.

The fullness of the tunic comes from the big box-pleat down front and back, but the underskirt is quite narrow. Don't you think the button trimming and the wide belt with its black buckle are fascinating?

No. 1627.

No. 1628.

Two becoming styles especially suited to tall figures (Nos. 1627 and 1628).

* * * * *

For Those Who Embroider.

Now you'll be wanting to hear about the frock I did have. Well, as I said, it was No. 1627, and very pleased I am with my choice. I am rather good at embroidery, you see, and so I worked that strip of trimming down the front myself—dull blues and old rose on a piece of the material, which was a warm brown. The collar is velvet to match, and the silk of the swathed belt tones in with it all exactly.

The skirt is only moderately wide, for it would look ridiculous to fly to the other extreme after the hobbles we have been wearing, and the sleeves are my favourite baggy armhole ones, set in quite simply under a plain little shoulder-strap yoke.

(W. 22, 24, and 28, these patterns can be obtained for 8½d. each, post free, from the Pattern Department, "Home Notes," 18 Henrietta Street, Strand, London, W.)

CAN I SING SITTING DOWN?

I expect you think you can't, but just read this article by Mrs. WEGUELIN GREENE before you quite make up your mind on this subject.

IT is surprising how long wrong ideas manage to survive even in this superior age. Singers, for instance, fancy, as their grandmothers have fancied before them, that they cannot sing sitting down, or at any rate can only sing well standing up.

As an actual matter of fact, I'm not so sure that sitting is not a better position for singing than standing, for this last demands a considerable output of energy that is better kept in reserve. Directly you stand every muscle of your body is at tension, and it will surprise you to learn that did you slacken this tension you would immediately topple over! Every sculptor is aware of this natural law.

When you sit, your muscles downward from the waist are at rest, although those above are not entirely so, as there is an upright position to maintain. Taken as a whole, then, the sitting posture is a comparatively restful one; one that enables you to reserve a considerable amount of muscular energy for the effort of singing.

To turn to the breathing question, as your lungs do not run down your legs, it stands to reason that your respiratory organs neither lose nor gain on the score of sitting or standing. An absolutely perfect breath can be taken when seated whatever some people might fancy to the contrary. To prove this take a long breath when sitting and hold it. Do the same standing. Note by the second hand of a watch or clock if there is any difference in the length of time it can be held. You will find that when seated the holding power is greater.

The only real need in singing is that the posture should be a perfect one from the waistline upward. If this is attained, it matters very little what becomes of your legs. On this head remind yourself of the different positions an actress is required to sing in. She has to do so again and again, not only sitting, but also reclining. Even those who have never had the good fortune to go to the opera are perfectly aware, too, that a singer is expected to sing her most exciting passages when dying, perhaps, in her lover's arms, or in some equally uncomfortable position. But to come back to the perfect posture referred to, which is the same, whether standing, sitting or lying. Hold yourself erect from the waist. Poise your head well; that is to say, neither crane it forward, nor let it slouch back on to your neck. Don't allow your chin to droop, and for another "don't"—don't turn your face to the right or the left, but keep it in an even line from the middle of the neck, with your shoulder blades well together, any space between them means that, whether standing or sitting, your chest is contracted, and proper breathing impossible.

"I can't sing and accompany myself as well," is, of course, another wail in this question of the sitting or standing position.

Well, the reason you can't do this is that you have the common fault of being careless about the bass of your songs. To be blunt, if you cannot put in a correct bass to your accompaniment, society is all the better off if you never sing at all! A slovenly bass means an unmusical mind, and, however good a voice, singing is never pleasing when the unmusical mind goes with t.

Try this plan. Look out your very easiest songs, all those, for instance, written in simple keys. Get the basses of these correctly by practising them in four bars at a time. When two fours go well as separate groups, practise them as a set of eight bars, not breaking into the eighth. In most instances, the second group of eight resembles the first group of eight. This doubling only obliges you to make a study of the first batch of eight. An eight-bar group is referred to as a musical sentence.

Now, to get your basses correct on this easy plan is to make yourself a sure accompanist; and mind, when you are a sure accompanist, you can sing courageously, and with none of that nervous hesitation which makes your singing painful to your listeners and yourself. Each accompaniment that you tackle in this way will come easier than the last, till in time you will wonder why you preferred someone else to play for you when you sang.

NEW USES FOR VINEGAR.

1. Moisten the stove polish with a few drops of vinegar instead of with cold water. If you do this, only quite a gentle rub will be necessary in order to give the stove a bright polish.

2. When eggs are scarce, add a dessertspoonful of vinegar and one egg to a large plain cake for which you would, under ordinary circumstances, use three eggs. The vinegar will lighten and shorten the cake deliciously, and will prevent it from having that tough consistency, which is sometimes the result of using too few eggs in proportion to the flour.

3. Next time you are boiling fish, add a few drops of vinegar to the water. Then the fish will be quite firm and a beautiful white colour.

4. If an egg has a very thin shell, or is chipped, so that you fear it may crack in the boiling, add a few drops of vinegar to the hot water. This will harden the white and prevent it from running out through the hole; so the egg may be boiled without breaking.

NO KISSING FOR ME.

Last week I promised you the other side of the question "Why I Let Men Kiss Me." I wonder very much with which point of view you'll agree.

TO me, kissing is one of the most intimate and sacred things we have. We only kiss those who are near and dear to us; for people we merely know and do not care about, a handshake is good enough. I've always hated the one or two casual women acquaintances who will persist in kissing me when we meet, because I feel that in offering kisses that mean so little they are lowering the value of those I give to my own people.

We judge the value of a thing by its rarity, and the kiss that can be had by all comers is valueless. Friends ought to earn their caresses, and in the same way words of affection from an intensely reserved person are a far greater compliment than much more gushing praise from a gushing acquaintance.

* * * *

Lowering the Value of Kisses.

By kissing men without using much discrimination as to who is worthy of that honour, a girl not only lowers the value of her kisses to the right man when he comes, but she cheapens herself. I'm sure it's true that men care most for what is hard to gain, and though they often amuse themselves by flirting with women who hold their kisses lightly, such women retain neither their respect nor affection. What is quickly won is soon tired of, and soon the poor flirt finds her proud place usurped by a newcomer.

* * * *

Kisses Should Be Earned.

As I have said, I do think friends ought to earn their right to kisses, and they are not earned by a few idle compliments and a stroll or two in the moonlight. At least, no kisses worth having are got that way, and the man who is content with less than the best affection which a woman can give is not the sort whose friendship will do her any good.

Of course, I know quite well that girls who think as I do get called prim and prudish, and are jeered at by the people who have different opinions. But they keep clear of that unpleasant label "flirt," they never lose their own self-respect, and when Mr. Right comes they can give him all the love that is in them, because none of it has been wasted in play with Mr. Wrong.

THE LITTLE DRESSMAKER

Our Little Dressmaker is the most popular of all the people who write for "Home Notes." She is a dear little woman, who took up dressmaking when her husband died so that she might earn a living for herself and her children. What she doesn't know about dressmaking isn't worth knowing, and she also has the happy knack of telling other people how to set to work. If you are in any difficulty, write to her, c/o "Home Notes," 18 Henrietta Street, Covent Garden, W.C.; she will be only too pleased to help you

ISOBEL'S WAR-TIME OVERALL.

THIS is the last of our war-time patterns, and I must say that, for my part, I'm really sorry to come to the end of them. I've liked the patterns, and taken a kind of pride in them, and I'm glad to know, from letters I've had, that my ladies have liked them also.

Still, the best of good things must come to an end, and as we have to finish up the set somehow or other, I'm pleased to be able to do it with such a nice and useful pattern as this overall.

Like khaki is for a man, so is a sensible, hard-working-looking apron for a woman just now—it's something to wear with pride because it shows that you're hard at work, trying your best to help your country in your own particular way.

Just Doing Her Bit.

I went last week to spend a couple of days with my brother, who is married and lives a little way outside London. I can't say that, up to the present, I had ever really taken to his wife—she was always a bit too much of a fine lady for my taste—the sort of woman who scolds the servant from morning to night, while she sits around in her best dress, never doing a hand's turn herself. But this time I found her without any servant to scold (not being able to afford one any longer), and with three soldiers billeted in the house.

You wouldn't believe how that woman had changed for the better. There she was, in an apron with her sleeves turned up, working round the house, cooking for four men, making them all as comfortable as you please, and keeping as bright as a bird the whole time.

"Well, Florence," I said to her, "you really do surprise me. I never knew you'd got it in you to come out so strong," I said.

"Oh, go along with you!" she said. "I'm only doing my little bit as every Englishwoman should. And I'm proud and glad to have the chance."

Which, really, has nothing to do with the apron. But I hope my ladies won't mind my little bit of gossip before we start out on the lesson.

* * * * *

Cutting Them Out.

The pattern includes cap and cooking sleeves, as well as the apron itself. You will want 2¾ yards of stuff 36 inches wide for the apron alone, and 3¾ yards 36 inches wide for the whole lot.

Use print, galatea, strong zephyr, casement cloth, crash or holland, A spotted or striped thing keeps clean much longer than a plain stuff. which shows the dirt at once.

Fold the material, and put the pattern on it in the way shown by Diagram I. Notice that the straight edge of the apron front and the straight edge of the cap must lie on folds. Mark the dotted line round the cap. Allow ¾ of an inch for turnings on all edges, except at the bottom, where you will need 1½ inches for a double hem.

You can make nearly the whole of the apron by machine. Start by joining the skirt pieces on to the front by lapped seams, in the way shown by Diagram II. You must make a turning about ¾ of an inch wide down

There's nothing more serviceable than a big overall to a lady that is doing a lot of housework, and she'll find this complete set—overall, cap and sleeves—a perfect treasure to brave the dust with. It's the last of Isobel's war-time patterns.

No. 1625. (Coupon pattern, see page 296.)

DIAGRAM I.

All you need remember when cutting out this set is to keep the straight edges of cap and overall front to the fold.

each long straight edge of the front. Lap the turnings down to the side pieces with the notches matching (Diagram II.), and tack them together. Now unpick the lap at the edges of the upper part of the front—that is to say, the part which has nothing joined to it. Seam on the straps to the shoulders, with the notches matching. Then turn in narrow double hems at the wrong side of the material right up the sides of the front and all round the straps. Tack them, and then put the whole thing through the machine.

Stitching the Apron.

You can run long rows of machining up both sides of the front and all round the straps. You can also machine the open backs of the skirt. They will need to have narrow double hems made up them, and you can run these under the needle very quickly. Tack up the hem at the bottom of the skirt, and machine that, too.

Cut little linings for the waist straps. Turn in and tack single hems at the wrong side of the material round both straps and linings. Run gathering threads along the top of the skirt. Tack the gathers to the bottom of the straps (Diagram IV.), face them up with the linings, and machine the whole thing together.

The round ends of the straps go towards the front of the waist, and are finished off by fancy buttons. The square ends meet at the back, and are fastened by a plain button and hole. You will need to sew a couple more buttons on to the straps, a little toward the sides, and work holes through the shoulder pieces to match them.

side edge. Work slot holes at the line marked by the dots. About a dozen holes will be enough. Thread a ribbon through them and tie it in a bow at the left-hand side.

Seam up the sleeves. Turn in and stitch a double hem about 1½ to 2 inches deep at the wrong side of the material round the top of each sleeve. Run a bit of rather narrow elastic into the hem, and put it well down, so that it rests on the stitching. Then run a second row of machining round, just above the elastic, so that it is held between two rows of sewing. Or, if you like, you may do the two rows of sewing first and put the elastic in afterwards.

Double the cuffs. Seam up their ends. Gather the bottoms of the sleeves. Put the gathers in between the open edges of the cuffs with the notches matching (Diagram III.). Stitch the join by machine. Fasten the cuffs with buttons and buttonholes.

For sound and scientific reasons the basis of the hand-fed baby's diet MUST be FRESH Milk.

Fresh cow's milk alone does not meet the full requirements—but humanise it by adding Mellin's Food and you have all the vital qualities of fresh milk in a condition exactly suited to baby's needs.

Instantly adapted for all ages.

Simply by varying the quantity of Mellin's Food you can instantly regulate the diet to meet the requirements even of the feeblest new-born child or of the most thriving youngster.

A well-known Doctor writes:

'I find that Mellin's Food made up with fresh cow's milk is far superior to foods made with water only.'
The Mother of the above baby writes: 'Baby was brought up entirely on Mellin's Food, and it would be difficult to find a healthier child.' (Mrs.) A. Traghelm, Prestwick, N.B.

WARM CLOTHES FOR THE WINTER.

ANY doctor will tell you that it is quite a false idea of economy to wear thin or insufficient underclothes in the cold weather, for unless you are well and warmly clad you expose yourself to all sorts of dangers. It is, therefore, very essential this winter especially, when it is so necessary that everyone should keep well, to pay special attention to details of this sort.

If you want thoroughly reliable garments, guaranteed to wear well and comfortably, and wash splendidly, at very moderate prices, you should write to Messrs. Pettigrew and Stephens, Sauchiehall Street, Glasgow, and ask them to send you their illustrated booklets concerning their "Wooltax" and "Wincwova" specialities. These books contain, besides many illustrations, full particulars as to prices and sizes, and also actual patterns of the materials themselves, so that you may see for yourself what splendid fabrics they are.

When writing to Messrs. Pettigrew and Stephens you should ask them to forward you at the same time their spring price list, which gives full particulars of the wonderful bargains that are to be obtained from this firm both in clothing and household goods.

OUR "UNSEEN FRIEND" PAGE. CONDUCTED BY ISOBEL.

A GROUNDLESS FEAR.

There comes a time in the life of most people when they need a real, true friend, who, though unseen, will try to help and guide them through trials and difficulties, who will try to make crooked things straight, and confused things clear. And this is what I want to do for you if you will trust me with your doubts and difficulties, whether they touch your outer or your inner life. I can help you through this page, or privately, if you like to send me a stamped, addressed envelope.

"WESTBOURNE" begs me not to laugh at her, and I should not dream of doing so, for I can see that she is in a terrible state of nervousness, her fear being that she may become insane. Some months ago, a naughty little girl, whom she had occasion to reprove for biting a ball, turned upon her and bit her arm. Immediately before the child had bitten her ball a dog had been playing with it and putting it in and out of his mouth, and "WESTBOURNE" cannot free herself from the fear that perhaps the ball might have been infected by the dog and that through the bite of the child there is a possibility of her developing hydrophobia. The doctor has assured her that there is no danger, but she is always thinking of what might happen, and she begs me to reassure her.

I am quite sure there is no danger of your having hydrophobia from this cause, "WESTBOURNE," but I am sure, too, that you have worried and brooded so much over the matter that you are doing yourself a great deal of harm. Once and for all, do try and make up your mind that your fears are all born of imagination and the nervous state into which you have fallen. If you had only trusted me with your address I could have reassured you by post immediately.

I think you should ask your doctor to give you a tonic; take plenty of good wholesome food and milk, be out of doors as much as you can and fill your time with interesting occupations. Go to bed early and sleep with your windows wide open at the top. As your general health improves, your terrors will lose their strength and finally you will wonder how you could ever have thought them terrors at all.

* * * *

Unreasonable Jealousy.

"TROUBLED ONE" was very fond of a young man, but owing to her jealousy they parted, and now she wants me to tell her how she can become friendly with him again. I can only suggest that if you see him you should speak to him, or, if he lives at a distance, you could write to him and say you are sorry for having been unreasonably jealous. He may come back to you—or he may not! Personally, I rather sympathise with a young man who has suffered from the unreasoning jealousy of a girl, and think it quite likely he may not care to run the risk of incurring it a second time.

It would be a pity to leave your good situation merely because you have not a young man, "MIRRY PIPON," and I advise you to stay where you are. You ask me, "Do you think that if God intends me to get married I shall do so, no matter how quiet my life is?" Yes; I do think so, and I know many girls who have lived in quiet places and married delightful husbands, whilst many other girls I know who have opportunities for meeting lots of young men are still unmarried. If there is a "Mr. Right" for you, never fear but that he will find you out no matter where you live.

"Mixed" Marriages.

You can easily show the gentleman who behaved in a too familiar way that you won't tolerate such behaviour again, "FORTY ODD." It is a mistake ever to allow a business interview to become anything else, and if the gentleman tries to make it otherwise it rests with you to decline to allow him to do so.

> Don't be in a hurry to throw yourself away:
> By the side of wisdom for a while delay;
> Make your life worth living; nobly act your part;
> And don't be in a hurry to spoil it at the start.

I am afraid it is too late to tell you anything about the present for the young man, "PIERROT," since the date is past. You should have sent your address for a reply by post. I am sure, however, that if your mother disapproved of his writing to you so much that she wrote to him personally asking him to stop it, she would not like your giving him presents. I am very sorry to hear that in spite of your mother's request that he should cease corresponding with you, he still does so, and I hope you will stop writing to him. I feel sure that your mother would not disapprove of the correspondence unless she had a good reason for doing so.

There is always a risk in marrying a man who belongs to an entirely different race, "LOMMELLE." It has been truly said that "East is East and West is West," and I could not honestly advise you to marry the Indian gentleman, however charming he may be. I do not see why your relations should laugh at you for loving him; it seems to me no laughing matter, and it is not with any feeling of amusement that I am considering the question.

You must remember that if you marry an Indian you will almost certainly be cut off from your own people, while his people are not likely to welcome you. The whole outlook of the West and the East is so dissimilar that the chances of their blending well together are very faint. I advise you to wait, say, for two years, and at the end of that time, if I am not much mistaken, you will see the inadvisability of marrying him.

Always your friend,

Isobel

FROGGY'S FRIEND.

She was only a horse, but Froggy missed her very much when she went to the war.

By LILIAN GASK.

FROGGY was a little French boy, very thin and pale, with big, dark eyes that gleamed and sparkled in a way that his Devonshire cousins thought "queer."

His real name was "Edouard," which was much, much prettier; but Bob and Tony called him Froggy, because his legs were so long and thin, and because they had once been told that French folk ate frogs for breakfast instead of eggs.

The very first morning after he came, Tony caught a fat, green one in the garden, and put it under a basin on his plate. When Edouard jumped and gave a funny little scream, he and Bob roared with laughter. They were most dreadfully hurt and surprised when Mother said she was ashamed of them.

"We only did it for fun!" they said, glaring at Edouard angrily, as if it were all his fault. But the poor green frog, as he hopped away—for Edouard had put him very gently on the grass outside—didn't think it was "fun" at all.

After this the boys always called Edouard "Froggy" when Mother wasn't there to hear them, and "Froggy" grew lonesomer every day.

He had been very ill that spring, and his father (he hadn't any mother) had sent him to Devonshire for a few weeks, thinking it would do him no end of good to have boys of his own age to play with.

But Bob and Tony were too thoughtless to be kind, and Froggy used to long to be back in the little brown house in the valley, where everyone loved and made much of him.

One afternoon, as he lay on his back beside a haystack, staring up at the sky and wishing that one of the little white cloud-ships would sail away home with him, a big brown mare came quietly up from the other end of the field, and thrust her soft nose into his hand.

Nightcap thrust her soft nose into Froggy's hand. "What's the matter, old fellow?" she asked.

It was Nightcap, his uncle's mare. The top of her head was a pure snowy white that came right down to her eyes (which were bright and sparkling as Froggy's own), and made her look very odd.

"What's the matter with you, old fellow?" she asked in a language that the little boy understood at once. It was the language all mother-things use to small creatures who are tired and sad.

"I'm so lonely," sighed Froggy, sitting up that he might lean against her. Now that the boys were forbidden to tease him, they left him all to himself, and he minded this most of all.

The big, kind mare rubbed her velvet nose on his shoulder, with a gentle whinny of sympathy. Her last foal, the dearest of all, had just been taken away from her, and she wanted something to love.

After this she and Froggy became great friends. He romped with her when she was loose in the field, and rode on her back when she drew heavy loads from one end of the farm to the other.

Froggy knew all about horses, for at home, in that beautiful valley on the Marne, his father took care of sick ones, and Froggy often went with him to see his patients.

So, when Nightcap got a very bad chill, he knew just what ought to be done for her, and the boys did not think him so "stupid" now When they found what splendid whistles he could make from pith-stems, they said that he "wasn't half bad," and before it was time for him to go home, they called him "a real jolly brick."

But Froggy never grew as fond of them as he was of Nightcap, his first and most faithful friend.

He was only just back in his lovely green valley when the sound of great guns boomed out in France, and the banks of his river were covered with soldiers. who trampled down the grass and flowers and dug deep dark trenches in the brown earth.

Froggy was sent into a distant province, but Froggy's father worked on the battle-fields, doing all he could to help the beautiful dumb creatures who had no choice but to fight their masters' battles.

Nightcap missed Froggy dreadfully when he left the farm, but soon she had such amazing adventures that she hadn't time to think of anything. She was "commandeered" for the war, and taken off to draw transport waggons instead of loads of hay.

Poor Nightcap! She hated the terrible noises, and shuddered when bullets whizzed round her meek head.

One day, as she crossed an open stretch of ground, a sudden, sharp pain threw her back on her haunches, and, moaning, she staggered to the ground.

The waggon behind her was hastily unloaded, but she was left where she fell.

Some few hours later, Veterinary-Surgeon Jacques came up and looked at her.

"Poor beast!" he said. "She's badly hurt. I think she'd better be shot."

But he stayed his hand, for he was Froggy's father, and his quick eyes noted the "funny white cap" that had gained her her name at the farm. His little Edouard had often talked of her, and surely no two horses could be so strangely marked.

So with very tender hands, for Froggy's sake, he stayed to bandage the brown mare's wounds, and fed her with something that gave her strength, and she was able at last to rise. . . .

She is grazing now in a green field in France, rather lame, but otherwise almost well. And when she and Froggy meet again, they'll have lots to say to each other.

AUNT HILDA'S LETTER.

February 20th, 1915.

MY DEAR SUNBEAMS,—Only a very tiny space for me this week, so I can't say nearly as much as I wanted to. First of all, turn to the last page of THE ROUNDABOUT and read what the Court Gardener tells you about getting your own little garden ready for the Spring. He's going to write to you every month.

Now for this week's competition. I want you to send me in the funniest postcard you can find, either that you have had sent to you, or that you can see in a shop window. It doesn't matter what kind of postcard it is as long as it's funny. Write your age, name, and address on the card you choose, and send it to AUNT HILDA, Court of Queen Sunbeam, 18 Henrietta Street, London, W.C., not later than Tuesday, March 2nd. The prizes are: Twelve boxes of paints for the twelve best entries; and twenty consolation prizes of Jumbo brooches or toy pistols for Sunbeams under 10. So keep your eyes open when you're out, Sunbeams!

Your own AUNT HILDA.

MAKING-UP FOR THEATRICALS.

If you are taking part in amateur theatricals on behalf of charity—and most young folks are just now—you will appreciate this article on the subject of "make-up" by an old "stage-hand."

FIRST of all, study the stage and find out what lights are to be used. For a stage which has both overhead and footlights, you will need a complete make-up. For a stage which has footlights only, the make-up should be slighter, and for one which is lighted—as many concert platforms are—by gas-brackets at the back or lamps set about, you will need only the slightest dust of rouge and powder.

The materials necessary are: A good skin cream for making the foundation; pale pink grease paint; carmine or powder rouge; powder; a black or blue pencil for the eyes; liquid white for arms and neck, and brown pencil for the eyebrows.

Rub a little foundation cream all over your face. Now rub the pale pink grease paint over this, spreading it on smoothly and working it well into the skin. Put on a little dab of carmine on each cheek, and work this in till it fades off at the edges and you cannot tell where it begins or ends. Purse up your lips and press the end of the carmine stick against them. Then smooth off the spot of colour so made, being careful not to work it too far towards the corners of the lips, for this would give you the appearance of a large mouth. Touch the lower and upper lids of the eyes lightly with the blue pencil, but beware of darkening them too much, or this will give you a big-eyed, haggard look. Now dust the face well with powder, giving a touch to your eyebrows with the brown pencil if necessary, and rub liquid white in the neck and hands.

Getting it Off.

For a dry make-up such as looks best on a stage where there are few lights, do not use any grease paints, except on the lips. Rub a very little skin cream on the face, and dust the rouge lightly on the cheeks. Make up the lips as directed above, and powder the face. A very light touch of the pencil on the eyebrows and lids may be effective for those who have blue or grey eyes.

Points to remember:—(1) Go to your dressing-room between the acts and see if a little more powder would improve your appearance. Sometimes, as an actor grows hot, the make-up is inclined to look a little shiny, but a touch of powder will soon put that right.

(2) If possible, make yourself up for the dress rehearsal, so that candid friends may judge of the effect and give you a hint or two if necessary.

To remove make-up do not begin by washing your face. Rub it with a rag on which grease has been smeared till most of the colour has come off. Then wash in warm water.

RECIPE TO DARKEN GREY HAIR.

By a Specialist.

A very satisfactory preparation which darkens grey hair and acts as a corrective agent for dandruff and other diseases of the scalp can be made at small expense and in your own home by dissolving a small box of Orlex Compound in 7 ounces of water and then adding an ounce of bay rum and a quarter ounce of glycerine. Any chemist can furnish these ingredients. This is to be applied once a week until the hair is sufficiently darkened, then every two weeks to keep the hair soft and glossy and the scalp in a healthy condition. It may be used with equal success in darkening the beard. This is a preparation that gives splendid results, both as a hair darkener and as a remedy for all scalp disorders, and is well worthy of a trial. You will find it far superior to the ordinary stock preparations and much less expensive.

OVER 1000 PRIZES FOR READING THIS ONE PICTURE MESSAGE.

HOW TO WIN £50.

ON the opposite page you will find a message written partly in pictures. You may win £50, £20, £10, £5, £3, or £2 for a translation of this puzzle, and even if your entry does not obtain one of these cash prizes, there are over 1,000 Consolation Gifts for distribution. Start right away and do your best to win the first prize. You have just as good an opportunity of securing it as anybody else.

Before you send in your entry read the rules given below, and remember to follow them all carefully. It would be so disappointing for you to forfeit a prize through failing to comply with the conditions.

RULES YOU MUST REMEMBER.

1. Translations of this picture puzzle message must be written clearly in ink on one side of the paper only. No alterations are allowed in the words written, and each translation must be accompanied by the entry form below, which must be correctly filled in with the competitor's full name and address written in ink.
2. Every coupon must have attached securely to it a 6d., 9d., or 1s. 6d. price medallion cut from the wrapper of a packet of Vi-Cocoa, obtainable from all provision stores. Any coupon received without a price medallion will be disqualified.
3. You may send in as many translations of this picture message as you like, but each one must be accompanied by the entry form given below, correctly filled in and with medallion attached as stated in Rule 2.
4. The first prize of £50 will be paid to the competitor from whom the Editress receives a correct (or most nearly correct) translation of this picture message, the correct translation being the original version from which the artist drew the pictures. The other one thousand and eight prizes will be awarded in order of merit.
5. In the event of a tie, a second picture message will be set for tying competitors, or the prize money will be divided at the discretion of the Editress.
6. The Editress of HOME NOTES will accept no responsibility in regard to the loss or non-delivery of any attempts submitted. Proof of postage cannot be accepted as proof of receipt or delivery.
7. Competitors must agree to abide by these conditions, and the Editress's decision in all matters connected with this competition is final and conclusive. No correspondence can be entered into in connection with this competition, nor must letters be enclosed with the translations.
8. All entries must be posted so as to arrive on or before Tuesday, March 16th, 1915. Late entries will be disqualified.

NATURE'S BEST GIFT.

No charm that a woman can possess is so irresistible as a good complexion.

Now this charming gift of nature is not a thing that is unattainable, if only we will adopt Nature's way, which is the health way. The secret of a good complexion is a well-nourished skin. The secret of keeping wrinkles away is the same. Pomeroy Skin Food was perfected by the greatest of all women specialists in complexion health. It is a smooth, fragrant cream. The skin absorbs Pomeroy Skin Food and uses it to feed the cells underneath, the shrinking of which is the cause of wrinkles. But Pomeroy Skin Food (which any chemist sells for eighteenpence) not only prevents wrinkles; it also clears the skin and gives a healthy, brilliant complexion, after only a very little time, if regularly used.

THANKS TO THE QUEEN!

OFF TO AUSTRALIA!

"The Queen's Work for Women Fund" does more than help girls in our own country thrown out of work by the war. It is ready and willing to give a fresh start in other parts to those who are enterprising enough to emigrate. In this article one of the plucky girls tells you all about it.

The girl who tells her story in this article. Aided by "The Queen's Work for Women Fund," she is going to start new work in the Antipodes!

YES! I'm going to Australia this month with eighteen other girls who have been thrown out of work through the war.

I made up my mind to go at a tea-party the British Women's Emigration Association gave in November, when we were told that Australia had sent an invitation to the Queen for five hundred and fifty unemployed girls.

I always wanted to travel, but I knew that even if I could manage the fare, I couldn't afford to get the outfit I should need. But when they said that the Australian Government would take us all the way for £1 if we promised to go into domestic service for one year and to pay £2 out of our wages after we got there, I thought my chance had come! Especially when the Queen's Work for Women Fund offered to pay the £1 for us, and to give us another sovereign to have in our pockets when we landed.

It seemed almost too good to be true when an outfit was promised as well, which the Central Committee on Women's Employment would have made for us in the women's workrooms.

* * * *

Hard Work, but Good Holidays.

My friend wanted to go at once, for she was out of work then. She's a glove maker, and her firm wasn't doing anything. I was expecting to be out of work after Christmas, too. I'm a cashier in a tea-shop, and all our places have been doing so badly that there was a feeling that a good many of us would have to go.

They showed us lime-light pictures of Australia at the tea party, and Louie and I took a fancy to Sydney at once. It looked so bright and somehow home-like, and I said to myself, "never venture never win!" Some ladies who had been in Australia spoke, too, and told us what a wonderful country it is.

Mrs. Laird from New South Wales said that although we would have to work hard, we should have lovely holidays—two half-days every week, and from 2 o'clock till 10.30 or 11 o'clock every other Sunday, with a day and a night off every month. And someone else said that if we could not do housework, it was best to say so, and go as a learner; not be like a photographer's assistant who took a place as first-class cook at 35s. a week and couldn't boil a potato.

Louie and I filled up the application form before we left, and we took home a whole lot of papers and books telling us all about Australia. We've read them all, and I should think we know more about Sydney now than the Association itself!

* * * *

When we Get to Australia.

Louie's been to the museum too, and studied the Australian section, and we've been to another tea-party and heard more ladies tell about the life out there. One lady offered to pay for us to go to classes on how to turn out a room, and how to cook, but I hadn't time to attend them.

My firm's been very good. When they heard that I wasn't to sail till February they kept me on. And Louie got a temporary place in a draper's until Christmas.

Some of our friends wonder at our going to domestic service, and Louie doesn't want her relations to know. People do look down on you here certainly, but they say in Australia a lady would be ashamed not to be able to scrub a floor. I'm quite strong, too. We had to get a doctor's certificate. Altogether, we've signed five papers.

In one we had to say we would be willing to go to the country. I would really rather go to a farm than anywhere else. I lived seven years in the country, and I liked the life, and I think you can save in the country.

Of course, our places are not chosen for us, although the Government promises to find us work at once. When we get to Sydney, the ladies will meet us in one of the Homes the British Women's Emigration Association know about, and we shall be able to take the place we think we can suit best. We're not bound to stay in it for the year, either. We can come back to the Home and get another place.

There's other girls going, too, and they're very nice. Two are shop-girls, and they say they're sick to death of business. They have to spend all their money on food if they want to keep healthy. One is the eldest girl of eleven, and she's been used to housework. Two shorthand typists are going together, and they think they will stay in domestic service even when the year is up. And there's a dressmaker who has been out of work a lot. She is glad of the chance. She said just before she got work at the Queen's workroom, she had only 3s. left to pay the rent. They've sent us all, these clothes from the Central Committee:

1 trunk, 1 ulster, 1 tweed coat and skirt, 2 overalls 2 fine linen aprons, 2 coarse linen aprons, 2 print dresses, 1 alpaca dress, 1 flannel blouse, 3 pairs stockings, 6 handkerchiefs, 1 rough towel, 2 smooth towels, 4 nightgowns, 2 pairs knickers, 4 pairs combinations, 1 brush, 1 comb, 1 tooth brush.

The clothes have been made in three sizes, and they seem to fit us both. They're pretty things, too.

We're to have a good send-off. The night before we sail we are all to meet at the Wortley Hostel, Paddington, when we can get to know the girls, and the matron who is going with us. Then a lot of the ladies, who have arranged the emigration for the Queen, are coming down to the ship to see us off. The Queen does do things nicely, doesn't she?

There is a great satisfaction in packing up nice clothes, and it——is no wonder the would-be emigrant lingers over the task!

OUR NEXT NUMBER.

Order it well in advance from your newsagent, or "Home Notes" may be sold out and you will miss the good things it contains.

YOU will have read all about my splendid new Blouse Scheme on the first page of this number, and much though I should like to go on talking about it—giving away all manner of important secrets—I really will refrain! There are so many other attractive features to mention, too, ready for next week's number, that I should never have enough space if I did not keep to them only.

First of all, I must deliver a message from "The Wise Woman" to you all. "I should like HOME NOTES readers to know," she says, "that I shall be very pleased to read the characters of their soldier and sailor relatives.

"They need not send me a coupon for these delineations—all I want is a few lines in 'his' handwriting. Or if they know of any wounded hero who would be amused by a character-reading I will send it him with the greatest pleasure."

* * * *

Gifts from Home.

So let the "Wise Woman" have a sample of his writing as soon as you can; you will find all further particulars on the last page. It would be a very novel way of making him forget the grim realities of war, wouldn't it?

And, as we are speaking of soldiers and sailors, I must not forgot a very excellent woollen comfort, the making of which I will describe fully in our next issue. The men can never have too many gifts of this sort from home, and it is only a very slight acknowledgment after all, for all they are sacrificing for us.

* * * *

A Little of Everything.

"If You Were Me" is a title with which you are already familiar; this time you are to hear the experiences of an Hotel Manageress, and many novel details of her work. Even more interesting is next week's article in the splendid "Thanks to the Queen" series that is so popular with all my readers; you will learn a great deal about the gentle art of cradle-making whilst reading it, for it is written by an "out of work through the war," who was aided by the "Queen's Work for Women Fund," to take this craft up as a profession.

Blouse fashions are a very special feature next week, and you will hardly know which to choose when you come to picking out one for yourself. Hair-dressing has not been omitted either, and altogether "there is a place for everything and everything has its place," which has, after all, always been the case with your old friend and favourite, HOME NOTES, hasn't it?

A HAPPY MEDIUM—

—for flappers who often have trouble in arranging their pretty locks.

A style that shows off the hair to its very best advantage, and is quite simple to adopt

A FLAPPER'S appearance is nearly always made or marred by her hair, and I regret to say that it is much more often marred than made. Young girls, who have really lovely locks, often fail to make the best of them. It seems to me a perfect shame to see beautiful hair dragged back from the face and scragged into two tight tails; or, on the other hand, to see it fussed and crimped and filled with cheap combs and jewelled pins. Surely it should be possible to hit a happy medium between severity and over-elaboration.

Look at the style shown in the picture. Don't you think it charming? And don't you like the soft, full lines of the locks round the forehead and over the head? These are obtained in a way that is quite original.

* * * * * *

How to Obtain this Effect.

First the hair must be brushed back over the head. Then the top layer of it, so to speak, must be divided from the under part. You can most easily do this by making a light parting behind the ears, and taking only the upper part of the front hair—not the whole mass of it. Brush the rest of the locks smoothly down over the back of the head, and twist them into one thick curl behind.

Now back-comb the under-side of the front hair lightly. Brush the upper side of it perfectly smooth. Wave it back loosely from the forehead, drawing it well down over the ears, and catch it to the back hair by means of a wide clip at the nape of the neck. The ends of the front pieces should be twisted into two little curls.

If you push the clip well up, the hair will bunch out at the back of the head, giving a soft, thick look which is perfectly delightful.

GRAND NEW SERIAL. START IT TO-DAY.

The GIRLS HE LEFT BEHIND HIM

By BERTA RUCK.

"Two's company, three's none," as we all know, and when the two are a handsome young soldier and an adorably pretty but feather-brained little coquette, the poor third feels very much out of it all. But when she is of the stuff Ethel Smith was made of, she keeps a stiff upper lip through the darkest days, and wins through in the end!

NEW READERS START HERE.

"GOOD afternoon. Is Madame Whatshername here?" inquired the fashionably dressed lady who had just alighted from the beautiful grey car. "No—well, then you can do my thingymyjig—I mean my wig, for me."

Poor Ethel Smith, the pretty assistant at the smart Beauty Culture Establishment in Bond Street, smothered a sigh. She had so been wanting to get off punctually at six o'clock to-day for Harry Freeman's birthday party!

Everything has a bright side if you can only manage to find it, and Ethel found that even being kept late when you were aching to get away was not so bad when the customer was as amusing and talkative as this one was. She seemed to take rather a fancy to the pretty, refined-looking girl who attended her so deftly, and when she finally left she gave Ethel her card saying:

"Remember that if you find yourself at a loose end on account of the war, you can come to me!"

Ethel put it hastily into her purse, and in her anxiety to get to her very extra special birthday party, promptly forgot all about it, little thinking how useful that card was going to be to her in the future.

It didn't take her long to get ready for the party when she once got home, for the amusing customer had been so complimentary about her appearance in the black dress that she wore in the shop that she made up her mind not to change it. So in the end she didn't get to the Freemans' house very late—in fact she arrived before the hero of the evening, Harry Freeman, had returned from the City.

Taking her upstairs, Phyllis Freeman introduced her to a pretty girl. It was with a very sinking heart that Ethel noticed the fragile prettiness of Miss Trixie Beresford, for Phyllis Freeman had accompanied the introduction with a murmured aside of "Harry's latest"—words that seemed to poor Ethel like the death-knell of all her hopes. For it must be admitted that pretty Ethel Smith had long ago quite hopelessly and irrevocably lost her heart to dashing young Harry Freeman, and although the young man was quite ready and pleased to have Ethel as a friend, he seemed well content to let matters remain at that.

Soon after this Harry Freeman electrified the whole assembly by appearing in khaki. He told them that he had enlisted that very morning, and now, more than ever, the hero of the party, he settled down to enjoy himself.

But though young Harry seemed to be having a thoroughly good time, poor Ethel Smith didn't enjoy one minute of that evening, for that very fickle youth on whom she had set her affections hadn't a glance for her—he was completely occupied with Miss Trixie Beresford. It seemed that Phyllis Freeman had been quite right when she had said that Trixie was "Harry's latest." Every minute that passed proved to Ethel the truth of this distressing fact.

After the party was over, susceptible young Harry offered to take Trixie home in a taxi, and on the way he took a step he had been contemplating all the evening—he asked the pretty little coquette to marry him; and she, feeling that it would be rather fun to be engaged to a handsome young soldier, accepted him.

Different Ways.

WEEKS later, when Harry's regiment had embarked, there followed the most miserable time she had ever had in her life for poor Ethel Smith. Sometimes she didn't know which she minded most—the fact that the only young man for whom she had ever cared had left England and was risking his life at that problematical address "Somewhere in France," or whether what grieved her most desperately was the other truth, that whatever happened, she had no right to grieve over him. He was another girl's property; he was the fiancé of Trixie Beresford.

It was Trixie's privilege to write to him, to wander round the London shops to find presents for him which were light enough and useful enough to be included in a young soldier's service-kit. It was Trixie's right to knit the helmet and the muffler, the mittens, the socks or the belt which should be the winter comforts for her special soldier among the troops.

As a matter of fact Miss Trixie was not doing any knitting at all.

"A most boring occupation, I call it!" she announced to Harry's rather scandalised sisters the Sunday after Harry's departure, when she came round to the big villa on Parliament Hill to pay what was obviously a duty-call on the rest of the Freeman family. "For one thing, work of any kind always did hurt my eyes"—and she cast those very large and effective orbs in the direction of Harry's father, who was, next to Harry, the most fervent admirer that the pretty, frivolous girl had ever had—"and for another thing one sees in all the shops knitted comforts for the troops—Balaclava helmets, and mufflers, and all the other frightfully stuffy-looking contrivances, all done by machine, ever so much better than one could knit them oneself—and ever so much cheaper.

"Really the finished article only comes to about what you would pay for the wool, now that the horrid stuff has gone and got so dear!"

"Yes—but, Trixie, surely it's rather nicer for a man to feel that his 'girl' has taken trouble about the gloves or the helmet or whatever it is?" protested Harry's sister Phyllis, looking up from the khaki muffler which she was knitting for a special friend of her own in the London Scottish. "Surely he would like it better if he felt that a kind thought for him went specially into every stitch that she took? And besides, I should have thought that the girl herself would have wanted to do it."

"Perhaps she would, if she were a romantic soul like you!" laughed Trixie lightly, leaning back in her armchair and folding her pretty, highly-manicured and idle little hands in her lap.

One of them wore the pearl engagement-ring which it had taken all Harry's spare cash to buy for her before he embarked. "Harry doesn't expect any of that kind of sentimentality from me. Anyhow, he doesn't get it, and he likes me just as well as I am."

The engaged girl, in her dainty blue cloth costume and the soft white furs which she had put on for the first time, looked so bewitchingly pretty as she spoke that even Harry's mother and sisters couldn't help understanding the beloved Harry's point of view.

Mrs. Freeman thought: "She doesn't mean half she says when she speaks in that flippant tone. It's only put on to hide from the rest of us how truly devoted she is to our darling boy. And as for knitting and sewing—well, there'll be time enough for the child to do that when she's my age. She's very young, and she's been brought up to do nothing but amuse herself; so it wouldn't be natural to expect her to settle down soberly and staidly all at once."

Harry's father took an even more lenient view of his charming daughter-in-law-to-be.

He declared that when a girl was as pretty as Trixie, it was absolutely ridiculous to expect her to do anything more than just be looked at, and that as for showing any more affection for Harry than she did, well, he didn't see how a girl could be asked to display much more affection for a young chap than in promising to become his wedded wife, and that, personally, he thought Harry was about the luckiest young fellow in the British Army to have secured such a treasure for the girl he left behind him.

Only Phyllis, Harry's sister, looked a little doubtful as she went on with her Territorial's muffler and said that of course being engaged or in love "did take a girl in different ways."

Bad News.

It certainly took poor Ethel Smith very differently. There was hardly an hour in the day that she was not thinking tenderly and longingly of the absent young soldier who, for one mad moment, she had been encouraged to believe might become her own "special." When she was getting up in her small, comfortless room in her aunt's house at Highgate, when she was speeding, one of a crowd of business-girls, towards the Tube that was to take her to Bond Street, when she was standing behind the glass-fronted counter in Madame Ninon's Beauty Culture establishment, there was not one of these times when the thoughts of the fresh-faced girl were not full of the young man who was no doubt highly commendable in the way that he had come forward to offer his services to his country, and who would doubtless do his bit for that country to the utmost of a fine young Englishman's ability, but who had behaved, on at least one other occasion, as a common or seaside flirt. She could not refrain from buying, out of her scanty shop-assistant's wage, a pound-and-a-half of the finest and softest khaki wool that was to be found on the market, also a pair of bone needles, and thereupon proceeding to knit a scarf, so broad yet fine, so long and yet rollable into such a small ball, that it would have been good enough for the wearing of the young Prince of Wales himself.

"I shall get Phyllis to send it on to him in one of their parcels from Parliament Hill as soon as it's finished," thought Ethel Smith, as she snatched odd moments from her luncheon-hour to add another couple of rows to this superfine scarf. "They needn't tell him whom it's come from, but I am sure it's warmer and more comfortable than anything which could be

TOUCHES OF WHITE.

Many mothers like a little piece of white to show at the neck of a child's coat, and they can get this effect beautifully by having detachable collars and cuffs which can be laundered as frequently as is necessary.

There are three very charming little styles shown in the side drawing.

The top one is made of crash, embroidered with large flowers.

The second one is just plain lawn, tucked for half its depth, and then let free in order to give its shape.

The third is rather a large pointed collar of spotted muslin edged with lace. These sets can be tacked on with very little trouble indeed.

bought; also I am sure that it must make some difference, as Phyllis says, when a girl has knitted so many hopes and thoughts and wishes into a thing—it must bring him luck!"

The experts in this matter decree that scarves for soldiers and sailors should be at least two yards long. This of Ethel's was only half that length on the evening that she went up after her work to the villa on Parliament Hill to inquire if there were any fresh news of Harry. Every time the girl went she suffered tortures of hesitation first. Would it seem as if she were too anxious for tidings of the young man with whom actually she had no concern? Might the Freemans possibly guess her unhappy, girlish secret? But she consoled herself with the thought that after all she was an old friend, and at a time like this it is natural for any old friend to be allowed to take an interest in any news that gets through from the front.

So far his letters to his home had been short,—("He puts all his spare time for letter-writing into his love-letters," Phyllis had explained)—but they had been frequent. He was all right, but he mightn't tell them where he was or what doing. Punch and some daily papers would be a godsend; also they could go on sending cigarettes until the cows came home.

Then there had been a few official postcards, with every sentence crossed out except the mere bare

"I am quite well.

"I have received your letter and parcel.

"I am writing to you shortly."

Each one of these communications poor Ethel knew by heart, merely from having heard them read once through. She hoped so much—she had a presentiment—that to-night there would be a letter or news of some sort. There was news. But it was not of the kind for which she had hoped.

As the girl stood at the door it was opened to her by Phyllis—a strange-looking Phyllis, with white face and eyes red with weeping.

Ethel, in a sudden panic, cried out almost breathlessly, "You've had bad news? News about Harry?"

Phyllis nodded. She opened a door in the hall and drew the other girl into the big empty dining-room—that room never to be forgotten by Ethel Smith, since it had been the scene of Harry's birthday party, when he had looked deep into her eyes as he had touched her glass of golden, bubbling wine, and had murmured, "Here's luck, Ethel!"

Ethel, feeling as if an icy hand clutched her heart, could see the whole picture clearly before her of the young man, well set up and gallant in his new uniform. She could see his laughing face and hear the tone of his voice.

"Come in here," whispered Phyllis. "Mother's in the drawing-room, so frightfully upset that she couldn't see anybody, not even Trixie."

The other girl, white-lipped, demanded hoarsely: "You haven't told me what the news is! Is Harry among the killed?"

Here Harry's sister suddenly dropped her head down on the other girl's shoulder and broke into fresh tears. "It isn't killed. I almost think it's worse!" she sobbed. "Oh, Ethel, the message came through from the War Office yesterday evening: "Lance-Corporal Freeman reported missing." Missing! We can't know what's become of him!"

But Ethel Smith lifted her golden-brown head, and there was hope revived shining in those grey-blue eyes of hers.

"Missing! Then why should you give him up?" she cried, with a little catch in her voice. "I don't believe that means he's killed. He may only have been taken prisoner. One has heard of quite a number of those men already whose relations haven't had a word for months, and then it's turned out that they are in Germany, actually being quite well looked after."

Phyllis said tragically, "Yes, of course there is that hope! But one can't help always fearing the worst. It's all very well for you, Ethel; you aren't his sister; you can't understand!"

Poor Ethel, who was not supposed to have even the right to understand!

"'Lance-Corporal Freeman reported missing.' Missing! We can't know what's become of him!"

"Of course, you're awfully sweet and sympathetic to us," Phyllis Freeman hurried on, "but it can't be the same to you as to us! Oh, the thought of those terrible, terrible months that we may have to wait before we hear another thing about poor Harry!"

Again, poor Ethel! Did it not loom black before her, the thought of those awful months?

But she thought to herself desperately, "No, I shall not give up! I shall go on knitting that scarf for him! I shall go on hoping!"

The Sack.

ABOUT a month after Harry had been reported "missing," since which time no further news had come of him, Ethel Smith, hurrying back to Madame Ninon's Beauty Shop after a hasty tea-shop lunch, caught a glimpse of the girl whom Harry had left behind him, his fiancée, Trixie Beresford.

She was hurrying along Bond Street with an older woman, both prettily dressed, both sparkling and rosy-cheeked from the autumn wind, both laughing, the picture of health and gaiety. And Ethel Smith, just before she turned into the shop to resume her duties of selling cosmetics and hair-tonics and nail-polishers, heard the rather high-pitched voice of Harry's fiancée exclaiming gleefully, "To think that I should have been able to get those lovely furs at such a bargain! Oh, it seems almost too good to be true. All yesterday I could have jumped about for joy!"

She could have jumped for joy! thought Ethel, in bitter bewilderment, as she re-entered the softly carpeted showroom, and yet "Lance-Corporal Freeman is still among the missing." And yet he loves a girl like that, and I, who care for him so much, am nothing to him, nothing at all. Life does seem horribly unfair sometimes!

In the course of the next hour something else had happened to convince poor Ethel of the unfairness of life in general. Towards tea-time she was called into the little inner office by her superior, Madame Ninon, a small, well-preserved little woman, with a kittenish face and a very soft voice, in which she sometimes said uncommonly hard things.

"Oh, Miss Smith, I've some rather bad news about the business," she announced, looking up from her miniature desk as her assistant stood before her. "The fact is there isn't going to be any more business; things are so slack just now. Owing to the war there don't seem to be enough women left to care what becomes of their complexions, or their hips, or their superfluous hairs. As for weight-reducing, one or two of my clients have told me that they've taken off pounds already, merely by skipping about doing refugee work, instead of spending their time and money on my patent waist-puttees. My best American customers are off, and I really don't see why I should keep open any longer, particularly as a friend of mine thinks she can get me in as an assistant matron to a nursing-home for wounded officers. That's the thing!" said Madame Ninon, with her big eyes evidently firmly fixed on the main chance. "That's the opening for a single woman of good appearance nowadays. Because," she added naïvely, "even if one doesn't get married at once to a title or something really thrilling of that nature, there is always a connection to be built up. One can get invitations through the patients to charming country-houses, and it all means business of one sort of another."

"Yes, I see, madam," said Ethel Smith, outwardly demure, inwardly thinking how positively revolting it was to find oneself of the same sex as types of women so absolutely heartless or mercenary as Miss Beresford or Madame Ninon. She thought it must be the same feeling of shame of one's kind as a real man, with a gun, must feel at the sight of some trousered spectator of football who refuses to enlist.

She fought down her disgust at this woman who had, after all, provided her, Ethel Smith, with her bread-and-butter for the last year. And she asked gently, "And should you be taking me with you, madam? As forewoman or secretary?"

"Oh, dear me, no, my child!" said Madame Ninon, very firmly. "If you think for a minute, you will see that that is quite out of the question. Your looks are against you."

"My looks?" faltered Ethel.

Madame gave a little shrewd laugh as she explained. "I took you here, of course, because of your looks—because of your wild-rose skin, and the lights in your hair, and the suppleness of your figure, that customers imagined were all due to my treatment," she said. "But you must see that if my friend and I are going into the wounded-officer business ourselves, we should have no earthly use for a much prettier and younger woman about as a secretary. No, no, Miss Smith. I am very sorry, but it can't be helped. I'm afraid it means the key of the street for you. Here is your week's salary. I'm goiong to get in an accountant to take the whole place over to-morrow, and I shan't be wanting you any longer. You had better apply to me here if you want a recommendation or anything of that sort. It is very unfortunate, but you see there we are. If we're in the soup we're in it, and everybody's got to look out for herself. Good afternoon!"

"Good afternoon!" said Ethel, distinctly dazed over this new development of misfortune.

Poor Ethel! What is she to do now? And to whom can she turn? Next week's instalment will tell you.

HOW TO OBTAIN AN ELEPHANT CHARM.

Perhaps you haven't sent for one yet, but I am sure you want it badly. For who would say "No, thank you" to a run of good luck?

JUST as a white blackbird is a very strange apparition to us, so in Burma and Siam a white elephant is a great cause for wonder. Not only that, it is looked upon as a mysterious and supernatural being—one who must of necessity bring good fortune with it.

No wonder, then, that a favourite mascot in those Eastern countries is a tiny white elephant carved in ivory or bone. Little "gunpati" charms they are called!

And these little lucky elephants are exact replicas of the "gunpati" charms. How do I know? Because a friend living in the East sent me a real "gunpati," and the mascots I am offering you have been copied from mine with great care and precision. They simply can't help bringing you luck!

As I write, a letter lies on my table from a reader to whom I sent one of these lucky charms. "Your little elephant has brought me good fortune already, Isobel," she writes. "It came at breakfast-time, and by the same post I received a letter from the one man I have ever cared for, asking me to marry him! Oh, I am so happy!"

How can you get one, too? Quite simply; you can obtain it in one of these three ways:—

1. You can send six penny stamps to ISOBEL, Elephant Dept., HOME NOTES, 18 Henrietta Street, Strand, London, W.C.

2. You can send three penny stamps and three of the accompanying coupons correctly filled in.

3. Or you can send six of these coupons correctly filled in.

Ask your friends to let you have the coupons out of their papers, and then show HOME NOTES to friends who do not generally read it.

CELLAR GARDENING.

You cultivate your patch of ground diligently, I expect, and perhaps you have window-boxes to look after, too. But I'm quite sure you've never realised what can be done in a cellar before!

A DARK cellar is an invaluable possession during the winter time, when things will not grow out of-doors. There are so many things that can be cultivated in a cellar, and the darker it is the better. The housewife who thinks of starting a cellar garden should not waste any time, but set about it at once.

She should procure sufficient boxes to place in rows across her cellar, so that she can get between and around them. These boxes must be of all sizes, but it is better not to have any too big for moving about, although a row of large ones could be placed against a wall. These will do for the plants that require a certain amount of root space. Have the boxes filled three-parts full of earth, so that they may be ready to use when the time comes. A crop of mushrooms can be grown straight away.

The advantage of mushrooms lies in the fact that, given the necessary conditions, they may be grown all the year round. The usual method of growing mushrooms is to have a large supply of stable manure, but for many reasons this would be difficult to manage in the cellar under a dwelling-house.

* * * *

Preparing the Boxes.

The best plan is to get a boy to gather a bucket full of street droppings. This will cost a penny. Spread this over the top of the earth in the boxes. Three inches of manure will be sufficient. Turn this twice, and then cover with a thin layer of earth.

Water, using a fine rose spray, with warm water, and leave for another day. If the surface feels warm and not too hot, break a brick of mushroom spawn into small pieces and bury in the manure. Water once more, and leave for a few days. This kind of mushroom bed will not bear so abundantly as spawn planted in the usual way, but will yield a good supply of mushrooms, and the bed will last in bearing longer. The boxes must be watered every day or two to encourage the growth of the mushrooms.

The mushroom should be cut just above the ground, the largest being removed and the smaller ones left to develop. Two or three boxes would keep a family supplied with mushrooms, as they are a valuable article of diet, for some time, and when the quantity of mushrooms declined in a box a fresh one should be started. The boxes would afterwards be used for forcing rhubarb ready for the spring.

Rhubarb and sea-kale can be successfully forced in a dark cellar; but this cannot be done until the roots have felt the frost, so leave them in the garden till required. The method usually employed is to select good, large roots, and, as soon as the weather gets cold, to dig these up and leave them exposed to the frost for a few days; then, when the frost gives place to a fine, bright day, take the roots down into the cellar and plant them.

It is quite an easy matter to procure the necessary boxes, and the growing of your plants is almost as simple.

The foolish plants will imagine that the winter is passed, and will soon commence to send up long, thin, blanched leaves, which will be found very useful when fruit and vegetables are scarce. But the supply will depend upon the size and strength of the roots. If these are good, the resulting crop ought to be good, too.

When the roots are exhausted, they can be planted in a waste corner of the garden, but they will not bear much in the way of leaves for some time. As a rule, the roots are thrown away; but, if one root shows a good result from forcing, I am of an opinion that it would be an advantage to plant it out in some good ground, and, if it recovers, use it to produce a set of roots that will make useful ones for forcing in a couple of seasons' time. If there is no garden, it is better to throw the old roots away, as they are no use for further forcing.

To Grow Potatoes.

No earth is required for these, and the cellar must be absolutely dark. Procure a supply of large old potatoes. The larger the potatoes, the better the crop will be. The old potatoes must be from last year's crop, and if they have tiny sprouts, so much the better. Lay the potatoes upon the floor or on shelves. They should be quite separate, and at least 9 inches apart. Do not touch them after placing them in position.

In a few days the potatoes will send out shoots, and, because there is no light, these shoots will not turn into plants, but will use up the nourishment in the old potatoes to form tiny fresh tubers.

It is a wise law of Nature that each plant must, if possible, produce either seeds or bulbs to carry on its vegetable life, and the potato does its best at the sacrifice of its leaves. The tiny potatoes should be picked as soon as they are as big as large marbles. Leave the very smallest, and take care not to injure the roots to which they cling.

The old potatoes selected must be perfectly sound at the start. A gentle spraying with a little warm water is an advantage, but this must not be done unless the surplus water can drain away at once, and not rot the potatoes.

DON'T BE A SCANDALMONGER.

Some people seem to think that talking scandal doesn't matter as long as it's only about well-known people, and not about their own personal friends. The writer of this article, though, thinks that it does matter very much, and wants you all to make a very belated New Year's resolve "to speak no slander—no, nor to listen to it."

Don't get into the habit of repeating little casual bits of unfavourable criticism—you may unwittingly hurt your hearers very much indeed.

LAST night Vera and I went to a concert in aid of the Belgian Relief Fund. It was only a local affair, but one very well-known soprano, who happens to live in our district, had consented to sing. I'd never heard her before

"She's wonderful!" I said. "Mustn't it be grand, Vera, to have a voice like that? And she looks such a nice sort of woman, too—not a bit affected."

"Yes, but do you know, I've heard she isn't at all nice really," said Vera. "I've heard that she drinks. Pity, isn't it? But then they say that so many of these singers——"

And she rambled on fluently, while I reflected with a sigh that I might have known better than say such a thing to a girl like Vera. For, kind and jolly as she is, she has a most unfortunate habit of repeating discreditable bits of gossip about celebrities big and small—from crowned heads to pretty chorus girls.

She would never think of saying unkind things against people she actually knows—she would call that "scandal." But she maintains that it doesn't matter how you speak of the folk you have never met. She says it can't make the smallest difference to them—they'll never come to hear of it, and anyway they've won their positions for good and all. "Besides," she will often add, "it's only what I've heard, mind you—there may be nothing in it. But it's rather queer, isn't it?"

* * * *

The Harm it Does.

I used to laugh at this trick of Vera's, until one day I happened to be with her when she was relating some silly rather ill-natured (also, I am sure, quite unfounded) story about a very great personage indeed. There was a quiet-looking old lady in the room, who went quite pink with surprise.

"My dear," she said, "I am sorry to hear that. I always thought such a great deal of her. But no doubt what you say is true, as you have it from such a reliable source. I am afraid I shall never feel quite the same towards her again."

"Oh," stammered Vera, "I don't mean to say that I actually had it direct from Lord S——. Only—only from someone who knows him very well."

She had really read it in a rather common little weekly paper, but she couldn't own to the truth with those innocent old blue eyes looking so regretfully at her above the wrinkled pink cheeks.

"Oh, well, perhaps it may be wrong," said the old lady.

But I seemed to see something lose its brightness in that old lady's mind—and I knew that it would for ever remain a little dimmed and dull. For the silly story would get between her eyes and the radiance, blurring it like a mist of tears that will not be blinked away.

* * * *

An Underbred Habit.

Do you see what Vera is doing? She is not perhaps harming the great folk of whom she prattles so lightly, but she is spoiling the dreams of her hearers. When she goes to the theatre with her youngest sister, and tells her that the debonair hero, whom small Maggie secretly adores, "isn't very nice really," she is putting to death a girl's ideal; which means death also to the ideals of the many schoolfellows among whom Maggie is likely to repeat the careless phrase.

I think that is a great pity. And it also seems to me rather an underbred habit to speak disparagingly of people who will never meet you face to face and refute what you have said—it is something like writing anonymous letters, don't you think so?

After all, there is nothing clever in knowing a lot of "anecdotes"—either good or bad—about, say, Lord Kitchener or your favourite novelist—and there is no merit in spreading them abroad. They may or may not be true—probably "not." Shall we try to make up our minds to keep our mouths shut over malicious little stories, even when they concern people whose position they can't possibly affect?

The subjects of our gossip may never hear of what we say of them, but our stories do harm all the same. For they are helping to put out warm wee fires of affection and admiration in hundreds of simple hearts; and it is these wee fires all burning together that make up the world's goodwill.

to all wives is LI-NOLA. It is the only floor covering to lighten the housework and brighten the home. Instead of hours of drudgery, LI-NOLA brings hours of ease; instead of beating carpets or scrubbing oilcloth and cheap grade linoleums, get LI-NOLA and no scrubbing or beating is necessary. It can be kept "clean as a new pin" without such heart-breaking labour as scrubbing or beating. Every busy thoughtful housewife wants to be rid of such drudgery and worry. LI-NOLA is the relief. Yes, and LI-NOLA is so durable, too that many years will come and go before you require a new floor covering. Consider the amount of trouble and money that saves. Annual upsettings to lay or "turn round" the poor wearing floor covering give place to permanent restfulness when LI-NOLA is once laid. Have one room covered as an experiment, and we're certain you will be so glad that you will give orders for other rooms to be covered. THOSE FASHIONABLE WINGS.

A few useful hints on the arrangement of the smart little feather mounts which everyone is wearing this year.

EVERY girl who wants to trim a hat for herself this winter naturally buys a pair of wings, thinking that they are so very easy to sew into place and arrange. Well, so they are in one way, but in another they are difficult things, because, unless you sew them correctly, they will very soon work loose and look untidy, or blow away altogether.

In the first place, you must remember that it is not a good plan to sew through the fluffy, paddy part at the base of the wing if you can help it. This is nearly always artificially made from little bits of fluff stuck down on to a muslin or cotton foundation. If you stitch through this you will disarrange the fluff and spoil the look of the wing altogether.

You should hunt for the stem on which the wing is mounted. You will generally find an end of wire curled up inside, and you can very often pull this out to make a piece which will bore right through the hat and curl up again inside. If you can do this you will have gone a long way towards steadying your feather and keeping it perfectly secure.

These wings are made of fluted velvet, an look exceedingly well on a high-crowned hat.

Sew the stem as strongly as ever you can; then turn the hat wrong side up and stitch from the inside, catching the stem in with each stitch, but never putting your needle right through if you can help it.

Big wings made of silk or velvet like those shown in the picture need to be sewn very strongly indeed, or they will blow away. Do them in thread or double silk which matches them exactly if possible. Remember that all your stitches must go in near the base; you must not try to sew the fluffy tips, even if they happen to lie on the material of the hat.

Do not try to put the wings on with mathematical exactitude, or they will look horrid; put the root at the centre or exact side where you wish it to be, but let the ends go pretty much as they please. If you drag them up and down, and try to make them exactly even at both sides, you will take all the freshness out of them, and they will be battered-looking before you have worn the hat at all.

Very big white wings are exceedingly fashionable this year, and I expect a great many of my readers have hats decorated with them. I am afraid that these wings will get soiled very soon, if they are much worn in smutty towns, but that does not matter, as they can so easily be cleaned. Sprinkle the wings thickly with powdered magnesia, and put them away for a couple of days. Then shake out the powder, and it will bring off the dirt with it, leaving the wings almost as good as new.

A delightful way of arranging a pair of wings on a small hat — nothing stiff about them, is there?

WHITE LIQUID PETROLEUM

THE SAFEST AND BEST APERIENT

Vaseline

ODORLESS - - AND - - TASTELESS

WHITE Liquid "Vaseline" has been used for many years with the utmost satisfaction, both by physicians and surgeons in the treatment of various diseases. Recently it has attracted world-wide attention by its use as a mechanical lubricant in chronic and general constipation and stasis. It has also proven valuable for the relief of old and stanling adhesions and many diseases pertaining to the stomach, alimentary canal and intestines, as well as for use in abdominal surgery and in chronic and rheumatoid Arthritis.

By lubricating the passages and the intestinal tract, the White Liquid "Vaseline" offers a sure relief in cases of Flatulence and Dyspepsia. It assists an overtaxed system to free itself of undue burdens, to assimilate nutriment from food, and to expel the wastes and poisons of the body in a perfectly free and healthy manner, and is a useful aperient which may be safely employed for the youngest of infants. White Liquid "Vaseline" is the original liquid paraffin so widely used and recommended by the medical profession.

It cannot be too strongly urged that all due precaution is necessary in employing any curative agent internally. Hence it is well worth while insisting upon the Chesebrough Company's White Liquid "Vaseline."

In bottles, 1/-, 1/9, and 2/6.

BUSINESS AS USUAL!

Many a servant thoroughly enjoys the upheaval of spring-cleaning.

A homely little article which will help you to make your war-time spring-cleaning a thorough success.

By ELIZABETH STUART LANGFORD.

If the mistress is wise she will adopt regular spring-cleaning attire to keep the dust at bay!

THE time for spring-cleaning is close upon us, and in many thousands of homes women-folk, whose lives for months past have been clouded with anxiety and dread, are asking themselves if it is possible this year to go through with the usual processes. How, they ask, can we begin the orthodox sweeping, scrubbing, polishing, and "doing up," and go on with it day after day just as we did when we knew that our dearest dear would be coming home in the evening to grumble a little and joke a great deal at the inevitable upheaval?

A Ready Answer.

The answer, as it seems to me, is not far to seek. All the worrying in the world cannot bring our men-folk back from the war, but it can surely be believed that those women who are staying quietly at home, and always thinking hopefully of their beloved ones, are being far and away more helpful to the brave men at the front than are those who give themselves up to the mournful luxury of fretting and worrying, and imagining the worst of all evils.

* * * *

The Chimney Sweeping.

And now, having cleared the way, we will begin our spring-cleaning.

There are two points which must be settled quite a fortnight before the actual cleaning begins. The first is the matter of the extra help which is usually got in for the occasion.

One good-tempered little maid of my acquaintance has put in a special petition that she and she alone shall work right through the business with "missus." "We can do it lovely," she says, with a special emphasis on the "we," and she even suggests that it will be as good as a holiday to spend all the days in her mistress's company.

If you are happy enough to possess a willing and devoted little maid like that I strongly advise you to manage with her alone. She may not have mature strength, but see how willing she is to put forth what strength she has! She is ready also to agree that your way is better than her way, and she will have a certain pride of possession that can never come to the charwoman who has a dozen or more "places," and delights in comparing them one with another.

The second matter has to do with the chimneys. Be sure and order the sweep early so that he may come to you the week before you upset your house. Do not make any extra preparation for him. If he knows his work he will make no more mess than you can guard against with a big hearth-cloth and a couple of dust-sheets.

* * * *

Cleaning Out Drawers and Cupboards.

Your first real duty with regard to the cleaning should be the thorough turning out of every drawer, wardrobe, cupboard, and box in the house.

Drawers and shelves should be washed out with hot water, in which a sufficient quantity of powdered soap or best quality soft soap has been dissolved.

In the case of drawers or shelves made of polished wood, wipe them thoroughly clean with a cloth wrung out of hot water, dry with a soft cloth, and afterwards paint over with spirits of turpentine, applied with a medium-sized flat brush. This same treatment is also specially good for trunks and boxes, for moths and marauding insects abhor the pungent odour of turpentine.

* * * *

Turning Out the Rooms.

The old-fashioned plan of beginning at the top of the house and working right down to the bottom of the stairs, then going on with the sitting-rooms and finishing up with hall, kitchen, and scullery cannot be bettered.

Beginning, then, with the bedrooms: First fold up blankets and sheets and carry them to another room (the blankets will get their annual washing when the spring-cleaning is over), remove the calico covers from hair mattress and pillows, and thoroughly brush the mattress, going well into the crevices of the leather tags. Beat the pillows with the hands, and brush the covering tick. Then, if you can manage it, carry mattresses and pillows into the garden and let them have five or six hours' sunning.

Now take up the carpet, roll it neatly, and carry it down to the yard or garden. It is scarcely wise, if you have no outside help, to spend further time on the carpet so early in the day.

Clear the walls of pictures and curtains. The pictures should have the loose dust removed from them, and, if the bedroom is a small one, it will be better to take the pictures to the bathroom and clean them there later in the day. Long curtains should be well shaken and set aside for washing, cleaning, or dyeing at home. Muslin or voile short curtains can be put to soak ready for washing, drying, and ironing in the late afternoon.

* * * *

Cleaning the Wall-Paper.

Next clean the wall-paper, following one of the two methods here given. The first and simplest way is to sweep it well with a Turk's head, or with a broom tied over with a duster. The second way is to rub the paper with crumb of bread, taking two widths of paper at a time and working from ceiling to floor.

If you have done without an underfelt up to now, do learn to look on the possession of one as a necessity and not a luxury. It will treble the life of your carpet!

Having finished the walls, sweep all the dust to the fireplace, then, while the little maid is giving the grate an extra good cleaning, turn your attention to the toilet-service and china ornaments. Wash these in hot soapy water, and afterwards clean the marble and tiles of the washstand. Stack all the clean things on the marble slab, and cover them over with a dust-sheet.

Next clean the paint. If it is enamelled it should need little or no scrubbing. Very bad stains may be removed by means of one of the many good paint-soaps which are so much advertised.

The windows should not be cleaned until after the paint is finished.

* * * *

The Trouble That Might Have Been Spared.

Your next business is the washing of the floor. If the carpet has been protected by an underfelt the boards will need plenty of water but no hard scrubbing. I only hope that you will not have cause to share the dismay of the mistress of the good-tempered little maid I told you about. Her carpet, which had been down scarcely nine months, was found to be stained almost through by the black dust that had drawn up through the cracks of the boards. Another month, and those disfiguring stripes would have shown right through on the face of the carpet.

Underfelts should be considered not a luxury but a necessity; and it must always be remembered that if the woollen felt is too expensive, excellent paper felts are obtainable at a few pence per square yard.

* * * *

Now for the Polishing.

Nothing is better for the bedstead and wire mattress than a good brushing and dusting; then go over the polished parts with a cloth dipped lightly in furniture cream.

This is my first mention of furniture polish, and I want to give you a recipe that was sent to me, as a very special favour, by a manufacturer.

Dissolve two ounces of Castile mottled soap in three-quarters of a pint of boiling water. Take two ounces of bees-wax, shred it finely, put it in a large jar with one quart of turpentine. Leave in a warm place until it is melted, giving it a shake now and again, and then very gradually blend the soap and the turpentine by shaking them together. The turpentine, being a spirit, must be kept well away from the open fire during the whole process.

I rather wish I had not to send you and the little maid down just now to see about the carpet, for to beat and clean it properly requires stronger arms than either yours or hers. I think, perhaps, you may be able to enlist the services of a man or a big strong boy, to help you with this.

When the carpet is clean take it upstairs ready for relaying when the floor is quite dry; then clean and re-hang the pictures, and after that bring back the mattress and the bedding and make the bed.

If you are a really clever little housewife you will get through to this point by about three o'clock. It will now be prudent for you to change your gown and rest for just a wee while. Afterwards, while your little maid is dressing herself and preparing tea, you can polish the furniture and clean the mirrors. Everything will then be ready for the final straightening of the room.

There are crowds of other things which I should have loved to include in this homely talk, but already I have over-stepped my space limit. The most I can do is to give you one last little bit of advice.

Do not run about too much from room to room, and do not shift things unnecessarily. For instance, when you come to the drawing-room, proceed exactly as I have advised in the bedrooms, and, when the carpet is up and the floor swept, clear a space for washing your china ornaments, and do them there in the room rather than carry them into the kitchen. It is by such simple little precautions that you not only save yourself and your little maid endless journeys, but you also quite frequently prevent the smashing of some treasured ornament that you "would not have had broken for worlds."

A large table covered with newspaper makes the best place for washing and drying your china ornaments.

"BOTHER THE BLINDS!"

You'll be saying that, too, but not after you've read these suggestions.

"SPRING cleaning is going to be worse than ever this year, now that every penny counts so much. I don't feel as if I dare spend money on sending the linen blinds to the cleaner's, as usual. I can do the Venetians myself, but——"

"And the others, too, if you only go the right way to work," Aunt Mary, with whom I was having tea, interposed in her quiet way. "I do all my blinds at home; it saves such a big cleaner's bill. It's not very much trouble, either.

"If a blind is not much soiled, I lay it flat on the table, sprinkle it with powdered bath-brick, and rub very thoroughly with a wad of clean flannel, one side at a time. Then I give the blind a shaking and hang it in the open air to dry."

"But my linen blinds are not merely slightly soiled," I protested, "they're downright dirty!"

"You can wash them," went on Aunt Mary, "in this way. Don't take each blind off its roller, but lay it on a clean table, take a small hard scrubbing brush and well scrub the blind with a mixture of warm soapsuds and liquid ammonia. Be careful not to have the brush too wet, as you can't scrub properly if you swamp the blind with water.

"When the stuff seems clean, wipe off all suspicion of soap with a sponge dipped in lukewarm water, and hang the blind in a shady place out of doors. Be careful that it is put straight on the line, or it is sure to dry crookedly. When almost dry take it down, lay it flat on the table again, cover it with an old sheet or tablecloth, and pass a very hot iron quickly over—in fact, you'll spoil the blinds if you fiddle long over them. And, of course, Venetians are easy enough to clean," she added suggestively.

I begged for hints at once. There was no special secret, the old lady said, but she owned that there was a right and a wrong way.

"Don't let your Venetians get very dirty before you clean them, or your task won't be so easy," she cautioned. "The way to go to work is to pull down a blind and straighten all the laths. Then make a bowl of soapsuds with shredded white soap, powdered borax, and warm water. With a small penny sponge you must thoroughly wipe over each lath separately, then rinse with a second sponge and lukewarm water, and finally wipe dry with a clean towel.

"If the laths look dull afterwards, a little furniture polish will freshen them wonderfully. It is a good plan to wipe the blind cords with an oiled rag—this makes them much less liable to break."

"And the tapes?" I murmured reminiscently.

"If you must wash them, scrub with a hard brush moistened in soapsuds and ammonia, and then rinse in tepid water. But don't do this at all unless it's absolutely necessary, for the tapes nearly always shrink afterwards."

TOUCHES THAT TELL.

It is sometimes very difficult to tell a person's character from the face or voice, but there are often little, unconscious movements or tricks which "give the show away" and reveal character at a glance to an understanding eye.

PEOPLE who have a habit of putting up the hand to the mouth, of twisting or rubbing the lips or merely of pressing on them with the fingers, are nearly always nervous, undecided, and a trifle weak. A strong and determined person almost invariably keeps his hands right away from his face. Tricks of shading the eyes, or propping up the chin on the hand, though not indicating such decided weakness as that of touching the lips, do not show strength as a rule.

You see, the habit is almost invariably formed, at the start, as a sort of screen or a means of gaining time. The undecided person does not know what to reply when a sudden question is put to him, and, instinctively, his hand goes up to his mouth in order to cover the fact that his lips are not quite ready to form an answer.

* * * *

The Habit of Touching the Face.

The habit of shading the eyes is often to be found in a person who wishes, for one reason or another, to hide his real thoughts or feelings, and is afraid that his eyes, if seen, may reveal them. The habit of propping the chin on the hand is a less decided indication of any special turn of mind, but it is a strange fact that the whole desire to touch the face with the hands nearly always accompanies a certain amount of want of self-control. People who have themselves perfectly under discipline very seldom do it.

A habit of crossing the left foot or knee over the right when sitting at ease, is said to indicate general vitality and good health. A habit of leaning on the left arm, or turning to the left rather than to the right—without being actually left-handed—is said to be a good sign. People who are a little run-down or out of health, or people whose nerves are not in excellent condition, very often become clumsy and weak on the left side, and will instinctively move and use the right hand and foot rather than the other.

The Touch that Tells.

A habit of looking at a person before speaking to them is nearly always found in subtle and commanding men. One who can manage others without letting them know that they are being managed, one who can mould others to his wishes and gain for himself whatever position he desires, will often have this habit of giving a long, quiet look into the face of the person speaking to him before making any answer. He has self-control enough to sum you up and take stock of you before he says anything; and you may be certain that his answer, when it comes, will be just exactly the right one for you.

DON'T BE OBNOXIOUS—

And if any of your relations show signs of any of these failings, warn them off if you can. They will thank you in the end.

PERHAPS the most obnoxious of all annoying people is the lightning calculator, or the arithmetical rebuker—call her which you will, for she is both! Your husband takes away his favourite ha'porth to read in the train, but leaves you your own special paper. It's a war luxury and a necessity! The L.C. comes, and sees you reading it.

"Surely, my dear, you are not taking an extra paper!" she begins. "Why, a ha'penny a day is threepence a week, and threepence a week is thirteen shillings a year! In five years that would be five guineas! For five guineas you could . . ."

* * * *

She Means Well!

She finds you waiting for a tram to the station, and it's—"Why, surely you don't take the tram? I always walk. Fourpence a week is one and fourpence a month, and one and fourpence a month is seventeen and fourpence a year! In ten years that would be nearly nine pounds! Think what you could do with nine pounds!"

You are paralysed. She makes you feel that you are robbing your husband, your home, and your children. She means well, but she is obnoxious! For a whole day you hate her, and then forgive her!

Then there's the child teaser. She's nearly as bad. "Hullo, Babsie!" she cries. "Would Babsie like a sweetie—such a nice little sweetie?"

Babsie eagerly puts out a chubby hand. And then the obnoxious person draws back, and says archly: "Ah, but I haven't got any! No sweeties for Babsie to-day. Bad for Babsie's toothies!"

* * * *

The "Show-you-up."

What Babsie thinks I don't know! For myself, as Babsie's mother, I think the child teaser wants smacking!

Then there's the show-you-up. You have a little tea-party—nice, dainty, but economical.

"Yes, I'll have another piece of cake, please," she says gaily. "Aren't these wonderful cakes for fourpence ha'penny? Quite worth sevenpence, I'm sure! . . . Oh, and how delightful! You've nut butter! So stupid to call it margarine, isn't it, and be prejudiced? . . ."

She rattles on, meaning well, but dragging the veil ruthlessly aside, until you're bound to decide that she's perfectly obnoxious!

JUST THE HAT YOU'RE WANTING.

If you haven't already got a little hug-me-tight hat, I know you won't be able to rest till you have copied the one shown in the photographs. It costs under five shillings, and in this article its fair inventor describes exactly how she made it.

Isn't it a dear, perky little shape, and doesn't it look smart and "military"?

EVERYBODY wants to look a wee bit "military" these days, but it is not everyone who can wear the real Glengarry cap. If you are one of the people who can't, I am sure you will be delighted with the fetching little hat shown you in the photographs.

You will want ¾ yard velveteen (satin would do equally well), ¼ yard black buckram, ¾ yard jap silk (for the head lining), 2½ yards moiré ribbon 1 inch wide, and 1 yard of moiré ribbon ½ inch wide, and then you can set to work.

You must first cut out your brim in buckram, according to the pattern. It should fit closely to the head.

* * * *

The Hat in the Making.

Next, cut the brim out in velvet, making it rather larger than the buckram so as to allow for turnings. Turn the buckram in an inch all round at the bottom, and then join the two ends together. You can then see if it is comfortable to your head and you will be able to make any slight alterations necessary. Snip the turned-in edge of the buckram in several places so that it shapes to the head. Then proceed to cover the shape with the velveteen. This is the most important part of the whole thing, because if the velveteen does not lie flat the hat will look home-made, so you must not mind spending a little time in tacking.

The hat seen from the right is equally fascinating, with its soft folds of velvet.

Begin by tacking the velveteen within ½ inch of the lower edge of the brim, and then about the same distance from the upper edge. Turn in the velveteen at the bottom and sew to the lower edge of the buckram, slightly easing it. Then turn in the velveteen at the top of the brim, pressing it up from the bottom to get it smooth. Stitch the velveteen at the top of the buckram as close to the edge as you can. Then take the narrow moiré ribbon and bind all along the top. You will find it easiest to begin by sewing it first to the wrong side, and then turn over and secure it to the right side with tiny stitches. The chief thing is to keep the ribbon very taut, and mitre the corners nicely. This disposes of the brim for the time being, and the rest is comparatively simple.

You must now cut out your crown in velveteen and gather it round within a ¼ inch of the edge. Measure carefully all round the top of the brim and draw your velveteen to the same size. Arrange the gathers evenly; then fit the crown into the top of the brim, of course putting the longest part from back to front. You must then stitch it from the inside to the velvet that has been turned in at the top of the brim.

Making the Rosette.

You have now only got the rosette and bow left to tackle. Of course, you can make any kind of rosette you like, but the one in the photograph was done in the following way: Cut a round of buckram 2 inches in diameter. Pleat the ribbon round the edge, make two little flat bows and sew in the middle to fill up the gap. From the centre of each bow leave a loose end about 3 inches long.

Then sew the rosette firmly to the broad brim, rather towards the back, as it is in the photograph. With the same ribbon as you used for the rosette make a small bow and sew on the other side of the brim to hide the join in the velveteen.

Line your hat and you will have as smart a little confection as you could possibly wish for.

THE LAST CRUST.

By MAY WYNNE.

The story of two brave deeds, and two superb sacrifices. It would be hard to say which was the greater of the two.

"BREAD!" demanded the man hoarsely. "Bread! I'm starving!" He reeled as he spoke, leaning against the doorway. It was a tragic figure to be standing there in the sunlight, with flowers at its feet, and the picturesque surroundings of the little cottage there on the outskirts of the wood, with half-a-dozen black-eyed children crowding around their mother, looking in wonder at the tattered, khaki-clad stranger, whose cheeks were gaunt, his chin unshaved, his whole frame bowed by exhaustion in spite of a fierce fighting light in his blue eyes.

Marie Lechard, a wan little woman who bore herself heroically, saw only too plainly that the man spoke truth. He was fainting with fatigue and hunger, this poor one, who, in spite of his dilapidated appearance, was undoubtedly one of those brave English who had come to France to pay the price of friendship.

Ah, the good English! The heroes over whose great deeds she had thrilled and wept, wondering, however, whether there would soon be any of them left to drive back the Germans who were simply devils. Oh, yes, simply that!

Richard Tallant leaned back against the doorway, crushing unheedingly against the delicate vine tendrils. He was eating bread, breaking off great pieces of the half loaf in his hand and thrusting them into his mouth quite heedless of the fact that he was being watched with absorbing attention by six pairs of black eyes.

Never, never had the soldier tasted food so good as that, nor drunk cold water with such gusto. Bread and water! What? Would you call that prison fare? I tell you, if Dick Tallant had ever heard of nectar and ambrosia he would have vowed that the meal he had just devoured beat the food of the gods hollow.

As it was, he passed his torn sleeve across his mouth and heaved a mighty sigh. It was the sigh of a man content to regain his strength.

And the mist obscuring his vision had cleared, he no longer needed to crush bruised vine tendrils, but stood upright on the cottage path, grinning friendly-wise down at the six little black-eyed Frenchies who stood still, staring at him in a kind of awe and reproachful wonder.

"I could do with some more of that top-hole pang of yours, missus!" he explained almost gaily to the wan little mother, who appeared to him in the guise of a bantam hen surrounded by her bantam chicks.

Marie Lechard did not know English—at least only a few words picked up here and there from passing soldiery, but she could not misunderstand.

With a sigh she spread out her hands, moving aside to show the room behind her.

"Monsieur sees," she explained, "il y a rien de plus." She shook her head vigorously. "Not more," she added haltingly. "Not at all."

It was true that the dish on which the half loaf had stood was bare saving for a few crumbs.

The black-eyed children saw, too, and sighed—such quaint, expressive sighs as brought shame to the soldier's heart.

"Yew don't mean to say," he ejaculated, "that I've eaten the whole blooming lot?"

The little woman tried hard to explain further. "Monsieur, Engleesh soldier," she said. "Monsieur ver' welcome! With heart welcome! We give gladly. Demain, nex' day, Germans defeated. Friends come. We have bread."

The black-eyed children were as attentive listeners as their visitor. There was sighing and whispering amongst them at their mother's triumphant conclusion.

One is anxious to know more certainly whether the food so lightly alluded to is to arrive to-morrow or the day after.

Dick Tallant was appalled. In his extremity he had devoured the two day's provisions of this family in about as many minutes. No wonder the black-eyed bantam-chicks regarded him with the awe one might give to an ogre.

But what is done is done.

The bread was gone, and Dick had not even the power to explain his regret, his gratitude, his indebtedness. As for Marie Lechard, she had the supreme gift of generosity. She could not have understood the grudge of necessity.

Richard Tallant turned away at last with tears stinging in his eyes and a great admiration in his heart. The French peasant had taught him a lesson such as one can never learn too often.

As for Marie Lechard, she stood at her gate smiling after the brave Englishman as though there were no such thing as hunger in the world; whilst, if the children did not smile, be sure they did not complain; and through the shade of what seemed interminable woodland, Dick Tallant swung on his way. He had strength now to reach the Allies' lines—strength and courage. Pshaw! It made him mad to think that such necessities for a soldier depended in part on a half loaf of bread. Aha! Dick's ears were sharp now, his eyes keen. What moved down there in the valley? What crept upwards in a solid, grey-green mass along the hill-side?

"Germans," mused the soldier as he halted under the tree. "Germans. And they're coming this way."

He thought rapidly, with every pulse and all his wits alert.

By skirting to the right he could easily escape observation and the more certainly reach his own lines. But he must make haste

"They'll pass that cottage for certain," muttered Dick. "Dead sure that is, and——"

He gritted his teeth, since he had seen just about enough of German devilries in an experience which embraced the fighting round Mons.

Personally he was of the opinion that devils would be ashamed to be classed with Prussians and Uhlans, but at present there was no word coined to be sufficiently expressive.

And he thought of a brave little peasant woman who had smiled so generously in giving her last crust.

That deed had been somehow heroic—and those six queer little black-eyed souls had never squealed or whimpered at the thought of going supperless.

Richard Tallant realised that it wasn't just the moment to be thinking of personal safety when he had a debt to pay. A second later he was racing back for all he was worth. Yes—even faster than he raced at Mons when it was a question of avenging butchered comrades. For a man's legs may be moved by a world of motives.

There are times when eloquence of speech is unnecessary.

When Marie Lechard saw that ragged man in khaki come racing up to her door she knew instinctively what was going to happen. Before he could cross the threshold she was there to meet him, her cheeks blanched in the fear that forgot itself in anguish for the little ones who clung to her skirts.

"Les Allemands!" she gasped.

The French of Private Tallant got as far as that.

"Yes—Germans," he nodded. "Comin' up the hill. Ken I 'elp with this little lot?'

He swung the smallest but one of the brood on to his shoulder, whilst Marie — woman-like — rushed back into the house, shrilly screaming to the elder children. She had gone—poor soul—to collect her household gods. Who shall count the roll of those who have perished in the like attempt?

The Englishman's impatient summons brought this poor soul back, trembling; great as was her admiration, she had awe too, for her deliverer.

But to her surprise, on reaching the porch laden with a stout cloth filled with the most heterogeneous of collections, she found the soldier proceeding in a most extraordinary fashion. "Voyee, missus," he roared — being no exception to those who believe that the louder they talk the more plainly they will be understood. "I m goin to set light to this here 'appy little home. If I don't do it those cussed sausage eaters will: but they'll be lookin' around fust! If they see this blazin' before and they'll be thinkin 'some of their own kidney hev bin marchin' along, and'll be nippy in followin' on. Size up? Comprenee?"

Poor Marie Lechard. It is not to be supposed that she understood one word of this speech, but the crisis and Dick Tallant's pantomimic action assisted a naturally keen wit.

With a piteous little cry she snatched up the smallest of the black-eyed ones, hugging it to her.

"Oui, oui, monsieur," she cried. "It is true—quite true!"

She said no more, but there was something superb in her faith as she watched the gaunt soldier, who, to her, was a total stranger, light a handful of thatch torn from the roof and then thrust it back under the eaves.

Yes, she trusted him. Was he not English? To the women of France in these times, it appeared impossible that an English soldier could be less than heroic.

It was not till the fire had a thorough hold of the little cottage that Private Tallant turned.

"Now then," he said briskly, "we've got to clear right hout."

His blue eyes kindled as he lifted the awed Jeannette on his shoulder.

It was the woman who led now, chattering in breathless staccatos all the while. Two of the children were crying, whilst the elder girl—a miniature mother with black pigtails hanging down her back, tried to comfort them.

A small boy marched ahead hugging a white kitten.

And, in spite of the growing crackle of the flames, the sound of approaching soldiery could be

In spite of the growing crackle of the flames, the sound of approaching soldiery could be only too plainly heard; Private Richard Tallant's heart ached for this little family, so brave, so desolate.

only too clearly heard, whilst, in the distance, came the desultory booming of guns.

The grimness of it all impressed even the stolid imagination of Private Richard Tallant, whose heart ached for this little family so helpless, so brave, so desolate.

He cursed the Germans roundly, and then fell to chuckling approval as Marie Lechard showed him a safe refuge in a cave hidden in a steep bank, and screened by ivy.

Here they would be safe from observation, and it was not likely that the Germans would be looking far for the occupants of a cottage apparently visited at no recent date by their fellows.

Tramping, shouting, cursing—so the Germans came, and halted, as was to be expected, to watch for a moment a spectacle they should by now be accustomed to.

Listening, with tense nerves and liveliest perception, those who hid near by heard guttural jesting, orders, shouts, and then gradually receding footsteps. The ruse had succeeded—the terrible danger was averted. Tallant was still inquiring of himself whether these Germans were really men or devils to thus take delight in wanton cruelty to defenceless women and children, when a sharp cry brought him to the knowledge that the boy Etienne had allowed his white kitten to escape from his arms and now ran out across the woodland track to recapture it. And coming up the slope was a small party of laggard Germans—some four or five in all.

What happened thereafter took place so quickly that the Germans could scarcely have realised that they had missed their "pot shot" at that miserable little peasant before boy and kitten were whirled from the firing line by a ragged khaki-clad man who dashed back amongst the undergrowth.

Then, with a shout, they were in pursuit.

Five to one, well, those are the sort of odds an Englishman is accustomed to, but it was a bit awkward, nevertheless, seeing the lack of cover.

The woman and her brood of wailing bairns had crept as far back into the cave as possible before the Germans came in sight. It may be they prayed, that piteous group, of whom only one knew the full horror of what might follow.

But Private Richard Tallant was a man of one idea.

He was assured no German could stand against cold steel, and he'd fixed his bayonet before the foe came within range.

They stood—as he had expected—herded together, whispering.

Yes, they had seen the cave and no doubt planned to approach it en bloc to shoot down its helpless inmates.

Dick Tallant chuckled in gleeful anticipation. He had never heard of a one-man charge, but he was ready to try it as an experiment.

That was why the Germans, confident as if they were bent on rabbit shooting, were filled with amazed horror at the sight of a khaki-clad figure leaping forth with the wild rush of some dervish, uttering a cheer which echoed far as he raced with fixed bayonet on the group of foes.

And Dick Tallant's one idea was a winner. Cold steel doesn't suit German courage. Though the men halted to discharge their pieces, the shots flew wide, and the next moment they had turned and were racing back towards the road, as poultry driven by the marauding fox.

They could run well, yes, they could run well, and who could not, with a yelling fiend, bayonet in hand, at their heels? Each man of the fugitives felt in woeful anticipation the shock of that ever-to-be-feared weapon plunging into his vitals, and the sweat stood thick on their brows.

But there was good chance of the tables being turned presently, for the steps behind flagged as they reached the roadway, stumbled, hesitated, halted.

The cottage of Marie Lechard still blazed merrily; so pleasant had been the sight of destruction that the German soldiers passed slowly, reluctantly, out of sight. There were many stragglers who were within hail of their comrades, and Dick Tallant, seeing enemies thick as blackberries on autumn brambles, paused, knowing Nemesis was here, Nemesis, red-jawed, vengeful-eyed, who would have no mercy.

A DAINTY PETTICOAT.

Now is the time to set to work on summer "undies" for the small people, and I am sure every mother will be glad to know of well-cut and simple patterns of children's underclothing. The little petticoat shown here is sure to appeal to everyone, for it is such a simple shape that it can be run up in no time, and yet it is so dainty and well-fitting that it will please the most fastidious young miss. It is a style that would lend itself either to flannel or longcloth, and its neatly tucked skirt allows for plenty of letting down as the small owner shoots up.

This dainty little garment is taken from a splendid article on children's underclothing which appears in "Leach's Children's Dressmaker" for March, and if you have young people to make for, you should certainly buy a copy of this very useful and practical little penny paper. It is full of helpful articles showing charming fashions for kiddies, and every copy contains a free inset pattern of a very charming frock for a girl. Other free patterns of coats for girls of all ages can be obtained free in exchange for a coupon to be found in every copy of the paper.

Like relentless hounds he saw them turning back along the track, and a mist as of blood was before his eyes. He reeled back to cover, standing exhausted there against a tree.

He was going to die—but he wouldn't risk going back to those poor folk in the cave. Maybe they would escape.

How the din grew! Were all the forces of the Kaiser in pursuit of him—a single unit?

With the mists of faintness clearing, the man realised that others had appeared upon the scene. Many others. But these latest comers did not wear the grey-green uniforms of the Germans—he could see brighter patches along the roadway. Blue and red.

Then a shout went up, and Dick could have wept because his legs refused the mad longing of his heart to join in the bonny fight that went forward close to a burning cottage.

It was the sight of that flaming home which strengthened the muscles and purpose of the Frenchmen. Nor did the fight last long. Soon enough the whirl of battle swept by, and the man in khaki who lay stretched, exhausted, beneath the tree where he had fallen could have believed it to be a dream when he roused to the fact that a woman knelt weeping near, crying down blessings on him through her tears, whilst six black-eyed children stood grouped very close to their mother's skirts.

It was a Colonel of Chasseurs who rode up to the strange group, and who listened with great attention to the story told by the little woman who was his compatriot.

"It was a great deed, my brave one," he said at last. "Every day we of France see how much the debt grows of gratitude to England. This that you have done is noble—generous."

But Richard Tallant grew awkward to nervousness under such praise.

"Monsieur," he said shyly, "it was her who taught me the lesson. I'm thinking what she did was the biggest thing of the two. You'll think so too when you hear." And then—because he was more a fighter than tale teller—he blurted out the simple story of a gift of supper. A supper of bread and water, which had meant so much.

There were tears in the eyes of those who listened to the recountal of two brave deeds.

NEXT WEEK'S DOUBLE NUMBER.

A little talk about some of the splendid features it will contain.

DOUBLE numbers are always red letter events in HOME NOTES history, and my next week's SPRING FASHION NUMBER is no exception to the rule. It is crammed full of good things—indeed, there are so many of them that I hardly know which to tell you about first.

The free pattern I think deserves premier place, for I know from experience how much you like to find a give-away pattern inside your HOME NOTES. It is an extra special one, too, for a simple spring dress, chosen as the easiest and the prettiest style of the season by our good friend, "The Little Dressmaker."

I am putting a teeny picture of it on this page so that you may know what to expect. The skirt is just a little full, you see—all dresses will be before spring is really here—and it is nice to have room to move about in again!

The bodice is not too loose but very stylish, and the making, with the help the Little Dressmaker will give you, is simplicity itself.

* * * *

Sadie's Supplement.

Sadie—our American Dress Expert—is in the highest of spirits, for this Double Number means a Monster Fashion Supplement for her to arrange. I have been hearing dark hints of coming glories for some time past, and yesterday I saw The SKETCHES—that is what Sadie calls them, as if there were no others in the whole world—and they really are sweet. You will see them for yourselves next week, and I know Sadie will be longing to hear what you think of them.

Next week's issue will hold a very special attraction for those of you who have pattern labels in their possession, for the first list of one hundred numbers will be published, and that will mean one hundred blouse lengths from Selfridges', perhaps one of them for you. I haven't time to tell you about these gifts of mine here, but you can read all about them on page 376.

You will find a pattern of this dress inside HOME NOTES next week—tell all your friends about it.

A Delightful New Series.

Spring is the time for gardening, so next week I am starting a delightful series of gardening articles, "Over the Garden Wall." They are written by an expert, and I know you will find them useful, especially just now, when everybody feels how necessary it is to grow vegetables as well as flowers at home.

The other articles are too numerous to mention—there will be an interesting account of "Feeding the Boys in Khaki," a hair-dressing cinema, showing a very easy and stylish way of arranging one's tresses, delightful short stories, a fascinating competition, and illustrated articles galore.

The children, too, have not been forgotten, and their Roundabout will be a special source of delight to them. Aunt Hilda is taking a holiday, you see, and the "Creechurs" themselves are going to look after the Roundabout in her absence. The world-renowned Jumbo, ably assisted by Bruin, is at the head of affairs, and the bairns will be hugely delighted by their pranks and wonderful adventures.

For their sakes—as much as your own—make a point of ordering next week's Double Number TO-DAY, so that it may be delivered to you first thing on Monday morning next.

HOW TO OBTAIN YOUR LUCKY ELEPHANT.

IF you want to be thoroughly fortunate this year, in spite of the war, you should wear one of my lucky elephant charms! They are so easily obtained, and you will fall in love with yours, I know, the minute it arrives! You can get it in one of these three ways:

Our Most Popular Feature!

THE LITTLE DRESSMAKER

Our Little Dressmaker is the most popular of all the people who write for "Home Notes." She is a dear little woman, who took up dressmaking when her husband died so that she might earn a living for herself and her children. What she doesn't know about dressmaking isn't worth knowing, and she also has the happy knack of telling other people how to set to work. If you are in any difficulty, write to her, c/o "Home Notes," 18 Henrietta Street, Strand, W.C.: she will be only too pleased to help you.

HOW TO MAKE THE SPRING COSTUME.

WHAT I had in my mind when choosing this costume was the fact that this spring a great many ladies will only be able to afford just one new thing, and as the fashions have changed so much in the last few months, that one new thing will be the only thing that they can wear on anything like special occasions, no matter whether it is morning or afternoon.

You will have to wear out your old tight skirt as best you may at home, and your new costume with that full skirt will need to go on, in the morning and afternoon, if you are to make anything like a good appearance when you are out. So you won't need anything that's very marked either one way or the other. It will have to be plain enough for the morning and yet smart enough for the afternoon.

This is rather a difficult kind of costume to find, but I hope I have done it. You see, the one in the picture would look quite as well with a neat shirt below it and a sports hat for a finish, as it would with a lace blouse below it, and some kind of smart little French hat cocked on one side of your head in the afternoon. If you make it of good material, with a pretty lining to the coat, it will look as nice as possible, in spite of its simpleness.

DIAGRAM I.

A Choice of Materials.

Covert coating is all the fashion, because of its being a sort of khaki in colour. It wears splendidly, and always looks smart on those it suits, but you must not have it if you are rather a colourless lady with at all a sallow complexion.

Navy is not as fashionable as it was last year, but still it always stays in favour, and there are a lot of whipcords and gaberdines in this colour that are very smart.

If you write to Robinson Brown (Dept. 16), Macclesfield, he will send you a beautiful selection of patterns of all kinds of materials.

Grey or black and white suiting is always good. And for those who want black there are a number of new smart fancy striped materials of all prices. Let me just put in a word or two about the price of black. It never pays to get black material cheap, because it so soon wears rusty. It is best to pay a fair price for it at the start.

I should like the coat to be lined with real satin or a nice taffetas, of course. Satin wears much better than taffetas, though it costs a little more to begin with. If you can't afford either of these, have a tailors' satin in a good stripe, which will wear longer than the other stuffs, but won't look quite as nice.

You will need 5 yards of material 44 inches wide for

What is special about this costume is the full skirt and the pretty way the fulness of the coat is held in place by the band.

Nos. 1642 and 1643. W. 22, 24, and 28 ins. (Price 7d., post free, from the Pattern Department, "Home Notes," 18 Henrietta St., Strand, London, W.)

the medium size. That seems a good deal, I know, but you must remember that a full skirt is bound to take a lot.

DIAGRAM II.

You'll want to manage the seam and hem very neatly, as these details are so important—but here you see exactly what to do.

Fold the stuff and put the pattern on it in the way shown by Diagram I. Notice that the straight edges of the coat back, belt, and collar must go on folds. Cut the whole of the coat again in lining. Cut the collar, cuff, and belt again in tailors' canvas.

Some people might stiffen the coat fronts with canvas also, but I almost think that I should not do this myself, if I were using a good strong stuff, and a steady lining such as satin or tailors' satin. Of course, you can put it in if you choose, but it makes the job of putting the coat together rather more troublesome.

Let us start by making the skirt. Run up the centre-back seam singly at the wrong side of the material, stitching in a piece of tape with it, to keep it from stretching. You see this seam is a good deal on the cross—much more than back seams have been for some time—and unless you are careful with it, it will pull, and hang all uneven at the back, which always looks so very bad. Therefore you must tack it in before you stitch it, sewing in the piece of tape with the tacking, and take great care not to pull the stuff at all. Use the largest stitch in the machine, and ease the seam through it. Press the seam open and overcast the edges to keep them from fraying (Diagram II.).

Turn in and tack the right-hand front to a single seam about 1½ inches wide, at the wrong side of the material. Lap it down to the left-hand front and stitch the two together, leaving a placket about 10 inches deep at the top. Face up the placket and sew on patent clips to close it.

DIAGRAM III.

The collar is not hard to do, but you must be very exact about it.

Turn the skirt inside out and try it on. Pin up the darts to fit the waist; then take the skirt off, stitch the darts by machine, sewing in only the merest possible amount of thread with the last few stitches. Cut them open, and overcast the raw edges, then press them down flat to the inside of the skirt.

Turn the top of the skirt over a piece of petersham banding about 2 inches deep, which is fastened at the front by hooks and eyes. Face up the raw edge inside the petersham with a piece of prussian binding. The skirt should be sewn only to the top of the petersham; the bottom of the band is left quite free.

DIAGRAM IV.

Put the collar on to the coat in the way you see here.

Now get someone to come and turn up the bottom of the skirt on you; she will need to be exceedingly careful about this, for the more fullness you have, the more difficult a skirt hem is to manage. The best thing to do is to have a ruler or marked piece of stick, stand it on the floor, and put it up against the skirt at intervals of every few inches, putting in pins where the mark touches the material. Then take off the skirt, and tack up the hem carefully. As the bottom is a good deal on the curve, there will be a lot of spring in this turned-up piece, and you must pleat it into tiny little pleats every now and then, so that the hem lies quite flat. When all the tacking is done, try the skirt on again to make sure it is all right, then stitch prussian binding over the raw edge, in the way shown by Diagram II.

Give the finished skirt a good pressing, damping the hem carefully, and pressing it on the wrong side.

* * * *

How to Make the Coat.

Do the whole of the material coat first, and the lining afterwards. Start by running up the under-arm, shoulder, and sleeve seams singly at the wrong side of the material; press them open, and overcast the raw edges to keep them from fraying.

Take the collar lining, lay the canvas on it at the wrong side, and turn in the un-notched edge over the canvas and stitch it down. Now take the material collar, turn in and tack a narrow single hem at the wrong side of the material round its un-notched edge, and slip-stitch this hem down to the turning of the lining (Diagram III.). Damp the collar well on the wrong side, and give it a good pressing. Then run and fell the open edges to the neck with the notches matching (Diagram IV.). Try the coat on, crease the collar down at whatever line suits you best, and press it again so that it stays in place.

Make up the cuffs in exactly the same way as the collar and put them on to the wrists. Set the upper edges of the sleeves into the armholes; tack the join first, then stitch it by machine. Mind you get a nice wide fit on the shoulders. Don't take the armholes in too tight, and don't shorten the shoulders more than you can help.

Turn in and tack single hems about ¾ inch wide down the fronts, and round the bottom of the coat.

Now seam up the lining. Turn in and tack single hems about an inch wide round all the outer edges. Slip the lining into the coat with the seams touching, and tack it on to the coat round the turned edges and at the shoulders and wrists. Try the whole thing on to make sure that it is a good fit. Then slip-stitch the lining into place down the fronts, round the bottom and neck, and at the bottom of the sleeves.

If you are going to use the canvas, you must put it into the material fronts of the coat before you add the lining, but as I said, I don't think you will need this unless you are using very flimsy material.

Take the lining belt, turn the edges of it over the canvas one, and then face up the outside with the material, just as you did the collar. Press it well, then tack it to the coat at the centre-back and at the under-arm seams, fastening it at the front with a button and buttonhole.

If you can possibly send the finished coat to be pressed at a tailor's, by all means do so. But if you can't, remember that a thing of this sort needs to be ironed on the wrong side, and done with a heavy stamping pressure to flatten it down as much as you can.

Don't forget that you can get my "Little Dressmaker's Book" for 1s. 3d., post free, from the Publishers, 18 Henrietta St., London, W.C. You'll find it very helpful.—Your respectful friend,

THE LITTLE DRESSMAKER.

THOUSANDS OF BLOUSE LENGTHS!

I am giving them away absolutely free—there may be one for you among them!

"THOUSANDS of blouse lengths"—it sounds too good to be true, especially nowadays, when one has to be oh! so careful with the pence in the hope that the pounds will appear of themselves! Many and many a girl has to plot and plan with scrupulous exactness if she wants to look nice on what she can afford for clothes just now, and however brave she is being about new garments, she cannot help casting wistful glances at the dainty materials displayed in the shop windows. She wouldn't be human if she could!

It is in times like these that the gift of something that will help to fill the wardrobe is so very, very welcome. And when, quite suddenly, somebody says, "Thousands of blouse lengths—one for you, too, perhaps!" you naturally prick up your ears!

* * * *

Is there One for You?

That is what I am saying now. I am giving them away galore, and there is no reason at all why you should not be so fortunate as to win one. It is quite easy, you see: nothing complicated about it! All you have to do, when next you buy a pattern from HOME NOTES, is to notice very carefully the number which you will find stamped on a little label attached to it. The number is at the top of the label (and it is one that has been stamped on your label and no one else's), and underneath it are the words: This number may mean a blouse length from Selfridge's for you! Look out for it in HOME NOTES.

The First Numbers Next Week.

My next week's number—the Grand Spring Double Number—contains the first list of pattern numbers, one hundred in all, which you must scan as soon as you get HOME NOTES. If your number is among them, all you have to do is to send your label to me, and a delightful selection of blouse lengths will be delivered at your door soon after—voiles, crêpes, and other pretty, up-to date materials—so that your decision will not be a light one! A stamped addressed envelope is inclosed with the samples, so that you have only to return them inside it with particulars of your choice, and Messrs. Selfridge will forward you the material you have selected, postage paid and free of charge.

Other lists of numbers will follow next week's, so that if your number does not appear in my next issue, it's quite possible you will find it in the following one, or the one after that. And remember to tell all your friends about my magnificent offer!

ALL THUMBS!

Is your boy awkward and all thumbs, or have you, like the wise mother who writes this article, taught your son and heir to be a Jack-of-all-trades and a thorough household help?

MY sister's youngest boy, Wilfred, has been staying with us just lately, and a clumsier lad I never met. When he came he couldn't get across a room without knocking something over, and he'd no more idea of using his fingers than the man in the moon. In fact, they were all thumbs, as the saying goes, and as a result Wilfred wanted waiting on at every turn.

My sister seemed to take this state of affairs quite for granted. She's got a fixed idea that you can't expect boys to be handy, and though she teaches Daisy, who is two years younger, to sew and iron and cook, it never worried her in the least to think that Wilfred couldn't make his tie into a neat knot, and didn't know a screwdriver from a chisel.

* * * *

Learning to be Helpful.

Poor Wilfred! It wasn't his fault, of course, and until he came here he didn't realise how helpless he was, but when he saw the handy ways of my own Maurice, his cousin, he began to feel uncomfortable And he hadn't been in the house three days before he came to me quietly, and asked if I would teach him to turn his thumbs into clever, capable fingers.

"Willingly," I said, "and, first of all, you shall learn a little sewing. Fetch that coat of yours you wrenched the button off yesterday, and I'll show you how to put it on."

Wilfred shuffled his feet, and his face grew scarlet.

"But boys don't sew," he stammered. "I didn't mean that sort of thing, auntie—I meant——"

But here Maurice, who had just come in, interrupted heartily:

"That's all you know about it, young muff!" he said. "The most sensible boys do sew and knit. Why, all the King's sons do, and when Prince Albert was in hospital recovering from an operation a little while ago, he knitted two mufflers for the troops. And sailors always do their own sewing, and doctors have to put in stitches. Don't they, mother?"

That convinced Wilfred, as perhaps no arguments of mine would have done, for he looks up to Maurice a great deal, and wants to be like him. He had a button-sewing lesson as meekly as possible, and the next day I showed him how to put on a patch, and then gave him a lesson in plain knitting. Maurice learnt all these things long ago, and sat by encouraging Wilfred as he plodded through his unaccustomed task.

Every day we devoted half an hour to sewing or knitting, and soon the boy's clumsy fingers began to grow more skiful, and he didn't drop stitches nearly so often. I don't believe any school prize—and he's a clever boy who gets a good many—gave him half as much pride as his first kettle-holder, very indifferently knitted. He sent it straight home to his mother, and positively gloated over her amazed and delighted letter of thanks.

It's not only convenient for you, but it's splendid training for your son if he learns to do odd jobs about the house. Girls learn them as a matter of course—then why not boys?

For other sorts of training I turned the boy over to Maurice, who is a first-rate Boy Scout, and a capital hand at anything in the mechanical line. Why, he made me a splendid salt box for the kitchen last holidays, and if the bells or window cords go wrong he always knows how to put them right.

A Splendid Little Carpenter.

I encouraged his taste for carpentry when he was quite small by providing him with an old table to work on and a few tools, and now he is quite expert enough to give his cousin some elementary lessons.

He is my only son, and I've always trained him to help me a bit in the house. He cleans all our boots, and has been showing Wilfred how to lend a hand at that task, too. He can lay the table and wash up quite as well as any girl, and can even hook my frock for me if I can't manage it myself.

Wilfred's gone home now, but the last thing he learnt from Maurice was how to light an open-air fire.

He says he's coming back at Easter to camp with his cousin in the back-garden and practise cooking his own meals with fingers that have ceased to be "all thumbs."

OUR "UNSEEN FRIEND" PAGE. CONDUCTED BY ISOBEL.

CAN WE UNDERSTAND?

There comes a time in the life of most people when they need a real, true friend, who, though unseen, will try to help and guide them through trials and difficulties, who will try to make crooked things straight, and confused things clear. And this is what I want to do for you if you will trust me with your doubts and difficulties, whether they touch your outer or your inner life. I can help you through this page, or privately, if you like to send me a stamped, addressed envelope.

FRANKLY, I admit I am unable to explain God's actions to you, "S. L. T. K." and I do not for one moment suppose that anyone could explain to you at all conclusively why, for instance, your friend, aged twenty-one, with all life and happiness before him, should die, while your mother, aged fifty-six, should recover from the same illness which killed him. I think the quotation you give: "God never works without a definite purpose," is quite true, but what that purpose is we are not always allowed to know.

It does seem very hard, I know, to lose those whom we love, and who are doing good work in the world, whilst other people whose death it would seem could be nothing but a blessing to themselves and their friends and relations, live on, very often suffering and diseased. It may be to teach them and us patience and resignation, but it seems to me that no amount of desire to know the reason can ever find it, and that as these things constantly happen we can only accept them on trust, as it were, and believe as well as we can that there is some hidden and good meaning in them.

> I will not doubt, though all my ships at sea
> Come drifting home with broken masts and sails;
> I shall believe the Hand which never fails
> From seeming evil worketh good for me;
> And though I weep because those sails are battered,
> Still will I cry, while my best hopes be shattered,
> "I trust in Thee."

Just sometimes the veil is lifted a little. I am thinking of a dear friend of my own who loved going about and enjoying herself, and who was so bright and cheerful that she was welcomed wherever she went. She used to say to me sometimes: "I can't think of anything more dreadful than not being able to get about; I would far rather die than be a helpless invalid." Well, one day she was seized with illness, and although everything possible was done, she died in a fortnight. To the very end we thought she would recover, and even now, long years after, I write about our loss with my eyes misty with tears and a sense of desolation tearing at my heart. And after she was dead I said to the doctor what a particularly sad thing it was that she should have been taken, since she was always so well and strong and so much enjoyed life, and, of course, if she had got over the illness she would have been as well as ever again.

A Wise God.

He looked at me for a moment and then said "I thought you knew that if she had lived she would always have been an invalid, unable to walk or do any of the things she so much enjoyed, and she would always have been subject to fearful attacks of pain."

Do you see, "S. L. T. K.," what I mean? I wanted her to stay, but if she had stayed, if the frantic prayers I offered for her life had been heard and answered by a God wiser than I knew, I could never have forgiven myself for keeping her here, a broken, helpless invalid. The anguish I felt at her loss would have been as nothing compared with the anguish I would have felt each time she was in pain. Many times since then I have been able to thank God that He did not answer my prayers and that I can think of her safe and well and happy in that Upstairs Kingdom which is nearer to us than many of us realise.

The Age to Marry.

I think you would find our little book "Etiquette for Women" useful, "ANGLICE." You can buy it from any bookseller for 1s., or if you care to forward 1s. 3d, I can post it direct to you. It does not cover the laying of tables and waiting, but if you send me a stamped addressed envelope I will answer any definite questions on these subjects that you like to ask.

I don't quite know what you mean when you ask me if you are too old to get married, "T. S." There is no age limit to marriage if you want to marry and someone wants to marry you. If you could enter more fully into details and let me know your address I will write to you privately.

Only the other day I assured a correspondent who had given herself up to despair over superfluous hairs that it was possible very much to improve her appearance even if the hairs could not all be completely destroyed; but it is impossible to give particulars here. If you will send me a stamped, addressed envelope, "CONSTANT READER," I will hand your query to our Beauty Expert, who will gladly advise you. You may quite safely confide in her.

If you are not quite sure you love the young man of whom you tell me, "DOROTHY," I certainly think you had better not marry him; but I am inclined to think that during his absence you have allowed all kinds of foolish doubts to enter your mind, and that in reality you love him as much as you ever did.

I hope he will come safely back and that you will be very happy together. Always your friend, Isobel.

ZOO NOTES.

What do you say to Zoo News every month, Sunbeams, telling you all about the pretty, funny little ways of the animals? I'm sure you'll all love the idea, so I've asked "Jacky" to write to you regularly.

I JUST love the Zoo—don't you? Every time I go it seems better, and of course, when you know the animals' pet names, and what sort of beasts they really are, it's much more interesting.

Last time I was there I went straight to the Lion house. It was just before feeding time, and though, when they're free, lions and tigers don't roar much till after they've fed, these caged ones were making a frightful noise. Dick—he's one of the finest lions in the Zoo—nearly made me deaf when I got near him, and a queer little shiver went down my back, though I knew he couldn't get out His eyes are like flaming yellow lamps, and he looks so fierce and strong and splendid. I like him awfully, and so does his keeper, who says he's a very good-tempered beast, and chucks him under the chin.

But once, when a visitor leant across the barrier and poked an umbrella at him between the bars, all in a minute Dick thrust out his paws, caught the arm and umbrella between them, and dragged their owner over against his cage! That silly man was dreadfully hurt before they got him away, and I rather think it served him right!

Dick has eyes like flaming yellow lamps, and he looks so fierce and strong.

Dick's most particular over what he eats. His inner cage arches over the passage where the meat's cut up, and he always goes there to watch just before dinner-time. The keeper had taken me into the passage with him, and to show how very dainty he is, he offered him a piece of goat's flesh. Dick took it, for he was hungry, but you should have seen him turn up his nose at it, as he rolled it disdainfully between his paws. "You might have the sense to remember that I prefer horse!" his grunt seemed to say, and he grumbled all the time he ate it. He had his proper dinner afterwards, though.

Bob is very good-tempered, and let "Jacky" pat him.

Beasts are like people the keeper says, some good-tempered, and others always on the growl. Bob and Queen, two Cheetahs, or Hunting Leopards, are just as friendly as they can be. The Keeper opened the door of their cage, so that I could pat them, and Bob wanted to come for a walk with me. Queen looked rather bored, though she let me stroke her. Her fur is most beautifully soft and thick.

THE ROUNDABOUT.

May, a Puma, is fearfully spiteful.

"Mary" is a very pretty Puma, like a big, faithful dog, as playful as anything, and very tame. She's eighteen months old, and hasn't been in the Gardens long, so she is one of the new ones. "Prince," another Puma who lives close by, loves the keeper, too, and comes when he's called, but "May," his mate, is fearfully spiteful, and cannot be trusted for a moment. She's almost as bad, though not so dangerous, as a fine Leopard given to the Zoo by the King, who snarls if you look at her—she's so proud. The Black Panther, a little farther on, is another very fierce creature, and his face is all scarred from fighting his mate. But Bogey, a splendid Black Jaguar (the first they've had in the Gardens), seems quite a kind old thing. When he's wild, they say, he's a very deadly beast. Even the birds aren't safe from him, for he's more at home in the trees than on the ground.

Dandy and Bunty, two jolly young Tigers who've lately come, are great pets of mine. They're growing so fast that they soon grew too big for the collars they came in, and when Dandy's got too tight for him, he let his keeper chop it off with a pair of shears while he took a drink of water. "Bunty," his mate, is much more shy, so they gave her chloroform when they took off hers. She might have been alarmed if they hadn't, you know, and then would have sprung at them.

He is the tallest Giraffe they've ever had.

I'd heard that there was a baby Giraffe, but when I went to see him, he was dead. He had caught cold, and died of pneumonia. The other Giraffes missed him dreadfully, their keeper said. For days and days they couldn't keep still, and were always looking round for him. His father is such a beautiful animal—the tallest Giraffe I think they've ever had. His mother is smaller, and very gentle-looking. Her big, soft, brown eyes were so sad.

There's a new Kinkajou in the Small Mammals house (this is one of my favourite places). He's a jolly little beast, only nine months old, and already he's grown quite tame. He was fast asleep—the night is his playtime—his keeper woke him up to introduce me. His name is Edward, and he liked me ever so. I held him in my arms for two or three minutes, and he cried and cried when he had to go back, and hid his head in my neck.

"What's a Kinkajou like?" Why, he's about the size of a cat, with the cutest little face and a very long tail that curls round things at the tip like a monkey's. A grown-up Kinkajou's the colour of honey, though Edward's still darkish-brown. He's fed now on fruit, but if he were wild in the lovely warm forests in South America he came from, he'd eat birds and birds' eggs as well.

I'll tell you next time about the Crab-eating Dogs, and the funny Cat-Bear and the White-Nosed Coati.

A Kinkajou has a very long tail that curls round things at the tip.

AUNT HILDA'S LETTER.

My Dear Sunbeams,—"Zoo News" takes up such a lot of room this week that there's only just space for me to tell you about the new competition. I want you to say, in a few words on a postcard, why you like The Roundabout. Write carefully and express your reasons well, and don't forget to add your age, name and address, and send it to Aunt Hilda, Court of Queen Sunbeam, 18 Henrietta St., London, W.C. not later than Tuesday, March 16th. There will be 25 prizes of books, and 10 consolation prizes of Jumbo brooches for Sunbeams under 10. Prize-winners may have either a story book, the life of a hero, a nature book or a fairy story. So write on your entry which you would like if you win a prize.

Your own
Aunt Hilda.

FORM OF ADMISSION.

I wish to become a Subject of Queen Sunbeam, and promise to be her trusty servant and to carry her sunshine wherever I go.

If you want to join the Court of Queen Sunbeam write to Aunt Hilda for a copy of the rules.

JOLLY JUMBO AND HIS FRIENDS.

Ho Sunbeams,—Kerchoo! Arashoo! oh, the dusty sneezefulness, you can't think! We've been spring-cleaning, and I'll never do it again, nor nothing while that creechur is about. Yes, I mean Bruin, the miserble. D'reckly we started to spring-clean the drawing-room he and Jimmy ran off,

"Lazyfuls!" I thought, as the dust got thicker and thickerer, "I wish we had a vacuum thing to do it with, for it's zackly like a fog you never saw." And then in rushed those two boys with a big box, and screamed, "Hey, we've inventioned a splendoshous vacuumer. Come on, Jumbo, in yer get and work it."

So in I got, and put my trunk through the hole like he told me, and he fitted a funnel into it, and said, "Now, Jumbo, take a deep breff, and you'll soon find the dust move." So I breaved in hard—and next minute about twenty million tons of dust came up my trunk and down my throat.

And I gave such a furioshous sneeze I nearly exploded, and burst the box open, and—oh, it was drefful! And that orful one shouted, "Now you know how to work it we needn't stay." And off they dashed. But when I get all the dustincss out of my insides, I'll give them vacuum! You watch!

WHEN PRINCE WAS COMMANDEERED.

Bobby didn't like it at first, but he was glad he'd let him go when he heard of his brave deed. By ETHEL TALBOT.

PRINCE had been "commandeered." Mother said so, and at first Bobby didn't know what she meant. He soon understood though, for she told him all about it, and he heard her directing Tom the stable-boy to give the horse an extra good bran mash "before he goes away."

"Is Prince going away, Mother?" Bobby could hardly believe his ears. "Is that what 'commandeered' means?"

The little boy's eyes filled with tears, because the big black horse had lived in the stable for so long now that Bobby loved him next best to Mother and Father, and couldn't bear to think of losing him.

"Father's gone away to the front, and now Prince is going, too," he sobbed. "Soon there will be no one left at all."

But Mother explained things. "We let Father go without making a fuss," she said, "because we wanted to show him that we gave him up to serve the country without grudging; now the King wants Prince, and he's going to the battlefield, too. So we'll give him a good dinner and let him go with the soldiers who have come for him."

Bobby dried his eyes at that; he was a soldier's son, you see; then he crept out of the room, for there was something he wanted to do.

"You'll take care of Prince, won't you?" he said to the soldiers who were waiting. "I'm going to give him to the King without making a fuss."

"Sure and we will," said one of the men; "he's a fine horse, and no mistake, and the King'll be proud of him."

This comforted Bobby a little, especially as the black horse was tossing his mane and looking as though he was pleased to be going to help the country; he waved his hand to the soldiers as they went off with Prince at the end of a halter, and wondered when he would see him again. Then he went back to the house, and he and Mother made up their minds that they would keep brave and cheerful.

"And Prince too," said Bobby.

"And Prince too" said his mother, but she didn't know what a beautiful surprise was in store for them.

Three months later came a letter from Father; it made Mother turn pale at first, for it was written from a hospital, and it was to say that Father was wounded, but when she had read the first page she gave a gasp of surprise and read on with her cheeks getting pinker and pinker every minute.

"What is it, Mother?" asked Bobby and then she told him the most wonderful thing.

"Do you know," she said, "that Father has been in a great battle; his horse was shot under him by one of the German shells."

"Oh, Mother," Bobby sounded as though he was going to cry.

"Oh, but listen," said Mother, "there's better news further on. "He couldn't get away from the battlefield because he had been wounded, too, in his leg, and there seemed to be nothing for him to do but to lie there and wait until the Germans came to take him prisoner. Then, just when he was feeling very bad indeed, he heard a gentle little whinny behind him, and there was——"

"Prince!" shouted Bobby. "I know it was!"

"Yes, it was," said Mother; tears were in her eyes, but she looked so happy; "and father just managed to drag himself on to our dear horse's back, and then he fainted. When he woke up he was near the Red Cross Ambulance, and he was being lifted off. Prince had carried him straight there!"

"Then didn't he save Father's life?" Bobby's eyes were opened wide.

"Yes, I think he did," said Mother. "You see, the soldier who was riding Prince must have been killed, I think, and that left the horse riderless."

"Oh, Mother," Bobby looked radiant, "what a good thing I let Prince be 'commandeered' without a fuss!"

THANKS TO THE QUEEN!

PAID TO LEARN.

A young widow who was thrown out of employment by the war tells in this article how she is spending the time until she gets work, in making herself a good housewife. She is receiving a course of Domestic Economy training arranged by the Central Committee on Women's Employment, while she is paid relief wages through the "Queen's Work for Women Fund."

The "cook in the making," with her pots and pans!

WHEN they told me I was to cook, I said, "But I can't cook."

"That's what we want you for," they said—they wanted to learn me; an' they have learned me a lot. Me an' six others is in the kitchen at St. Andrew's Hall cooking the dinners for the women at the Bethnal Green workrooms.

It's the happiest time I've had, an' I'm going to stay as long as they'll let me, although I do say if "Miss" goes I 'ops it. She's the head of us, you see, and I haven't learned nothink but what "Miss" 'as showed me.

I did silk work afore the war, but people can't afford no tassels now.

"Miss" says she couldn't do without me in the kitchen. I takes the girls down Green Street of a mornin' to buy the dinner. I'd never done so much buyin' afore, an' all I knows is what "Miss" 'as taught me.

I takes six of 'em along of me, an' they stands behind an' sees what I do, an' then they knows how. We gives all the shops an' stalls a turn—they've all got to live—that's what I say. I goes to three shops for the meat, an' to them as buried a mother for the 'taters.

Of course, you've got to bait 'em a bit. The girls can buy most things themselves, but they don't like buyin' the meat. When I've got the 'eadache they say, "You keep on till the meat's bought, Mrs. Baker, then you can get bad." They thinks of the time they bought it, an' it were 'ard. The women didn't forget to let 'em know it at dinner time, neither!

Great interest is shown in the culinary art by the pupils, and the teacher's trouble is well repaid.

One girl didn't know a scrag from a breast. I tell 'em the best bits for boiling or baking, an' we only buy just what's going in the pudding, so as the girls will know what to get themselves.

When we gets back "Miss" shows us how to cook the dinner. Forty there is comes for it, an' pays 3d., an' we gives 'em Irish stew and college pudding, or boiled mutton and parsley sauce, and greens and 'taters, and fruit tart—just what "Miss" thinks.

We do 'ave a bit of sport sometimes. Didn't the gas company go an' cut half the gas off! Savin' they called it, but they might have give folk warnin'. We'd got sheep's hearts in the oven, an' jam tarts, and half an hour afore dinner the hearts wasn't warm. We had to take 'em out and fry 'em. An' we had to give the women their teas while they was waitin' for the tarts. Lovely they were, those tarts!

We turned a cup over an' cut them out, and then we put the cup right side up on the paste an' mashed it up close, an' then put the jam in. Like out of a shop they were! We learned them at the cooking class—the London County Council gives it on Monday nights. Then we experiment next day.

Our soup was better than they made at the class, not 'arf it wasn't! An' our fig pudding was, too, 'cos they hadn't time to boil it enough. They let us buy the things we made, an' we eat the pudding on the way home, an' it stuck to the roof of yer mouth. But they do knows how to set abart it, I'd give them that credit.

Cheese tarts we've 'ad, too, an' breakfast an' supper dishes, but I don't hold with the likes of them 'cos I don't 'ave no breakfast or no supper; I don't have nothink but what I 'ave here, an' that's my dinner an' a cup of tea an' a piece of bread an' drippin'. I don't fancy nothink else, 'cos you see, I've got a boy to find hot supper for.

"Miss" gives us cooking lessons, too, when we have cleared up of an afternoon. She shows us how a big dinner could be made for three or four like, an' what it 'ud cost. For a stew we'd have to buy two pennorth o' pieces, an' a pennorth o' pot 'erbs carrot an' turnip an' onion), an' half a pound of rice—that 'ud be ¾d.—an' a pennorth of taters. You'd have a good dinner like that for 4¾d. An' we uses up the scraps lovely.

You should have tasted the scones we made out of cold potatoes; they made you feel "moreish," I tell you! And the gingerbread, out of the taste of syrup that was over from the dumpling!

We've had things we've never heard of afore—potato soup, an' cheese an' potato pie, an' a cake pudding. My son sez to me, "You are getting a cook, mum!" Of course, we writes it all darn in a book in our own words, an' we puts in the bits about keepin' apple peelings for the top of the pudding to let the juice run in, an' to keep it from burnin'.

We goes to washin' lessons as well at the Council Schools, an' we can take our own clothes an' wash an' iron them. Some doesn't like to do that, so one woman brought something for everyone to wash, an' got it all done for nothink. They've got all the utensils there, lovely; tubs, an' sinks, an' irons an' all. But they don't put enough o' soda in for my liking.

The way I get stains out of my tablecloth is to rub the place with soap an' put a piece of soda on it an' then roll it in, an' soap the next stain an' put soda on it an' roll it up until the whole thing's in a ball. Then when the copper begins to boil, I pull it all out, an' you should see my cloth! You'd never think there'd been cups of tea spilt over it.

You do learn a thing or two at the class. I thought before that boiling the clothes made 'em white, but it seems that it just grinds the dirt in if they ain't clean when they go in to the copper.

There's all sorts goes to them lessons—dressmakers an' waitresses, an' tea-shop manageresses, an' factory girls, an' daily girls. It's funny to see them wash as never washed afore. I want to take it out of their hands, I do.

Some wanted to boil the flannels with the white things! An' of course there were those that wanted it all their own way, usin' a rubbin' board, an' all.

We took it all down in a book—like this for flannels:—Avoid: steeping, rubbing, hard water, great heat, extreme cold, keeping wet long.

They give us some hints, too, about melting the scraps of soap with boiling water, an' using the jelly to make the water soapy instead of having soap.

Ten weeks we're going on with this schooling; there's health classes, too, an' lessons in cutting out, an' making patterns, an' turning old clothes into new. You'll like to hear about them next week?

I didn't think my head would have held as much. My son, 'e says it's fair burstin' now!

Some "out-of-works" know a great deal about washing and some very little—but there is opportunity enough to learn!

The Girls He Left Behind Him

By BERTA RUCK.

"Two's company, three's none," as we all know, and when the two are a handsome young soldier and an adorably pretty but feather-brained little coquette, the poor third feels very much out of it all. But when she is of the stuff Ethel Smith was made of, she keeps a stiff upper lip through the darkest days, and wins through in the end!

NEW READERS START HERE.

"Good afternoon. Is Madame Whatshername here?" inquired the fashionably dressed lady who had just alighted from the beautiful grey car. "No—well, then you can do my thingymyjig—I mean my wig, for me."

Poor Ethel Smith, the pretty assistant at the smart Beauty Culture Establishment in Bond Street, smothered a sigh. She had so been wanting to get off punctually at six o'clock to-day for Harry Freeman's birthday party!

But Ethel found that even being kept late when you were aching to get away was not so bad when the customer was as amusing and talkative as this one was. She seemed to take rather a fancy to the pretty, refined-looking girl who attended her so deftly, and when she finally left she gave Ethel her card saying:

"Remember that if you find yourself at a loose end on account of the war, you can come to me!"

It didn't take Ethel long to get ready for the party when she once got home, for the amusing customer had been so complimentary about her appearance in the black dress that she wore in the shop that she made up her mind not to change it. In fact she arrived before the hero of the evening, Harry Freeman, had returned from the City.

Taking her upstairs, Phyllis Freeman introduced her to a pretty girl, Miss Trixie Beresford. Phyllis Freeman had accompanied the introduction with a murmured aside of "Harry's latest"—words that seemed to poor Ethel like the death-knell of all her hopes. For it must be admitted that pretty Ethel Smith had long ago quite hopelessly and irrevocably lost her heart to dashing young Harry Freeman, and although the young man was quite ready and pleased to have Ethel as a friend, he seemed well content to let matters remain at that.

Soon after this Harry Freeman electrified the whole assembly by appearing in khaki. He told them that he had enlisted that very morning, and now, more than ever, the hero of the party, he settled down to enjoy himself.

After the party was over, he offered to take Trixie home in a taxi, and on the way he took a step he had been contemplating all the evening—he asked the pretty little coquette to marry him; and she, feeling that it would be rather fun to be engaged to a handsome young soldier, accepted him.

But although Trixie was engaged to Harry she found plenty of time to flirt with other men, and when the news came that he was reported "missing" it didn't seem to worry her half as much as it did poor Ethel.

Life was altogether proving rather hard for Ethel just then, for she had just been dismissed from the "Beauty Culture" Establishment, and things looked very black for her until she remembered the offer of help the amusing customer had given her. Accordingly she called at Lady Lydia Herrick's house, only to find that lady in the middle of packing up to set off for France. It looked rather as if she would be unable to do anything for Ethel after all, until her maid suddenly gave notice, and Ethel offered to take her place. Lady Lydia engaged her on the spot.

When the Fiancé's Away.

THIS shall be "Good-bye for the present" also from the reader to Ethel Smith. We will now turn to have a look at the other girl whom the missing trooper, Harry Freeman, left behind him—the girl who wore his ring and had promised to become his wife: Miss Trixie Beresford.

Trixie lived with her widowed mother in a house just off one of those broad, leafy roads in Brixton.

It was not a big house, since Mrs. Beresford could not afford much of her slender private income for rent, or, for the matter of that, for housekeeping, or for her own dress. "You see," as she explained to any friend who wondered to find the poor lady year in year out in the same black cashmere gown, "dear Trixie's dress naturally costs a good deal. It would have been hard if a girl like that were not able to be properly turned out."

The fact of the matter is that every spare penny—and a good many pennies that ought not to have been spared—was lavished upon the finery and amusements of that little golden-haired coquette.

Trixie was one of those girls who "had" to have things. She had to have a good evening-wrap to go over her pretty restaurant gown; she had to have a taxi all the way, so that the dainty brocade shoes which matched the gown shouldn't be spoilt by pattering along a muddy street to the stopping-place of the trams.

For, now that Harry was away, Trixie didn't see why she should be expected to give up going out in the evenings. In fact, she had to have amusement as usual, even if she were engaged to a young man at the front, and even if that young man had been careless enough to get himself lost by his regiment and have to be put down in casualty lists as "missing." Surely that was no sort of a reason for his fiancée, poor dear, to take it upon herself to sit at home by the fire every night of her life getting the "miserables" over a grey worsted Army sock—"Knit one plain, one purl, and drop two tears"? She was quite certain, she told her mother, that Harry Freeman, wherever he was, was the last person to expect her to behave in such an idiotic manner.

"Oh, I daresay you're right, darling! I'm not blaming you. Of course, I know you must have distraction," agreed Mrs. Beresford, who was a plaintive little creature, rather like a hen sparrow, and who had never got over the honour that had been paid her when Trixie's handsome father had offered her his heart and hand and debts. She looked upon it as even more of an honour that the beautiful Trixie consented to be her daughter.

"Of course, it would be idiotic, darling, as you say, for you to allow yourself to become downhearted and nervous by moping at home all the time: and, as you say, I'm sure Harry, dear fellow, wouldn't wish it. But at the same time," said Mrs. Beresford, plucking up heart of grace to speak her mind, "I don't know what Harry would say to your going about quite such a lot with Mr. Paterson?"

Now, Mr. Paterson was the well-off and rather stout young man who had sat on the other side of Trixie at Harry Freeman's birthday-party. He was the young man who didn't join the Army because he couldn't leave his business.

His business of making Army boots had been going up by leaps and bounds ever since other firms had been ruined by the war, and Paterson, of Paterson's marching boots, had never been so well off. He had never been so well able to buy two-guinea boxes of chocolates, five-shilling bunches of violets, stalls at the theatres, and dinners at the Criterion for the prettiest girls he knew.

And, at the moment, the prettiest girl he knew was Trixie Beresford, who was supposed to be engaged to some young man who had been "mug" enough to take literally the suggestion that his King and Country wanted him, and who had enlisted—not even in a decent corps, where everybody was a gentleman, but in the common "Regulars"!

Well, he was well out of the way now, and Mr. Paterson might ask his lovely fiancée out to dinner as he chose; she didn't seem to mind.

She was laughing gaily that evening when he called for her in his enormous car, all padded and silent, and fitted up like a boudoir on wheels; and she told him: "I very nearly wasn't allowed to come with you. Mother began wondering whether it was quite 'the thing' for a left-behind fiancée to enjoy drives and dinners and theatres with another young man. She began suggesting that Harry might not care for all this gaiety and gadding about on the part of the girl he left behind him!"

"Serve him right if he didn't!" retorted Mr. Paterson, fastening his fur-lined overcoat well up round his chin before he settled himself heavily into the seat beside the pretty creature in the pink restaurant wrap. "What does a man want to be such a fool for as to leave such a girl behind him, instead of staying at home and looking after her himself?"

And the two prepared to spend a really amusing evening!

SHE DARKENED HER GREY HAIR.

A Well-known Lady Darkened Her Grey Hair and Stimulated Its Growth by a Simple Home Process.

She Tells How She Did It.

A well-known society lady, who darkened her grey hair by a simple home process, made the following statement: "Any lady or gentleman can darken their grey or faded hair, stimulate its growth, and make it soft and glossy with this simple recipe which they can mix at home. To half a pint of water add 1 oz. of bay rum, 1 small box of Orlex Compound, and ¼ oz. of glycerine. These ingredients can be purchased at any chemist's at very little cost. Apply to the hair every other day until the grey hair is darkened sufficiently, then every two weeks. This mixture relieves scalp troubles, and is excellent for dandruff and falling hair. It does not stain the scalp, is not sticky or greasy and does not rub off. It will make a grey-haired person look ten to twenty years younger."

A Journey—and a Conquest.

Ethel Smith felt that never, if she lived to be a million, would she forget that tedious journey on which she accompanied Lady Lydia Herrick to France as her lady's-maid.

The travelling party consisted of Lady Herrick, in travelling garments that were perfect in every detail, and which cost even more than the superb evening frocks that were now to be Ethel's care; and of Millar, the newly enlisted soldier servant, whom she was taking out to her husband, and who seemed gloomily resigned to anything that came; of the chauffeur, and of Ethel herself, who was by turns half terrified of what she was doing, and whether it would be right, and half amused at the extraordinary new and thrilling circumstances in which her life was cast.

Perhaps her first definite feelings were all relieved over the quite commonplace subject of sea-sickness, which may be a farce or a tragedy—this depending upon whether you are a good or a bad sailor.

Ethel thanked Providence that she was a good sailor.

It is almost impossible to imagine anybody being a worse sailor than poor, smart, amusing, and unconventional Lady Lydia Herrick! Almost as soon as she got on board the boat the poor lady exclaimed in tragic tones, "It is going to be an awful crossing, Smith—I know it is. Why did I ever leave home? And what on earth induced me to start off on this wild goose chase?"

"But, madam," put in the demure Ethel, laden with rugs and small parcels as she stepped gingerly down the gang-way after her new employer. "You want to see Colonel Herrick before he goes off to the front, you know."

"Oh, I don't know that I do!" sighed Lady Lydia fretfully. "Why have husbands? Life is just as amusing without, and much less fatiguing."

The exquisitely artistic motor-bonnet which she wore was tied over her head by a long scarf of string-coloured chiffon, which floated in the Channel breezes, and her handsome face was rapidly growing the same tint of string colour as the scarf.

"It is going to be the worst voyage I have ever known in my life, and yet I have been over to India and back again fifteen times; to South Africa five times, besides other times to Paris or Vienna, when I have wanted frocks," she declared hopelessly. "None of those are going to be anything to this, Smith."

She was interrupted by the usual raucous voice, well-known to all steamer travellers. The voice that exclaimed, "Any more, any more for the shore?"

"Yes, there are! We're for the shore!" exclaimed Lady Lydia Herrick, making as if she would dash down the gang-way, and Ethel, who was then new to the lady's ways, had not a notion of what was expected of her.

"I should have certainly dismissed you on the instant," Lady Lydia Herrick informed her afterwards, "if you had been so absolutely lost to all sense of what had to be done, Smith, as to allow me to bolt at the last minute, as I always invariably do in all my sea voyages! I have always behaved like that each time! Each time I have had to be firmly clutched and held back by the maid, or the chauffeur, or Eric"—Eric was her husband—"or whoever it was that happened to be handy!" On this occasion the person who happened to be handy was a passenger on the boat, who was apparently no stranger to the charming Lady Lydia's little idiosyncrasies.

He was a young man wrapped against the breeze in what is known as a "British warm," with an alert, dark, oval face, looking out from under the peak of an officer's staff cap.

"Hello, Lady Lydia!" he exclaimed in a very boyish and pleasant voice, as he caught sight of the tall figure in the exquisite coat and motor-bonnet, who was preparing to flee. "We are to be fellow-travellers, are we? But, I say, you mustn't cut! You mustn't cut! I am going to see you safely over to the Colonel."

"Oh, Algy, you can't; you can't!" moaned the lady. "I am not going to undertake this unspeakable voyage, after all. I won't! I won't! Not this time. I have suffered too much on many of these voyages," wailed Lady Lydia.

And the young officer, who Ethel afterwards discovered was the Honourable Algernon Fitzermine, and attached to Colonel Herrick's staff, cast an amused glance of understanding at what he considered a ripping pretty girl in the blue blanket-coat, who appeared to be a friend of Lady Lydia's. (This was Ethel.) And he said, "It can't be done, ma'am; it can't be done. We are off now; they have hauled up the bridge. No hope for it; you're off this time."

DAINTY UNDERWEAR.

Every girl who is handy with her needle ought to make her own underwear, for home-made lingerie is so much daintier than ready-made and always comes cheaper in the long run. The fascinating chemise shown here is such an easy pattern that anyone could run it up in no time and yet it's pretty enough for a queen. It would look very sweet made up in longcloth and trimmed with a dainty little crochet edging and insertion, and you could have the satisfaction in that case of knowing that you had done every stitch of it yourself. Of course, if you were feeling rather extravagantly inclined and happened to have an odd length of silk by you, nothing could be nicer than this pattern carried out in that material, and trimmed with Valenciennes lace and a soft bow of ribbon.

No. 1643.

This pattern, No. 1643, is cut in three sizes, W. 22, 24 and 28, and can be obtained for 7d., post free, from the Pattern Department, Home Notes, 18 Henrietta Street, Strand, London, W.C.

"Oh, Algy, I shall never forgive you," declared Lady Lydia vindictively. "Miserable boy! Never again need you expect any help from me, whether it's in a love affair or in some job that lets you go and risk your life somewhere in one of the few new ways that it has not been risked in before! Anyhow, I cannot ever help you again now, even if I wanted to. I am past all help myself; I am going to die. Come along, Smith; help me below," she concluded to the pretty girl, whom the Honourable Algy discovered, with much amusement, was Lady Lydia's new maid.

"Mother began suggesting that Harry might not care for all this gaiety on the part of the girl he left behind him," laughed Trixie, gaily. (See page 387.)

And a very curious time that new maid proceeded to have down below in the first-class cabin, where she ministered with eau-de-Cologne, with brandy, and with every known drug against sea-sickness, to a prostrate and moaning employer.

Lady Lydia was one of those people who are plucky and self-reliant enough under any other circumstances, but who lose self-control and courage the moment they find themselves afloat on the ocean wave.

Poor Lady Lydia, with her face turning from string colour to Nile green, clutched Ethel's hands and informed her that she, Lady Lydia, was going to die before they had reached Boulogne, and that she was not fit for it. She knew she was not.

"I am such a wicked old woman, Smith, my child!" she moaned. "I am old, in spite of looking about twenty-eight when I have just had my hair done, and am sitting in the pink-shaded candle-light. More brandy, please. It is taking care that has kept me young. (For pity's sake unfasten the belt of my skirt!) Taking care, and having lots of admiration all about me. Nothing like admiration for keeping a woman young, as you will find out one day. Of course you are young now. (No; take this beastly stuff away; it's doing me no good.) I'm sure you do pretty well for admiration.

"I saw young Algy looking at you just now on deck. . . . Algy is another person who always reminds me that I am not fit to die. I treated poor Algy's father most disgracefully in 1890, I think it was. Up to the last minute he thought I was going to marry him, and I was only using him to bring Eric up to the scratch, and then I married Eric, and Algy's father went and threw himself away on an American heiress, and I believe he has scarcely spoken to her since young Algy was born, and that's only one household I have made miserable, Smith. Plenty of others—— (Oh, what a lurch the boat gave then!) I really should not like you to know all the ways that I behaved when I was a girl! And now I am going to be cut off in the midst of my sins. Oh, I know I know we shall never reach Boulogne."

However, reach it they did, at last! And it was really astonishing to see how the first moment that she set her exquisitely-shaped foot upon terra-firma again Lady Lydia instantly became another woman. Colour returned to her face, and a bright light of amusement and intelligence to her eyes. She smiled and joked with her new maid; she returned the friendliest of greetings to the young officer, Mr. Algy Fitzermine, who immediately constituted himself a sort of courier to her, helping the rather dazed chauffeur (who had also been miserably seasick) to see about the luggage and the landing of the big dove-grey car.

Lady Lydia was to motor across country to Marseilles, and to obtain all sorts of passports and of notes from the Powers That Be.

Young Fitzermine had to report himself to some other Powers That Be in Paris before coming on to join his chief.

"We shall meet again soon, then," he said to Lady Lydia, with a very smart military salute.

And as he said this he was looking straight, not into the carefully preserved and handsome face of the mistress of the car, but into the face, so young and pretty, that needed no preservation, of her ladyship's new maid.

Ethel Smith, though she hardly realised it at the time, had made quite an important conquest!

(This is a very different sort of life from that of a Beauty Culturist, isn't it? Of course, you are anxious to know what it holds in store for Ethel! The next instalment tells you!)

BLOUSES YOU WILL LIKE.

If you are wanting a pretty blouse for afternoon or evening send for the pattern of one of these fascinating models. It won't cost you a penny!

BLOUSES with a little vest or waistcoat of contrasting material are still just as fashionable as ever, and you will see that both these pretty models have this idea introduced very effectively.

No. 1644, would look delightful carried out in flowered silk, or, if you feel you can't run to that these hard times, crêpe or voile would both look very nice indeed. I should make the big turnover collar and cuffs of very fine muslin, and the little waistcoat of the same material. Tiny coloured buttons to match the flowers on the material would finish it off daintily.

The other blouse, No. 1645, is designed for striped material, although plain would look nearly as effective if you prefer it. Here again I should make the collar and tiny vest of muslin, as this material makes up better than any other for dainty little trifles of the sort. A little hand embroidery on the collar and cuffs would be a very pretty touch especially if you carried the work out in silk the same colour as the stripe of the blouse.

No. 1644.

No. 1645.

Both the striped shirt with its pretty little vest, and the one in flowered material—dainty though simple—are easily made, and quite an acquisition to your wardrobe.

The dainty violet edging.

PUTTING AWAY WINTER CLOTHES.

Some hints that will help you to keep your heavy attire in good condition until it is wanted again next year.

THE advent of the bright sunshiny days makes us think about putting away a lot of the clothes which we have worn through the winter weather, but unless these things are put away in the right manner they will look anything but nice when they are brought out again next year. If you want to do the job thoroughly, wait until you can spare a whole afternoon or evening, and then go through all your winter garb with care and common sense, deciding definitely what is to be kept and what discarded.

Heavy coats and skirts, great-coats, and such garments should be well brushed and shaken, and have any spots or stains removed from them. Then stuff the sleeves with crumpled newspaper, and fold up the garments with plenty of old newspapers between the folds. If there is no box or drawer which will take the coats and skirts full length, fold them over from the top—coats from the neck and skirts from the waist—and put a roll of crumpled paper in the fold to prevent a crease being made.

Pack the heaviest garments at the bottom of the box, and work up to the lightest. Be sure to use newspapers for packing the clothes, and not tissue paper. The latter looks nicer, of course! But the newspaper is far the wiser, since the printers' ink is a moth preventive—quite as good as any moth preventive you can buy!

Winter dresses should be brushed, mended where necessary, and if possible stored in hanging positions. The best plan is to slip them on to a coat-hanger, fasten the dress, and then put it into a calico "bag." Such a bag is easily made from two lengths of unbleached calico rather longer than the dress, with a drawstring run in the top. When the dress is in the bag pull up the string, leaving the hook of the coat-hanger outside, and tie it tightly so that no dust can get in.

Blouses which are essentially "winter wear" should also be packed away. If they are made of flannel it is better to wash them, and roll them up "rough dried" before packing away.

Go through all winter underclothing, mend all holes and thin places, and have it washed properly before packing it up. Then spread each garment out flat, cover it with newspaper, and roll it up tightly. If such things are folded into neat, flat arrangements, there is danger of their cracking while packed away. It is much better to roll them, and the newspaper will prevent moths paying them a visit. Winter stockings, too, should be washed and mended, paired, and rolled up in a newspaper before being stored.

HOW DO YOU HOLD YOUR HANDS?

Do you recognise your pet position in any of these pictures? Whether or no, you'll be tremendously interested in what the Wise Woman has to say on the subject.

1.—A very healthy, restful pose of the hands, that denotes a well-balanced temperament.

THE first picture shows a very easy and un-self-conscious position in which hands lie, when their owner is at rest, and is not thinking about them at all. A person whose hands go like this at "off" moments probably has nerves and muscles which are well in tune. She is quite quiet, healthy, and restful, but not actually lazy or slack. This pose is a very wholesome and good one, and you can feel quite happy about any friend of yours who is in the habit of adopting it.

Some folks say that if the right hand lies over the left when in repose, the owner is born to rule; and if the left hand lies over the right, the owner is born to be ruled. I should not like to vouch for this matter, as I think there is a certain amount of superstition mixed up with the saying, but it may have a good foundation in coincidence, though it is not actually proved by fact.

The second photograph shows rather a prim and careful position which is often adopted by a person who is inclined to be a little narrow-minded and definitely upon her guard against liberties or encroachments of any sort. You will very often find it taken by people who are "proud of keeping themselves to themselves," by those who "know what is due to their position," and by those, like the old lady in Punch, who "object on principle to all improvements." It is a position that you will often see among older women, but very seldom among young girls, unless these have been very rigorously brought up, and have naturally rather a prim turn of mind.

A Very Ugly Position.

The third picture is an ugly position which is likely to belong to a hard and rather aggressive character. A person who sits like this, with the knees apart, and the palms of the hands firmly planted on them, will very probably be the sort of woman who will die rather than yield her point in an argument. She will bluster on and never give way, however clearly she may be proved in the wrong. People who sit like this have very seldom anything of yielding, gentleness, or tractability in their characters; they are exceedingly difficult to teach or train.

It is a position which is more often seen in folks who have passed middle life; when it is found in a young person or a child, it is a bad sign, as the owner will be likely to prove exceedingly obstinate and 2.—Many people who are inclined to be a little "narrow" and prim will fold their hands like this.

3.—This position indicates a rather hard and aggressive character, with a great deal of obstinacy.

4.—Place no reliance on the girl whose hands hang in this loose, purposeless way!

5.—You can often guess that a person is hiding something from you when you see the hands compressed in this way.

headstrong, during the whole of his or her life.

If you are engaging anyone to work for you in any capacity, or to enter with you into any business relations, beware of the person whose hands hang in the way shown in the fourth illustration. Hands that hang in this loose, purposeless way nearly always go with a lazy or feeble character. People who have exceedingly bad health, those who are "born tired," and those who are always more ready to crumple up and cry than to face difficulties in a plucky spirit, will instinctively let their hands hang like this.

The next photograph shows a very tell tale position indeed. If you find a person standing like this with the hands strongly linked together, and pressed downwards to the full extent of the arms, you will almost invariably find that that person is trying to hide something from you. The face may be quite quiet and controlled, and the voice may be restrained and ordinary, but the strongly-linked and pressed-down hands will give away the fact that the owner is suffering from nervousness, fear, irritability, pain, or boredom, which she is trying very hard to conceal.

People whose self-control is constantly at the edge of breaking point, or who frequently suffer from ill-health, will very often keep their hands like this. The control is not often lost, for the owner of the hands generally has a good deal of will power, but the struggle is always present.

THE TOUCH OF TIME.

It is not age, but neglect, which ruins the skin. A woman who from girlhood has always given proper care to her face will never have a coarse, tired complexion; her wrinkles will only come quite late in life, and they will be small and of little conspicuousness. It is never too early to begin, and it is never too late to mend. Pomeroy Skin Food, a hygienic, natural cream, needs only to be lightly massaged into the face with the finger-tips at night in order to make a visible difference to the complexion on the very first day. Feeding the skin and the cells and muscles beneath it will keep the complexion healthy and fresh. Pomeroy Skin Food can be had of any chemist in eighteen-penny jars.

FOR "BETWEEN-TIMES."

You don't want to look shabby when the longer days come—and the spring sunshine has a dreadful way of showing up the dowdiness of winter clothing! You can't do better than be forewarned and forearmed, and make yourself one of these charming frocks, quite suitable for outdoor wear!

A PARTICULARLY clever friend of mine—and by that I mean the sort of person who always looks suitably dressed and manages to do it on next to nothing!—once told me that she found the most difficult time of year as regards clothes was the spring.

"Autumn's not so bad," she said, "for you can go on wearing your summer things with, perhaps, warmer underwear, until it's cold enough for thick coats and dresses, and nobody seems to notice that you're making do. I think it's because the days are getting shorter and there's not so much colour in Nature. But in the spring—it's simply awful! There's no light as bad for showing up shiny skirts and dingy blouses as the sunshine we get in March and April. It makes you feel like a walking rag-bag!"

"But you always look ever so nice just at that time of year," I put in. "I've noticed it often."

She looked distinctly pleased at that. "If I do," she confessed, "it's because I provide myself with something really smart to tide myself over that awkward season. You see, there are so many days when you can go without a coat if you have a warm dress on. So during the winter I make myself a nice cloth or fine serge frock, being careful to choose something that is pretty for the house, and will be equally right for a walking 'get-up,' and I make a point of reserving it chiefly for the spring.

"This year my 'between-time' costume will be a warm brown serge, with one of the new full skirts—only not too much so! It has a very wide belt, shaped like the bottom of a waistcoat and fastened with two buttons. The bodice is absolutely plain except for a tiny vest of dark brown velvet and a Medici collar to match. Over this collar, however, there is another of fine white lawn, and the cuffs are the same, with a band of brown velvet at the wrist. The set is detachable, by the way, for I want to be able to clean it without much bother.

No. 1646.

A delightful suggestion for a "wide skirt" costume that will look just right for a walking dress in the spring.

"When I was deciding on the style and material of this dress I saw ever so many ideas that would have been almost as satisfactory. In fact, one was so fascinating that in the end I had to toss up for my choice! It was a very becoming tunic frock that would have looked delightful in dark blue or grey cloth, with the wide, swathed belt in velvet or silk of the same tone. The skirt was not as wide as mine, but the tunic—open in front—was very full, and that gave the appearance of a 'flare-out'! The bodice was like mine as to the fastening, but it had quaintly set-in sleeves, whereas mine was a magyar with a baggy armhole. I think if I had been making it up I should have had the vest white to match the large collar. And I shouldn't have forgotten the tiny silk rose at the side of it, for that is the very latest and smartest touch of all!"

No. 1647.

A slender girl will look her best in this smart tunic frock. It's quite the latest.

DON'T LET THE CHILDREN SUFFER!

Not one of us, I am sure, is proof against the temptation of looking back, comparing "this time last year" with the state of affairs at the present. Sometimes the backward glance brings pleasant thoughts and a sensation of well-being, sometimes there is also a feeling of regret. To many—I might almost say to all—who, now that Lent is with us again, are remembering the Lent of the year that is gone, there can, however, be nothing but a wistful envy; we were not entirely satisfied with life, perhaps, "this time last year," but it was a time of peace, not war, and had we known what the days were bringing us we should, I fancy, have grumbled less.

We have all suffered—we are all suffering—from the war. And because that is so, let us not omit to do what we can for one another. None need help and kindness as much as the children—the children of the streets.

Last Lent you sent for a little red box, on which was inscribed, "Lent Savings for the Fresh Air Fund." Ninepence pays for a poor child to have a day in the country. Ten shillings will enable a child to spend two weeks at the seaside. You obtained it from the Honorary Secretary, F.A.F., 17 Henrietta Street, Strand, London, W.C., and into it you dropped the pennies that represented little sacrifices, little givings-up, little economies. It is Lent again, and the war has not made the children's lives any brighter; indeed, if it has affected you, think how it must have affected them! The little red boxes are waiting to be sent away; there is one for you. I am quite sure that you will write for it at once, because it is Lent, and because you love the children.

OUR COOKERY CHAT.

MOTHER'S MONDAY DISHES.

Excellent recipes for cold meat cookery, which will appeal to all who want to keep up a nice-looking table at moderate expenses.

IN most households they have cold meat on Mondays. But we very seldom get it—not more often than once a month, at most. None of us care for it, you see, and mother is so very strong on the importance of giving people the things that they like to eat, that she does not mind taking a little extra trouble in order to spare us from the infliction of the detested cold joint.

She says that folks cannot digest properly the food that they do not eat with relish. And that, therefore, it is not an extravagance—but rather an economy in health and strength—to tempt their appetites, instead of forcing them to swallow disagreeable food from sheer necessity.

Our Monday dinners are often the very nicest in the week. I will give you a few of the recipes for dishes which we like most of all.

Beef Batter.

This can be made best when part of a rather underdone joint of beef is left from Sunday. You must not use very well cooked meat for it, or it will be tasteless.

¾ lb. of beef	6 tablespoonfuls of flour
½ pint of milk	½ pint of stock or water
1 egg	Pepper and salt.

Use the egg, pepper, salt, milk, and water to make a batter, exactly as I told you when I was giving you the directions for making Mother's pancakes, in HOME NOTES, dated February 20th. Cut up the meat into small thin pieces. Grease a deep piedish very well. Lay the meat at the bottom of the dish. Pour the batter on to it. Bake all for one hour in a moderate oven.

Just before sending the dish to table, melt a tiny bit of butter on top of the batter, and then return the dish to the oven for a few minutes. This gives a nice, brown, shiny top.

Important.—1. If you have no stock it is a good plan to use a whole pint of milk instead of any water. The water batter is rather poor, and Mother hardly ever makes it unless she happens to be short of milk.

2. Carefully take away all fat and gristle from the meat, as they are very unpleasant in this dish.

3. If you have a little cold bacon, sausage, ham, or anything tasty of that kind, you might as well mix it with the beef to improve the flavour.

Meat Mould.

You can use any sort of meat for this. Mother often makes it towards the middle of the week, when she has scraps of several different kinds that can be mixed together.

½ lb. of minced meat	1 small onion
1 egg	¼ lb. of cold potato or white crumbs
Brown crumbs	2 tablespoonfuls of stock.
Flavouring

Chop the onion small. Mash the potato. Mix all with the stock, egg, and flavouring.

Grease the inside of a deep piedish, and line it thickly with brown crumbs. Put in the mince mixture. Cover it with a greased paper. Bake the whole in a moderate oven for half an hour. Turn it out just like an apple Charlotte, and serve it on a hot dish with gravy round it.

Important.—1. Grease your dish with dripping, because the crumbs stick so well to this.

2. Loosen the mould with a knife before you try to turn it out. Handle it gently, for if it is broken all the attractive appearance will be lost.

Pork and Potato Chips.

When the Sunday dish has been a joint of pork, Mother often makes us chips on Monday. We are all so fond of them.

Take about equal quantities of lean pork and unboiled potato. The quantities must be equal in size, though they need not be so in weight. Mother never troubles to measure them, as exactness is not particularly necessary.

Boil the potatoes in their skins for about ten minutes. Skin them, let them get cool enough to handle, and then cut them up into pieces

SPECIAL COOKERY CHAT

"The Lunches Mother Made for Me."

NEXT WEEK.

about two inches long by a quarter of an inch thick—that is to say, more or less the size of your little finger.

Take away the fat and crackling from the pork. Cut up the lean into pieces of the same size. Season the pieces with pepper and salt.

Chop up an onion into very small fine bits.

Mix all together. Melt a little pork dripping in a frying pan, and fry the chips lightly till they are a good brown.

Pile them high on a dish and serve them very hot. Gravy should be made separately and offered with them.

Important.—1. The onion must be cut very fine. Large pieces would not cook thoroughly in the short time necessary for the frying of the pork and potatoes, which, as you must remember, have been cooked already.

are useful in the early spring, when potatoes are so new that they cannot be boiled soft enough for mashing.

Boil one teacupful of rice till it is quite tender. Mix it with three heaped tablespoonfuls of mince (any meat will do), flavouring, and half an egg.

Roll the mixture into balls. Flour them thickly. Coat them with the rest of the egg and some brown breadcrumbs. Fry them in deep fat.

Important.—Rice rissoles are more apt to break than those made with potato, and must, therefore, be handled more carefully.

Mince Dumplings.

Mother doesn't care for these, but she sometimes makes them to please me.

Mince your meat and add just a very little stock—only enough to bind the mince into a stiff paste.

Of course, the stock and the mince also must be nicely flavoured. Roll the mixture into small balls, and coat each ball in short suet crust, which has been rolled out thin. Close up the crust carefully round the mince, wetting the edges, and pinching them so that they may be secure.

Tie each dumpling in the corner of a well-floured pudding cloth, put them into boiling water, and cook them gently for forty minutes.

Important.—1. Don't tie the dumplings too closely into the cloth. They will swell a good deal, and must have room or they will become tough.

2. Never let the water go off the boil or the dumplings will become water-logged and spoilt.

BORWICK'S BAKING POWDER.

THREE FROM ONE PATTERN.

These little garments are all very suitable for little folk who like to be comfy rather than grand—and what child doesn't? You'll like the pattern because it's so simple to follow in whichever of the three ways you decide to use it.

THE romper takes 1⅝ths yards of material, 36 inches wide, for the 4-6 size. Put aside the collar portion of the pattern, as you will not need this at present. Cut open the little split which makes the legs. Run up the seams. Cut and face a placket at the centre back. Turn in and face the neck edge, and gather up the bottoms of the legs on elastics.

The whole of the work can be done in quite a short time, which is a great advantage, for it is no use to waste your energy by putting elaborate work into a romper, which will get so much rough wear that it will soon be worn to rags.

The overall should have an opening at the front, so that the child can fasten it unaided. Shorten the sleeves to the dotted lines, and cut open the fold at the centre front from the neck downwards to a depth of about 4 inches or 5 inches. Sew a piece of ribbon to each side of the opening, and let the child tie the ends in a bow to close the front after the overall has been popped over her head.

No. 1648.

Both these play-time garments are ideal wear for the little folk, and they will take hardly any time to make.

The sailor dress takes 3⅜ths yards of serge 27 inches wide, and about a ¼ yard of contrasting material for the collar, if it is being made to fit a child aged 4 to 6 years.

You must remember, when using the pattern in this way, that the pouch at the waist will take up about two to three inches of the material. So you must make allowance for this in the cutting, as, otherwise, the skirt will be too short.

A dear little sailor-frock that will suit your little maid admirably. Why not make her one like it?

This dress should have a placket opening from the neck to a couple of inches below the waist. As the placket is at the back, you will only be able to stitch the left-hand side of the collar to the neck; the other side must be left loose, and fastened down at the front by a hook and eye.

Stitch up the whole dress, except the bottom hem, before gathering the waist. Then fit it on, and find out what amount of pouching is most becoming to your little girl. Then make sure that the length is the same all the way round, and fasten a strong piece of tape to the inside of the dress so as to keep the gathers in place and hold the waist-line steady.

(This pattern is cut to fit children from 4 to 6, and can be obtained for 7d., post free, from the Pattern Department, HOME NOTES, 18 Henrietta Street, Strand, London, W.C.)

FINANCE AND INDUSTRY.

MANY WORKPEOPLE IDLE.

Every possible precaution is being taken by the Government and the leading financiers of the country to ease the financial strain. Mr. Lloyd George announced in the House of Commons yesterday that £1 notes and notes for 10s. are to be issued on the security of the Government, convertible into gold at the Bank of Englnad and that postal orders are to be legal tender on the same terms. He hoped, however, that they would not be converted. In order to increase the available gold supplies, the Bank of England announces that to-morrow two millions will be released from the amounts previously set aside on behalf of the Government of India currency and the gold standard reserves.

At a meeting of the leading accepting houses of London, held yesterday, it was decided that all acceptances due on Tuesday, Wednesday, Thursday, and Friday, of this week, should be considered for purposes of re-acceptance under the Proclamation, as due on Friday, August 7. All such bills as are then re-accepted will therefore mature for payment on September 7, the further days of grace being taken into consideration. It was also decided that the date of maturity of such re-accepted bills must be mentioned on the face of the bill at the time of re-acceptance.

The Government War Risks Insurance Office opened at Cannon Street Hotel yesterday. There was a large number of people waiting to obtain information, and the staff were busily engaged in answering inquiries. The great hall of the hotel has been transformed into an office, and a large staff is on duty to cope with the work. The office has been opened by the Government, who have made arrangements with certain approved Associations covering a large number of British ships engaged in overseas trade by which the Government will reinsure ships belonging to members of those Associations, against King's enemy war risks as defined in the policy. Applications for insurance at the War Risks Insurance Office can only be made in respect to cargo, ...ped or to be shipped on a vessel covered for the ...ge against King's enemy war risks by a Govern... policy.

...e effects of the war upon industry are already being ...usly felt. The loading of all French ships on the ...e has been stopped. All the horses in South Shields, ...ding those of the Cab Company, have been com...deered by the War Office. Fifty-three nurses in ...th Shields have offered their services to the authori...

Messrs. Morrison and Company, shipowners, at ...th Shields, have two of their steamers at St. Peters...g, and they are unable to ascertain anything con...ning them owing to the lack of telegraphic facilities. ...d the same applies to other North-country ships.

Wearmouth Colliery, Sunderland, was closed yesterday, and will remain so till further notice, because there are no ships to carry the coal. Other collieries in the Sunderland district are working, but their future policy is uncertain. Several of the ship yards opened yesterday after the holidays, but few men put in an appearance. A number of tradesmen in the town have intimated to their employees that they will have to be placed on short time, and that possibly the establishments may be altogether closed.

Two more weaving sheds at Burnley closed down yesterday. Two came to a standstill, along with a large spinning mill, earlier in the week. It is expected that several thousand looms will be completely stopped by to-morrow, and a wholesale shutting up of weaving sheds is regarded as certain next week. The operatives were ill-prepared for such a calamity after a long period of short time, and the situation of many thousands of workers will soon be pitiable.

Last night three of the largest mills in Colne closed down for an indefinite period, throwing 2,000 workers idle. At Nelson mills have begun to close, and weavers put on short work. By next week it is expected most of the mills in the district will be shut.

A meeting of members of the Liverpool Cotton Association was held yesterday, when a plan for dealing with the situation created by the present crisis was unanimously approved. The board of directors recommend that all members and Association members interested in the selling of spot cotton already in Liverpool and Manchester, and cotton afloat to Great Britain, shall agree to place themselves under the control of a Committee of supervisors, and that no cotton shall be sold under a minimum price to be determined by them. Other regulations are made as to dealing in spot cotton, and it is stated that the plan is propounded with the idea of safeguarding the interests of importers and consumers alike, and is not an attempt to hold up cotton on an artificially high level. It is approved and supported by banks concerned in the importation of cotton.

The mid-week rag sales at Dewsbury yesterday, were poorly attended. The business transacted was of very small dimensions, purchases only being made to meet pressing requirements. Prices, however, ruled much the same as last week. Messrs. S. Lyles, Son, and Co., Ltd., Earlsheaton, yarn spinners, who do an extensive trade abroad, have closed their works until further notice. The firm were working night and day up to a week ago. The sudden stoppage of other firms is likely to follow before the week is out.

At a conference attended by over 100 delegates from National Labour, Socialist, and Co-operative Associations held at the House of Commons yesterday, a National Committee was formed to deal with the position of the working classes as affected by the war. Among the members are Messrs. J. A. Seddon, H. Gosling, and C. W. Bowerman, M.P. (representing the Parliamentary Committee of the Trade Union Congress), W. C. Anderson, John Hodge, M.P., Arthur Henderson, M.P. (Labour Party Executive), Ben Cooper, Ben Tillett, and W. A. Appleton (General Federation of Trade Unions), Robert Smillie (Miners' Federation of Great Britain), Arthur Bellamy (National Union of Railwaymen), Miss Mary McArthur (Women's Trade Union League), Dr. Marion Phillips (Women's Labour League), Mr. H. M. Hyndman (British Socialist Party), and Mr. Sydney Webb (the Fabian Society). It was decided to press upon the Government and municipal authorities measures for officially controlling (a) the protection and storage of food; (b) the fixing of maximum prices of food and principal necessities; and (c) the distribution of food. A number of other proposals relating to the provision of work and food were adopted.

The orders which Huddersfield cloth manufacturers have are fast being completed, and it is expected that very shortly most of the mills will only be running for a limited number of hours during a few days of the week.

Wakefield manufacturers generally are contemplating running half-time, and in the case of Messrs. E. Green and Son, economiser makers, the works in Caldervale Road have been closed down.

A Gain for Trade.

The autumn trade for some dressmaking firms is turning out beyond expectation to be good. One would not have supposed that the seasonal activity which normally begins about this time would be entirely absent this year. Women's purchasing power has diminished very much, but it has not disappeared. Still, the demand for some kinds of clothing has, of course, been killed by the war, and there is considerable unemployment everywhere in the women's trade. It is therefore rather surprising to hear of one or two firms which are able to keep some part of their staff working until half-past 9 at night. There are particular reasons for this spasmodic outburst of industry. One of the reasons is, again, the heaven-sent Americans, who have in the last two months spent more money in London than they intended to when they set sail from New York. Hundreds of them, scattered over the Continent when the war began, have lost their luggage beyond immediate hope of recovery. They have added considerably to the London demand for clothes. I am told that one dressmaking shop has orders from sixty American women for autumn frocks. Besides the Americans there are a good many English women whose wardrobes are by this time perhaps having adventures on the Continent. Unfortunately a little rush of trade due to such a cause cannot last very long.

Mr. D. H. L. Young's Suggestion for Unemployment.

At the monthly meeting of the directors of the Glasgow Chamber of Commerce, held this week, a number of suggestions for the capture of the trade of our enemies were submitted.

Mr. D. H. L. Young, of James Templeton and Co., carpet manufacturers, from whom a letter was also received, wrote that he had been in communication with some of the members of the Women's Committee, and he had been asked to inquire whether the manufacture of plush felt for making ladies' hats would not be an opening for women's work in this country. The industry had hitherto been mainly carried on in Austria. He understood there was likely to be a continued and growing outlet for the product. The raw material consisted of the loose fur of hares or rabbits, which was blown on to revolving cylinders by compressed air. That, he believed, was afterwards felted, and the hats moulded by hand. Such information might, as far as it went, be of interest to some manufacturers and merchants. Another scheme which had occupied his attention was the possibility of employing a certain class of women's labour next summer in trying to exterminate the bracken which was so largely encroaching on sheep pasture in Scotland. Such labour would be organised in the same way as that of the women who annually work in the fishing industry or in the fruit-picking industry. Committees, largely consisting of ladies, would have to be formed to arrange for the housing and feeding of the workers. Housing might be under tents, and the weaving of cotton canvas for this purpose would give immediate employment to women. Other committees would arrange with landed proprietors and tenant farmers as to the contribution they would make towards the expenses. The Glasgow Employment Committee, of which Mr. Francis Henderson is chairman, had already got powers to supplement the wages paid to workers under such a scheme. Professor Bower, of Glasgow University, had made a study of bracken and could advise as to the most scientific way to attack its encroachment. Men like Dr. Beilby, of the Technical College, and the Chairman of the Agricultural College could be asked to give information as to the possibility of extracting potash from the bracken. Potash would be in great demand for manure, as the German supplies were cut off, and it was quite conceivable that the burning of bracken for potash would recoup some of the expense. He had spoken to Mr. Whitton, the superintendent of Glasgow Corporation parks, who had had experience of the matter in connection with the Ardgoil estate, and could give valuable advice. In conclusion, Mr. Young expressed his willingness to act on any committee of preliminary inquiry which might be appointed.

"ONLY A SHILLING."

WOULD "Naval Officer's Wife" prefer to employ unskilled labour?

May I be allowed to suggest that it is not domestic servants that the war has mostly affected?

Women who are out of employ are chiefly those of gentler occupations.

Would "K." care to pay £20 per annum to a novice?

I, who am used to all household duties, do not in any way consider them derogatory, and am pleased to execute them; but, on the other hand, many women have been trained for other occupations which the war has affected very much, and are at a moment's notice unfit for domestic service.

Dare I venture to suggest that perhaps one shilling spared from "K.," with so comfortable a home, would greatly help so good a cause?

HAND-MADE HOMESPUNS.

DUCHESS OF HAMILTON'S INDUSTRY.

TO THE EDITOR OF "THE DAILY TELEGRAPH."

SIR—At this time, when great efforts are being made to provide work, it is not perhaps out of place to ask you to be kind enough to allow me to draw attention to my industry at Winterslow, in Wiltshire, for hand-spinning and weaving.

Any profits that accrue are divided among the workers.

The intrinsic merits of hand-made homespuns are too well known to enlarge upon. More labour is necessary to produce a hand-made article than a similar one made by machine, therefore a greater proportion of the value is for labour. This labour, besides being profitable, is pleasant, and is done in the homes of the women, who can look after their home duties at the same time. Many have husbands or sons at the front.

The industry is different from most others in that it is run on strictly business lines, and the entire [illegible] the hands of Messrs. Burberrys.—Yours [illegible]

UNEMPLOYED TYPISTS.

Yesterday a conference of City men was held at the Mansion-house on the subject of the distress prevailing among female typists and secretaries owing to the war.

The LORD MAYOR, who presided, said it was estimated that over 2,000 of these young women had lost their situations. The Mansion-house Committee had started a register at the St. Bride Institute, and 600 girls had already enrolled their names. He felt sure there were many banks and business houses who could give temporary work to these girls if they knew that this register existed. Already a good beginning had been made, for some 150 of them had been assisted to either temporary or permanent work.

Mr. C. G. Kekewich, Miss Mary M'Arthur, and Mr. Brimsley Harper having spoken,

The Honourable MAUD PAUNCEFOTE said the Agent-General of Australia had made the Queen an offer to take out to Australia a large number of unemployed women under 24 years of age at very reduced rates on their agreeing to enter and remain at least 12 months in domestic service. Surely, the speaker added, some of the inexperienced and younger typists out of work could accept this offer and give colonial life and service a year's trial.

Eventually, on the motion of Alderman HANSON, a small sub-committee was appointed to assist the Lord Mayor in calling the attention of the City banking and mercantile community to the state of affairs in regard to female typists.

HARD HIT.

I WONDER how many of your women readers know how badly hit the dressmakers have been by the war. Their case is so bad that unless more clothes are bought the smaller dressmakers will be in as bad a position as the Belgians.

As an example, I can quote one instance in which a little dressmaker, keeping a whole family and paying rent and taxes, has had no work for twelve weeks. Women who are patriots should buy clothes now.

OTHER CLOTHING TRADES.

DRESSMAKING AND MILLINERY.

RETURNS from retail firms in London, chiefly in the West End, employing 2,069 dressmakers in the week ended December 19th showed a decrease of 3·5 per cent. in the number employed compared with a month ago, and of 13·1 per cent. compared with a year ago; 57 per cent. of the workpeople averaged three-quarter time or less during the month, as compared with 55 per cent. during November. Court and private dressmakers, employing 958 workpeople, in the week ended December 19th showed a decrease of 5·6 per cent. in the number employed compared with a month ago, and of 35·2 per cent. compared with a year ago; about 73 per cent. of the workpeople were on three-quarter time or less during the month, as compared with 70 per cent. during November. Many of the workers were partly employed in making army shirts, belts etc.

With milliners in the West End employment continued slack, and was worse than a year ago; over 35 per cent. of the workpeople worked about three-quarter time during the month.

MANTLE, COSTUME, BLOUSE &c. TRADES.

In the wholesale mantle, costume, blouse, underclothing and millinery trades, firms in London employing 4,752 workpeople on their premises (in addition to outworkers) in the week ended December 19th showed an increase of 0·6 per cent. in the number employed compared with a month ago and a decrease of 12·6 per cent. compared with a year ago. The regular trade was slack; but full employment was provided in many cases by Government contracts and, as a result, only about 16 per cent. of the workpeople covered by the returns in these trades were on short time. In the millinery branch 27 per cent. of the workers were on short time, but this was partly due to seasonal causes.

At Manchester, firms employing 5,007 workpeople in the week ended December 19th in the costume, skirt, blouse, mantle &c., trades showed an increase of 1·6 per cent. in the number employed compared with a month ago and of 5·6 per cent. compared with a year ago. Practically all the workpeople were fully employed during the month, and about 10 per cent. worked overtime on Government orders.

At Glasgow, employment in the mantle, costume, and underclothing trades continued moderate, and was worse than a year ago. Returns from firms employing 2,274 workpeople in the week ended December 19th showed an increase of 0·3 per cent. in the number employed compared with a month ago and a decrease of 3·2 per cent. compared with a year ago. About 22 per cent. of the workpeople were on short time during the month, as compared with 30 per cent. during November.

SHIRT AND COLLAR TRADE.

Returns from shirt and collar manufacturers in England, Scotland, and Ireland employing 4,828 workpeople in their factories (in addition to outworkers), and paying £3,546 in wages to indoor and outdoor workers, showed a decrease of 1·0 per cent. in the amount of wages paid compared with a month ago and of 12·2 per cent. compared with a year ago. In the shirt department employment was good; in the collar branch it was slack; but on the whole there was less short time than a month ago, 16 per cent. of the workers being thus affected, as compared with 26 per cent. during November.

CORSET TRADE.

Returns from corset manufacturers, mainly in England, employing 5,866 workpeople in their factories (in addition to outworkers) in the week ended December 19th showed an increase of 0·7 per cent. in the number employed compared with a month ago and a decrease of 7·0 per cent. compared with a year ago. Employment generally was fair and less short time was reported than during November.

UNEMPLOYED PROFESSIONAL WOMEN.

MADAM,—In view of the distress, caused by the war, to the educated woman worker, the Conservative and Unionist Women's Franchise Association has now opened a Hostel at 9, Roland Gardens, South Kensington, for the reception of ladies who are either being trained or are seeking employment.

Guests will be maintained free of charge for a period of one month, at the end of which time, if no employment has been found, their case will be reconsidered. All applicants must be of British birth, and must provide two personal references.

All applications must be made in the first place in writing to the Secretary of the Conservative and Unionist Women's Franchise Association, 48, Dover Street, Piccadilly, W., who will forward a form of application to be filled in.

THE QUEEN'S "WORK FOR WOMEN" FUND.

CLASSES FOR UNEMPLOYED CHILDREN.

The Queen's "Work for Women" Fund has made possible the work the London County Council hoped to do for the girls of St. Pancras between the ages of 14 and 16 years. These children were thrown out of work through the war and the London County Council decided to fill up their time by giving them domestic economy training. The basement of Bainbridge House, a residential home for working girls off Tottenham-court-road, was fitted up therefore in September as a centre and teachers supplied. The girls, however, did not come. After having earned wages they could not settle to work without them, and their parents could not do without their money. The centre had to close for want of pupils. Thus it was that the Central Committee of Women's Employment, which had the same idea as the London County Council with regard to the training of the girls, found the machinery ready for their own scheme. A grant was given from the Queen's Fund, and the girls were offered 4s. per week maintenance and a daily meal. Those now attending the classes come from a diversity of trades. There is a shell-box factory worker, a toy maker, a feather cleaner, a girl from a penny bazaar, a cap maker, a carpet sewer, a picture frame mounter, a boot finisher, a circular folder, a wig maker, and an errand girl. There are several who have been in dressmaking, tailoring, and millinery. In the morning they attend the Passmore Edwards Settlement, where a London County Council teacher of dressmaking and tailoring supervises their needlework. Four of their number cook dinner for the rest at Bainbridge House, under the direction of the Council's Organiser for the Higher Education of Women in St. Pancras.

Yesterday the Fund reached a total of £121,149 13s. The day's subscribers included:

Unemployment Amongst Women In Stepney.

Interesting Facts.

Mr. E. F. Hitchcock, the Secretary of Toynbee Hall, contributes to the November "Toynbee Record" an interesting and authoritative article on this subject, from which the following extracts are taken: The economic dislocation owing to the War has caused in London a much larger amount of unemployment amongst women than amongst men. The effect has probably been felt more in Stepney than in any other London Borough. It may, therefore, be of interest to consider the nature and extent of the problem in the Borough of Stepney and the methods adopted to deal with it. In the first place it should be noted that over one-third of the women workers living in Stepney are normally occupied in tailoring and dressmaking of various kinds. If dislocation occurs in these occupations, 15,300 women are likely to be affected in addition to 16,500 men. During the first week of the War unemployment figures in the tailoring trade commenced to rise, and for a period trade went from bad to worse. At this time there was very little work at the docks and wharves, and this factor, together with the effects upon carmen of the commandeering of horses for military purposes caused much distress amongst transport workers. The wives of many of these men were employed as tailoresses or in jam and preserve factories in the district, which, owing to the shortage of sugar, were compelled to put their workers on short time or to close down altogether. Some employers sold out their stocks of sugar when the price was very high, with the result that they netted a considerable profit themselves and discharged their employees. Other firms, especially the larger ones, retained all their sugar stocks and deliberately put their

in order to spread employment over as long a period as possible. Since then the sugar stocks in the country have been augmented, and employment in this trade, though still below the normal, is somewhat better. The temporary coincidence of unemployment in tailoring, jam preserving, and transport caused chronic and widespread distress during August. Luxury trades and such trades as millinery and ladies' and children's fancy boot and shoe making soon began to decline, and generally at the beginning of the War the economic outlook for Stepney was extremely serious, both for men and for women. The general distress was unhappily augmented by the unfortunate fact that for several weeks at the commencement of the War many wives of soldiers received no allowance. The seriousness of this state of affairs was by no means minimised when later they were presented with comparatively large sums of gold. The brewers reaped a considerable harvest. From about the third week of the War tailoring began to revive. Orders came in for soldiers' canvas kit bags and bandoliers, blankets, shirts, and similar work. These were, however, not sufficient to give employment to the numbers requiring it. The War Office was already giving out substantial contracts for military clothing, but for the reason stated above practically none of the work, save trousers, was given out in East London. The work required on the military jacket was too "difficult." Acting on a suggestion made to them, the War Office, with admirable accommodation to the need of the hour, then simplified the design of the coat (e.g., abolished raised seams). Various difficulties had to be overcome, and some time yet elapsed before filtered down through the various grades of workers—wholesaler, sub-contractor, machinist, and finisher—but soon cloth and khaki dye were obtained in larger quantities and employment in the tailoring trade from being very slack, became extremely brisk, especially in factories. It must, however, be remembered that some classes of tailoring, the workers in which attain considerable skill, are still affected, and it is not always easy or even desirable for such workers to change their trade. A substantial amount of overtime is being worked, and one hears that sweating is per hour and the majority work for 40 hours per week, save those in the cookery and making-up departments, whose hours are from 30 to 35 per week. In some cases where the circumstances justify it, they are on part time, as it is a principle of the workroom to employ as many suitable women as possible in proportion to their need. The workroom, however, is intended as nothing more than a temporary shelter and stop-gap. Its aim is to give employment instead of doles to women who, though unable to obtain work owing to the War, are normally wage-earners, and incidentally to train them in the cutting-out and making up of useful garments, as well as in plain cookery. The ignorance discovered has been amazing, though the progress made has been very satisfactory. Every woman is registered at the Labour Exchange before admittance, renewing her registration each week, and it is the aim of those organising the workroom to utilise every possibility of finding suitable work at reasonable and recognised rates for the women as soon as possible. In some instances manufacturing clothiers have taken on women for a few weeks as learners on power machines, paying them during the learning period 1s. a week, and then engaging them as ordinary employees on piece rates. What the economic effects of the increased and the training of women to use the machines will be on such problems as homework, the economy of production, on wages generally, and the displacement of men for women in the factories, it is, of course, too early to estimate. That excellent body, the Women's Industrial Council, is already concerning itself with this latter question, as well as with the question as to whether much of the power machinery used is not unduly heavy for women workers. It is a mistake to regard the workroom as a permanent institution or, to judge it by the normal tests applied to ordinary industrial concerns. The wage given—3d. an hour—is purposely fixed at a low figure, so that the women may not be tempted to stay on at the workroom rather than seek regular employment. Already cases have occurred where women have refused other employment at higher wages, preferring the gentle discipline and congenial surroundings of the workroom. The wages are paid and the material supplied from the Queen's Work for Women Fund, and no attempt is made to compete with ordinary industry. The garments made are distributed freely through such agencies as the East End Lying-in Hospital to poor people who would otherwise be unable to obtain them. They are stamped before distribution, to prevent their being disposed of to pawnbrokers. The workroom relieves women workers who from causes just as much outside their own control as of ours are unable to obtain work. Its influence is educative, both in as far as it gives definite training, and also in that it is felt it is in those things, incalculable though fundamental, upon which the care and cheeriness of a home depend. The vases of flowers which it is the pride of some of the women to arrange on the dining-room tables each day are symbolic. The total accommodation of the workroom is 200. Since its opening, 245 women have been given work. Up to November 10th, 63 had obtained regular work and 12 had left from other causes. During the first few months of the War,

UNEMPLOYMENT AMONGST GIRLS

from 14 to 16 years of age was considerable. The normal earnings of these girls are from 3s. to 4s. per week, or less as apprentices, and because of this it was difficult to fit them into the experimental workroom scheme. For other reasons also it was felt undesirable for them to work with adult women in the workroom. Several private efforts were made to cope with the problem, though nothing of an official nature was attempted. At one point the problem, presenting as it does peculiar aspects, assumed somewhat alarming proportions. Meanwhile, the Local Representative Committee of the Prince of Wales's Fund, realising the seriousness of the question, decided to increase up to 4s. the relief given to girls under 16 who attended certain "instructional centres" which had been established by private individuals, and were already dying for want of funds. Happily, however, trade became very much better during the third month of the War, and employers regained confidence, and the majority of girls soon regained employment. The headmistress of a large school in Mile End recently questioned her girls as to how many of their elder sisters under 16 years of age were unemployed. Out of 350 families, only eight girls, mostly high class dressmakers, were unemployed

WORK FOR WOMEN IN WARD 4

The Women's Committee of Ward 4 of the Prince of Wales' Fund, were faced with a serious and difficult problem, early in September, when case after case of distress and trouble, among women and girls, caused by loss of work, directly or indirectly owing to the war, was brought to their notice. The sad facts—and still sadder circumstances—of these applicants, proved to the Women's Committee, the absolute necessity of providing some means by which money could be earned, and the homes and children saved. Work rooms were immediately opened, both in the Salvation Army Hall, which had been most kindly offered for the use of the committee, and, later, through the kindness and courtesy of Mr. Marshall Roberts, in his premises in Camden Town, where the work is now briskly carried on, in comfortable well warmed rooms, under the personal direction of a forewoman and her assistant. It is a source of much satisfaction and happiness to the members of the Women's Sub-Committee to see the gradual and unmistakable change, from despair and misery, to relief and contentment, that is so noticeable among the workers after their admission into these workrooms; and the thanks and gratitude of the whole of No. 4 Ward are due to Mr. Marshall Roberts, for his generosity and kindly assistance in offering the use of his rooms. These workrooms presented an unusual scene on Wednesday, December 23, when the Women's Committee provided a generous and ample tea before the workers dispersed for the Christmas interval. Bright and happy faces, cheery laughter and universal good comradeship betokened the kindly fellow feeling engendered among the workers, old and young and a very pleasant and happy hour was spent before the workrooms closed for the Xmas holiday. Cheers were heartily given for Mrs. Eve, the chairwoman of the Women's Sub-Committee, to whose kindness and indefatigable energy so much of the success of these workrooms is owing, and to whom the workers are thereby so greatly indebted. Before separating each worker was presented with a packet of tea and a nice Christmas card, and all went home cheered and encouraged by the kindliness and thought of the Committee on their behalf. The workrooms re-opened on Monday, December 28th.—(Communicated).

UNEMPLOYED GIRLS AT YARMOUTH

To the Editor.

Sir—Will you kindly let me call attention to the distress in Yarmouth caused by the bad fishing season. There are hundreds of young girls thrown out of employment owing to the closing of the net chambers. In some cases the girls are the sole support of their homes. Surely something can be done to find them employment during the winter.—Yours truly,

The Less Romantic Side.

Sir,—On Tuesday, January 5, a special matinee is to be held at the Court Theatre, Sloane-square, on behalf of the Chelsea Workroom. May I ask for the valuable assistance of your paper in the publication of this letter in support of this workroom, which rests entirely on voluntary contributions, and which has maintained in work nearly fifty girls since the war broke out.

The indirect victims are always the least romantic result of any war, but each of the workroom girls is represented at the front by either a near relative or a sweetheart. It is possible to find work for even more, and therefore I trust that if your readers are unable to be present themselves at this matinee, at which every one of our Allies will be represented, they will remember that the workroom will be very grateful for their donations, and wounded soldiers for the tickets they themselves cannot use.

and homes. Many wives and mothers will still be ignorant of cooking and plain sewing and of those things which go to make a home. The East End, and especially the Docks, will continue to be to a great extent an industrially unorganised mob. In many ways this crisis has produced a greater sense of our collective responsibility; and we are able to regard unprecedented things with equanimity. Many of us from one reason and another are unable to go to the Front, but our sense of national unity is quickened. We talk of our national civilisation—young we do something of a permanent character to make it a reality to the wives and mothers however, be remembered that some classes of trailoring, the workers in which attain considerable skill, are still affected, and it is not always easy or even desirable for such workers to change their trade. A substantial amount of overtime is being worked, and one hears that sweating is taking place to a considerable extent. This latter problem requires an article to itself. In any case, the inadequate staff of the Office of Trade Boards, excellent though it is, cannot be expected fully to cope with a problem as extensive as this, and until the Trade Boards Act is amended the real culprit who profits out of sweating will often escape. The revival in the tailoring trade has absorbed a great number of women, but still large numbers belonging to a variety of trades, especially charwomen, office cleaners, dressmakers, high-class tailors, cigar and cigarette makers, shop-assistants, box-makers shorthand typists, and foreign correspondents, book and enve'ope folders, printers, babies' and women's boot and shoe makers umbrella-makers, and luxury trades generally, are badly hit. Almost from the beginning the serious condition of

has been recognised, and efforts have been made, apart from the Prince of Wales's Fund, to deal with the problem. The Central Committee on Women's Employment was set up by the Cabinet Committee to devise schemes for women's work, and very soon, in co-operation with the Stepney Labour Investigation Committee (a Sub-Committee of the Local Representation Committee), it set to work to establish an experimental workroom for British women resident in Stepney who had lost their employment directly owing to the War. An empty London County Council school in Cannon-street-road was rented and equipped as workrooms for making baby outfits and as a kitchen for teaching women plain cookery, and, incidentally, providing a substantial dinner and tea (at a total charge of 3d.) for the women employed. No girls under 16 years of age were admitted. This raises a problem which is mentioned later. Arrangements are being made to obtain an L.C.C. cookery mistress to give extra instruction on two afternoons a week. The baby outfits are of a very practical pattern, and include ingenious cradles made out of banana crates. Later on a separate scheme, working in with the cookery training scheme, was started to teach cutting-out and the making of old clothes into new ones. Each department of the workroom is in charge of a competent forewoman and assistant. The women employed are not taken on direct at the workroom itself, but are recommended by the local Relief Sub-Committees, of which there are five in Stepney, having regard to the normal earnings of the applicant and the

as a whole. A family income of over 25s. a week is generally regarded as an indication of opulence. The women receive 3d. and the majority of girls soon regained employment. The headmistress of a large school in Mile End recently questioned her girls as to how many of their elder sisters under 16 years of age were unemployed. Out of 350 families, only eight girls, mostly high-class dressmakers, were apparently out of work. The experience of the After-Care Committees seems to confirm this state of things. Much doubt exists in the minds of a number of people as to whether the Prince of Wales's and Queen Mary's Funds should be used for aliens. Anyone knowing Stepney realises that thousands of technically the majority Russian Poles, have not taken out naturalisation papers, having always regarded them as expensive luxuries. Many of these people have lived here for many years, secure in the sense of freedom and liberty often denied to them in their own country. Only lawyers could regard them as aliens, and no scheme for the relief of distress in Stepney is adequate which excludes them by some rigidly-worded definition. The Jewish Board of Guardians does excellent work, but it cannot be expected to deal with every marginal case which arises, and these are frequent. The Jewish Society for the Protection of Women and Girls has particularly cared for the protection of alien girls. At first the Society admitted any unemployed single women to its workrooms, and during the first weeks of the War its rooms were inconveniently crowded. Since then it has taken in only alien girls, but during the last few weeks many of them have found work, and the problem is assuming smaller proportions. Besides the official workroom, fourteen others have been opened, all run on a voluntary basis. Four of them give work out to homeworkers. Three are for girls under 16 years of age. One admits only wives of soldiers and sailors, and is more in the nature of a club. Two deal solely with Jewesses and alien and refugee women and girls, and the others admit as far as possible any woman who is in distress. Two of the workrooms have crèches attached. All make clothing of some description, mainly underclothing, shirts, Red Cross and soldiers and sailors' clothing. The conditions of admitting applicants vary very much. On November 10th the total number of women receiving work, whole or part-time, was 513. In the beginning of November the Stepney Distress Committee opened its

REGISTER FOR SINGLE WOMEN,

girls of 16 years and upwards, married women with incapacitated husbands, and widows. No local workroom has been opened by the Committee, the nearest ones being situated in Bow and Bermondsey, to which 34 women have been drafted from Stepney. In some respects the problems which we have had to face during the last few weeks in connexion with women's employment are those which normally exist. After the War women will have to seek work in order to supplement the casual earnings of their husbands in much the same way as during the War. Homework will still destroy the home life of a thousand unprecedented things with equanimity. Many of us from one reason and another are unable to go to the Front, but our sense of national unity is quickened. We talk of our national civilisation—cannot we do something of a permanent character to make it a reality to the wives and mothers of those who in various ways serve the cause of their country? These they await those who will collect the necessary information without which efforts are too often doomed to failure. The present situation has provided the necessary stimulus to induce people to extend personal help to women workers where otherwise it might not have been given. They have had an opportunity of realising in some small measure what the problems are. We only hope they will not desert us when the War is over. But underlying most of the problems of women's work in East London is the larger one of men's employment. Unemployment and underemployment of men, low wages and bad social conditions, all conspire to compel the women to accept even lower industrial conditions. Why not set up a Central Committee on Men's Employment? We shall need it to cope with unemployment arising out of Peace.

PUBLIC WORK AND WOMEN'S EMPLOYMENT.

RULES FOR THIS DEPARTMENT.

1. Letters of enquiry should be accompanied by the Public Work and Women's Employment Coupon, which will be found in the advertisement pages. The coupon must be duly filled up, and the letter be addressed to the Public Work and Women's Employment Editor, Queen Office, Bream's Buildings, London, E.C.

2. The Editor does not undertake to forward letters from one correspondent to another, but will endeavour to do so when the letter to be forwarded is sufficiently stamped, bears the pseudonym or initials of the addressee, and is enclosed under a separate cover addressed to the Public Work and Women's Employment Editor. Letters cannot be forwarded when more than a fortnight has elapsed since the publication of the Queen containing the pseudonym or initials of the addressee. An exception to this rule is only made on behalf of correspondents living at places more than a week's journey by post from London.

3. The Editor of this department does not send addresses or engage (save under circumstances which the Editor may deem exceptional) in private correspondence.

4. Difficulties which may be solved by advertising cannot be dealt with. The Editor, however, will gladly advise in all other matters connected with the subject in which guidance may be desired—such, e.g., as general education, special profession or technical training, conditions of tuition, and apprenticeship, openings for particular kinds of work, and where and how to set up in business.

5. Correspondents who forward trustworthy information respecting opportunities for women's public and voluntary work or remunerative employment will confer a benefit upon applicants to this department, for which the Editor will be much obliged.

TO CORRESPONDENTS.

PINK HAWTHORN.—Training in ambulance work.—You should apply to the secretary, St. John Ambulance Association, St. John's-gate, Clerkenwell, E.C., for full particulars of the society's examinations and course of training. Whether you work under the St. John Ambulance or the Red Cross scheme, you should make a point of taking a full course of three years' hospital training, so that you may become fitted afterwards for any nursing work that you may wish to undertake. Women with a slight knowledge of nursing, who do not get beyond the stage of first aid and ambulance work may be fairly useful as orderlies and in quite subordinate capacities, but will not after the war be in a position to say that they are members of the nursing profession or to earn their own living. To our thinking you do not need to leave Ireland for London, but could obtain an excellent training by entering one of the chief Dublin hospitals as an ordinary probationer.

THE PROGRESS OF EVENTS.

The New Hobson's Choice.

To BE killed but not to kill is the new version of Hobson's choice which the Germans have now forced upon the women of Great Britain. If an Englishwoman shoots in defence of herself, her children, and her home, she will not only be killed in return as though she were a soldier, but the Germans would hold themselve free to kill all other civilians of either sex in the place to which she belonged. On the other hand the Germans, as they have shown at Hartlepool and Scarborough, consider themselves perfectly at liberty to kill as many non-fighting women as their shells can reach. The only distinction which they would perhaps draw at this moment (though next week or next month they might not) is that they would not definitely aim at any individual woman who was not aiming at them; but if they could kill a few hundreds of women in the general scope of ostensibly other operations, so much the better.

This new development of the enemy's policy renders it obligatory on the Government to give women some definite work and duties in connection with the maintenance of national strength and with the work of national defence. A clear lead should be given, and women should be called upon to offer their services just as urgently as men are being daily called on to offer theirs. Women are waiting for the call and are eager to respond. But they cannot be satisfied to be left to be smashed to fragments ignominiously like the cattle grazing on the cliffs. They call for their work and their lives to be used and valued by the nation in the person of its Government in order that their deaths in this war may be honourable.

Supposing this great demand to be granted—as granted, eventually, it must be—there will come the question whether women are actually in the last resort to be enabled to fight or not. And attendant on this question will come many others, such as whether a woman should wait till she herself is attacked before she shoots, or whether she should wait till her children are attacked or threatened? On the replies to these questions many people are in doubt. Some extremists would perhaps be equal to saying that a woman should allow her only child to be killed sooner than try to kill its assailant. The great majority, however, have not yet seriously thought about the matter; there has been till now no urgent occasion for them to do so, and their minds are in fog.

At present among the women who demand some form of public enrolment for war service there are two parties—the party who wish women to be trained to shoot the enemy, as well as to maintain the strength of the Allies, and the party who would omit militant action from the duties of women. There is complete agreement among the two parties as to the need for women to be apportioned to posts of duty of many other kinds. Their place, from this point of view, would be in its way, similar to that of the army medical man, whose duty it is to preserve the life of his countrymen rather than to kill, and who, being engaged in work which is of high value to the army, is entitled to wear his khaki uniform. Why should we not, then, have in addition to our army medical women, and army nurses, army women cyclists to convey messages, and army women to make arrangements for billeting, and to do the catering and cooking for the canteens? If it is objected that in the course of the execution of these or other duties women would be exposed to difficulties and dangers, the reply seems to be that they are exposed to quite as great difficulties when they have no particular duties, and that from the dangers of warfare women are no longer protected. The events of Dec. 16 have deeply affected the views of women in regard to their place as non-combatants.

Army Needlewomen.

The military authorities might fairly be asked to employ paid needlewomen on principle rather than volunteers. The women in almost every English town visited by troops are suffering in pocket through the war. The women of some towns have lost their regular factory work; in others they have lost the luxury trades, and the more profitable dressmaking orders; in some of the university towns and winter watering places both the women lodging-house keepers and the laundresses are suffering cruelly. Some of these women might fairly be employed—and paid—to do the various kinds of needlework and clothes repairs which are wanted by soldiers. Why should not every military hospital have its mending workroom, where women under expert supervision would put the men's clothes in order? At present we hear complaints sometimes of men being given on leaving hospital the clothes in which they arrived, and in precisely the same miry, ragged condition. To a man who has risked his life for his country and gone through intense pain and discomfort, there must be a sense of hurt when he finds himself turned out of hospital to go home on leave in clothes that nobody has attempted to make tidy. Women in some places, rather than let these things be, offer to do the mending themselves gratuitously. But there can be no doubt that it would be far better if the War Office would allow the work to be done by regular needlewomen, and would pay them. The main reason why the country is not suffering economically by the war so much as was at first feared is that money is being diffused, through billeting, army contracts, &c., over a large mass of the industrial population. The point for which women should press is that this system should be carried out still further. Wherever and whenever possible the nation should employ paid workers for war needs and keep these people, as it were, in good "running repair," instead of leaving them to become social wreckage to be paid for as expensive derelicts.

Keeping Professional Women Going.

There still remains the question of keeping professional women in similar "running repair." The National Relief Committee might have been expected to start a scheme of employment for them. Such an undertaking was quite within its "terms of reference." But it has not done so. Then the Central Committee of Women's Employment was formed. T body, also, was not precluded from bringing help to professional women. It has done a good deal, and has started workrooms for needlewomen and others, and has done something to provide employment for clerks and typists. But it has shrunk from the difficulties—admittedly great—of the employment problem higher up in the scale of education and work. A large private society was then formed to help professional workers of both sexes, and the Local Government Board has formed a Professional Classes Sub-Committee. Meanwhile, the National Union of Women's Suffrage Societies, desiring to see something done and done quickly to utilise the services of professional women, has started a Professional Women's Patriotic Service Fund.

The idea of the union is to do for professional women what the Relief Fund's workrooms do for manual workers. This is to make a gift of paid labour. As the poor may be given garments made for them by paid needlewomen, so societies and institutions, the funds of which are small, may be given for a time the paid labour of a skilled professional woman. The idea ought to be applied with care; but it is certainly a good one. It has many merits. It enables a woman to maintain her skill and to earn her living; it enables some public service to be conducted much more efficiently than it could be by volunteers, and, thirdly, it leads the people who manage societies to recognise how desirable it is to employ a professional woman as secretary, organiser, or manager, and thus, later, to make an effort to raise the funds for this purpose.

Dealing with the question of rates of payment (which appears to have left some of the other committees quite bewildered) the National Union of Women's Suffrage Societies proposes courageously that the women employed shall be engaged at "the standard rate of pay already existing in the profession." This may be more easily said than ascertained; still, the fixing of the rate is not impossible. Indeed, it has been done by the Central Committee on Women's Employment, when they determined the wages they would pay to the women clerks supplied by them to the Soldiers' and Sailors' Families' Association. Moreover, they point out that, though it looks like a much cheaper and simpler business to pay needlewomen 10s. a week to make clothing, yet in practice the material has to be paid for also, and makes the cost of this particular undertaking mount up. The professional women will not require to have materials purchased. Moreover, the N.U.W.S.S. offers office accommodation and sufficient staff and equipment to carry out the work. There is the making of a success in this notion, and it is the first important, workable proposal that has been forthcoming.

WOMEN'S LOCAL GOVERNMENT ASSOCIATION.

(PADDINGTON BRANCH.)

To the Editor of THE SUNDAY TIMES.

Sir,—May I through the valuable medium of your paper make an appeal for our workrooms opened for women and girls at 51, Westbourne-terrace North.

The women receive a maintenance grant, and are employed in repairing, remodelling, and cleaning clothes which are forwarded to the Belgian refugees, all ready to wear.

The workrooms can be visited every day from 10 to 1, or 2 to 5 p.m., except Saturdays.

Funds are urgently needed, as our present resources will only last till the middle of January. Address, Hon. Treasurer, as above.—Yours, etc.,

K. L. EMPSON,
Chairman of Committee.

INCREASE OF UNEMPLOYED WOMEN.

Some idea of the distress caused by the war to women workers is shown by a return of the Stepney Distress Committee, which records 325 applicants for help as against only forty-seven last year and twenty-four the year before.

UNEMPLOYED TYPISTS AND CLERKS.

FROM OUR CORRESPONDENT.

LONDON, Tuesday Night

A large number of young lady typists and clerks formerly employed in the City having lost their situations through the war, the City Women's Unemployment Sub-Committee has arranged to give them useful occupation and training until better conditions prevail. Bridewell House, until recently a police station, has been lent to the committee by the Corporation, along with free light, furnishings, and a gift of £100 to make the place suitable as a polytechnic. Numerous rooms have been converted into comfortable, airy workshops and classrooms. The establishment also contained a laundry, a kitchen, and a dining hall. Lunch and tea are prepared on the premises and provided at a cost to the young women of 2d a day. Wages are paid at the rate of 10s a week of 40 hours, travelling expenses being allowed up to 4s a week. Although the committee has started with only 50 young women, it is intended to bring in 200 for training in commercial subjects, French, typewriting, shorthand, bookkeeping, dressmaking, and gymnastics. Ten industrial women will be occupied on the premises and trained in domestic economy, while 20 others will receive instruction to fit them as home helpers. The latter, who are to be women about 40, after preliminary training in household duties and infant care and hygiene, will continue work in the Home of the Sick in Bethnal Green. Unemployed city charwomen will also be trained in domestic economy to fit them for attending the sick poor. Much of the work done in the polytechnic will be unproductive, but the general scheme is in accordance with the recommendation approved by the Local Government Board and the Advisory Committee that assistance from the Women's Unemployment Branch of the National Relief Fund should support schemes in which training is the main object rather than economic production. Garments and other articles made at Bridewell House will be given away to the sick poor in the East End. A band of enthusiastic workers have lent their services to the training centre, including Mr. A. C. Horner, M.P., Mr. F. Brocklehurst Harper, chairman, Mrs. F. F. Horner, hon. organising secretary, and Miss Cecil, hon. secretary.

Business and Employment.

Some one has calculated that the total income of the population of these islands is about 2,300 millions a year—or, say, a pound a week for every man, woman, and child. This is a gigantic figure, and, if we suppose it to be approximately correct, it shows how comparatively light, provided that the income could be maintained, would be the burden of the war expenditure. Taking Mr. Lloyd George's estimate of 450 millions for a year's war, and supposing all were paid out of revenue, we should still have some 15s. a week for the maintenance of every individual. Of course, we know that the national income cannot be maintained in present circumstances. Some two million men, most of whom were wage-earners, have been withdrawn to take part in the economically unproductive business of fighting, and the employment of a vast number of the remaining workers has been temporarily destroyed or dislocated. The falling-off cannot be exactly calculated. Some idea of it may, however, be gathered from the annual return of the Bankers' Clearing House. In 1913 the amount of cheques cleared was 16,435 millions of pounds, or about seven times the estimated amount of the national income. In 1914 the amount cleared was 14,665 millions, a falling off of 1,771 millions. As there had been an increase in the clearings up to the end of July, the real diminution was considerably greater, and amounted to over 2,000 millions for the last five months. It was greatest in August, when the dislocation of business was most marked, and there had not been time to adjust it to the new conditions. But thenceforward there was a steady improvement, and by the end of the year the London clearings had reached about two-thirds of the usual amount, while the country clearings were very nearly normal. The decrease in London was largely attributable to the closing of the Stock Exchange.

Stockbrokers will be the last to feel the tide of returning prosperity. Even when the "House" re-opens speculative transactions will be quite rightly forbidden, while the volume of money available for investment will be immensely restricted by the demands of the tax-gatherer. But trade and manufacture are already looking up in many directions. Thanks to the silent sentinels in the North Sea, our maritime commerce is being carried almost as safely as usual, and shipowners and shipbrokers are reaping a rich harvest out of the increased freights. The war has put an end to German competition over a large part of the Continent, and in all the extra-European countries, and a considerable portion of the trade lost to our enemies is coming to ourselves. Then the requirements of our own troops and those of our Allies have given an enormous impetus to certain trades. The manufacturers of armaments, of boots, and of clothing have never been so busy. It would probably be an exaggeration to say that the activity in these directions makes up for the curtailment of people's expenditure in luxuries and semi-luxuries, but it has undoubtedly gone a great way to counterbalance it. Those people who minister chiefly to the needs of the rich and upper middle classes, and have been unable to adapt their machinery to meet the demands of the moment, are suffering considerable loss, but those who have a more general trade, and deal in articles needed by all classes alike, are doing very well.

This particularly applies to the small shopkeepers in our great cities, who cater for the working-classes. An ex-Cabinet Minister, who probably knows the humbler life of London as well as any man living, remarked in conversation the other day that he had never in all his experience known so little distress. The fact is partly due to the liberality of the separation-allowances which the public has rightly insisted upon giving to the wives of our brave soldiers. In the working-class home the woman is the Chancellor of the Exchequer, and rarely has she had such large sums to administer. With a clear pound a week a capable housewife can do wonders, and, with few exceptions, she has risen nobly to her opportunities. Never, perhaps, have the school children of our great cities been better fed and clothed than they are to-day. Another factor which has prevented distress is the adaptability of the average Briton. The increasing tendency to substitute machinery for manual labour may have some drawbacks, but it has, at least, the advantage that, in a time like the present, the minder of one kind of machine can easily be taught how to mind another. But even the manual workers have quickly adapted themselves to the new conditions. The makers of cheap jewellery have turned their hands to shell-fuses and other implements of war; dressmakers' assistants, accustomed to compose delicate "confections" for balls and dinner-parties, are now, like Sister Susie, "sewing shirts for soldiers." Even the women typewriters, thrown out of work by the closing of City offices, are finding compensation in the increased activity of some of the Government departments, and the starting of innumerable philanthropic agencies for the benefit of the soldiers and their dependents. Unemployment has fallen to a minimum, and it may be said that there is a place for everyone except the incurably work-shy. The London Docks used to be the refuge of the destitute labourer. To-day they are congested with goods, although some 2,000 more hands are employed than was the case a year ago. In a word, under the stress of war, England is becoming a better organised nation. Let us hope that the improvement will remain, long after the cause has been removed.

Daily Call, Jan. 5th. 1915.

Of course, the great majority of women and girls thrown out of employment by the war are not "expert" milliners and dressmakers, but nearly all can do plain sewing and repairing. If they cannot, then the various ladies' associations will be glad to teach them. Now, if kindly women will inspect their wardrobes and boxes and pick out what needs renovating, "making over," and mending, and then send to one of the committees for seamstresses to to do the work, that will be an act of sisterly love. They are not asked to pay more than the usual wage, but no doubt their hearts will prompt them to treat wars' victims with every consideration, especially in the matter of good and nourishing food. Please remember madame, that the girl you employ may not have had a regular meal for days or weeks, and that, after she leaves your house, she may have to go without proper food for more days to come. Drop in at the Chelsea workrooms, at the Court Theatre, and hear more about the matter.

EMPLOYMENT.

During the first seven months of the year the number of members of trade unions who were unemployed remained fairly steady, but on the whole the figures were not so good as in the previous year, and during June and July there was a distinct increase. The Board of Trade statistics published every month in the "Labour Gazette" show the following results for the past six years:—

Percentage of unemployed at end of each month in	1909.	1910.	1911.	1912.	1913.	1914.
January	8.7	6.8	3.9	2.7	2.2	2.6
February	8.4	5.7	3.3	2.8	2.0	2.3
March	8.2	5.2	3.0	11.3	1.9	2.1
April	8.2	4.4	2.8	3.6	1.7	2.1
May	7.9	4.2	2.5	2.7	1.9	2.3
June	7.9	3.7	3.0	2.5	1.9	2.4
July	7.9	3.8	2.9	2.6	1.9	2.8
August	7.7	4.0	3.3	2.2	2.0	7.1
September	7.4	4.3	2.9	2.1	2.3	5.9
October	7.1	4.4	2.8	2.0	2.2	4.4
November	6.5	4.6	2.6	1.8	2.0	2·9
December	6.6	5.0	3.1	2.3	2.6	—

It will be observed that, as in 1913, the figures for the first six months were remarkably steady. There has also been a marked absence of labour upheavals, although the disturbance in the building trade lasted a long time. As already pointed out, the figures show that a slight setback was in progress before the war broke out, due to the general decline in trade which was becoming evident in many quarters. That the effect of an outbreak of a European war did not have so much effect on the figures as did the coal strike in 1912, when in April the percentage reached 11.3, is remarkable. The percentage unemployed at the end of August was 7.1, representing 69,956 members of trade unions with a net membership of 987,692. Since then the figure has steadily declined. At the beginning of December the Board of Trade issued a report on the state of employment since the outbreak of war, the result of exhaustive inquiries amongst employers in various industries. The report was compiled from returns from nearly 10,000 large industrial concerns (i.e., employing more than 100 persons) and from 10,600 small industrial firms (less than 100). The numbers employed in July by the firms whose returns were tabulated amounted to over 4,000,000 persons, compared with 3,300,000 persons employed by the firms whose returns were tabulated in September. According to the 1911 census nearly 9,250,000 persons were occupied in these industries; the investigation therefore covers about 43 per cent of the industrial population.

The first effect of the outbreak of war was an abrupt and considerable curtailment of production. Orders both in home and foreign trade were withheld or cancelled, large numbers of factories went on short time, and in a number of cases employees were given a provisional notice of discharge. By September, however, it had become clearer in most industries how far markets were likely to be restricted, and in many cases factories resumed their normal working. The returns for September showed that the reduction of employment amounted to 10¼ per cent in the case of males and 8½ per cent in the case of females. In the case of males enlistment and the calling up of reservists reduced this contraction to the comparatively small proportion of 1½ per cent. In October there was a continued improvement except in one or two trades, brought about by the recovery of confidence at home, increase of export trade, and the immense industrial activity induced by the placing of large war contracts. By the middle of October the progress of recruiting had equalled the reduction of employment of males due to the war, while the unemployment of females was appreciably less than in September.

MALES.

	September. Per cent.	October. Per cent.
Employed in July	100	100
Still on full time	60.2	66.8
On overtime	3.6	5.2
On short time	26.0	17.3
Contraction of employment	10.2	10.7
Joined the Forces	8.8	10.6
Net displacement	1.4	0.1

FEMALES.

	September. Per cent.	October. Per cent.
Employed in July	100	100
Still on full time	53.5	61.9
On overtime	2.1	5.9
On short time	36 0	26.0

Thus while overtime had increased slightly, the proportion on short time fell by about 8 per cent in the case of males and by 10 per cent in the case of females. The high proportion of females on short time is largely due to the cotton trade, which, it should be noted, was already working short time to a considerable extent before the war. The reduction of employment is rather greater in small firms than in large firms, but in both cases conditions were better in October than in September. In the case of males the figures show that at the end of October there was very little abnormal unemployment at all, since in many cases the contraction of employment in small firms, over and above those joining the colours, has been offset by the filling of vacancies in the larger firms.

The statistics for various industries show that the trades most affected were the cotton trade and the furniture trade, the later an important London industry. The actual contraction of employment was most marked in the furniture trade, but short time was greater in the cotton trade—40 per cent in large and 40.3 per cent in small firms in the case of males and 42.3 per cent in large and 45.5 per cent in small firms in the case of females. In the woollen and worsted trades many features were the same as in the cotton trade, but the former were relieved more than any industry by Government contracts. In the large firms in Yorkshire there were in the middle of October 24.1 per cent of the males and 22.2 per cent of the females on overtime and 12.2 per cent of the males and 13.9 per cent of the females on short time. Other trades showing a gross contraction of 10 per cent or more among the males employed were:—

In the cycle and motor trades many men have found Government employment, other than with the forces, as, for example, in the Arsenal and as drivers and mechanics with the Expeditionary Force.

The final table shows the contraction of employment and the effect of recruiting, &c. in each Labour Exchange division in the form of percentages of the numbers employed in July:—

(Number employed in July =100.)

Division.	Males. Contraction of employment. Per cent.	Males. Known to have joined the Forces. Per cent.	Males. Net displacement (−) or replacement (+) Per cent.	Females. Contraction of employment. Per cent.
London	13.7	10.3	−3.4	7.0
South-Eastern	15.2	12.9	−2.3	4.9
South-Western	10.4	13.2	+2.8	3.3
West Midlands	10.2	11.0	+0.8	2.3
East Midlands	9.2	8.1	−1.1	1.4
Yorkshire	8.0	8.1	+0.1	3.1
North-Western	12.6	9.3	−3.3	12.0
Wales	9.6	10.8	+1.2	2.2
Northern	7.7	11.1	+3.4	3.2
Scotland	10.9	13.2	+2.3	4.5
Ireland	9.0	9.8	+0.8	2.6

The outstanding features here are the variations in the recruiting percentage in different parts of the country and the comparatively small reductions of employment among women, except in Lancashire, and to a less extent in London.

The report implies that as a whole there is now no margin of the unemployed from whom additional recruits may be drawn, and that any further extensive withdrawal of labour for enlistment would put many vital industries in jeopardy.

Training Unemployed Women.

A most excellent use has been found for one of the police stations which has been closed owing to the remarkable diminution in crime in the City of London. Bridewell House, off New Bridge Street, has become a polytechnic for young women formerly employed as clerks and typists in the City, and who have lost their situations through the war. The building is commodious, with large and airy rooms, where stalwart constables formerly were quartered. Thanks to the generosity of the City Corporation and other kind friends, it is now admirably adapted to its new purpose, which is that of a training centre in commercial subjects, French, typewriting, shorthand, book-keeping, dressmaking, and gymnastics for 200 business women, and in domestic economy for ten industrial women, while 20 other industrial women will be trained as home helpers. London County Council teachers are to give lessons to the young typists, and a certified dressmaker will teach them how to cut their own patterns and make their own clothes. The girls chosen for the training are mostly young, with very little experience, and it is hoped to make them into competent clerks. They will be paid 10s a week of 30 hours, and travelling expenses up to 4s a week, and their dinner and tea will cost them only twopence a day. The schemes are approved by the Central Committee on Women's Employment, and financed by the Queen's Fund. They are under the management of the Women's Unemployed Sub-Committee for the City, of which the Organising Secretary is Miss E. E. Morton, daughter of Mr A. C. Morton, M.P. for Sutherland, and the Chairman, Mr F. Brinsley-Harper.

LEARNING TYPEWRITING AT BRIDEWELL.

Bridewell, which has been discarded by the City Police, and now exhibits a "to let" sign, has been put to a new use, and is at present the scene of great activity.

It has been lent by the Corporation of the City of London to the Women's Employment Sub-Committee for the City of London, and within its walls may be seen daily between 150 and 200 girls and women above the age of eighteen receiving instruction from London County Council teachers in book-keeping, shorthand, French, English, commercial arithmetic, typewriting, and hygiene.

Teachers of dressmaking have also been provided by the sub-committee.

The old Bridewell was a palace presented by Edward VI. to the City.

It afterwards became a prison, wherein City apprentices were frequently lowed to repent their misdemeanours.

STATE OF EMPLOYMENT

War's Effect on Various Trades.

STEADY IMPROVEMENT.

Calls Made on the Relief Committee.

It appeared to be the general opinion amongst the heads of the various departments in the work of the Manchester War Relief Committee, as expressed at a meeting of the latter, held in the Lord Mayor's Parlour yesterday, that the state of unemployment in consequence of the war was becoming less serious.

The Lord Mayor (Alderman D. M'Cabe) presided, and it was reported that trade had remained about the same since the last report was published, except that the home and shipping trades had improved. No marked change in the export trade was to be expected just yet.

Inquiries amongst the societies of warehouse hands showed that the position was still unsatisfactory, but an inquiry made by the Manchester and Salford Trades Council respecting the various skilled trades revealed the fact that there was a notably small proportion of totally unemployed. Of 13,068 members of societies providing information, only 784, or 6 per cent., were returned as totally unemployed. However, there was a preponderance of partial employment, as many as 3,258 persons, or nearly 25 per cent. (men and women), being employed at less than the ordinary number of hours each week. The average weekly hours of partially employed persons were about 25.

It was significant that societies embracing 45 per cent. of the total members covered by the inquiry reported "no change" or "slight improvement," as compared with July 31. These societies were connected with such occupations as ring spinning, wire drawing, railway work, machine work, shop employment, leather work, and brass work.

Certain branches of the book printing and binding trades and cotton industry seemed to have been most heavily affected at the beginning, whilst for a time makers-up and packers suffered heavily. The worst reports came from the lithographic printers, the tailors, who said their trade had never been worse, the engravers, and block cutters and stampers.

Reports from the Labour Exchange stated that the general condition of employment compared favourably with conditions for the last four years, and that the position had been improving to such an extent that the applications for employment during the past week were 407 less than a fortnight ago, whilst during the week ended December 4 only 200 claims for unemployment benefit were paid compared with an average of 460 for the year. Owing to the necessities of the Government the demand for joiners and men employed in engineering works was in excess of the supply.

Position of Women.

The report added that in almost every male occupation the state of employment tended to be better than in corresponding periods of previous years, and this was attributable to the number of men who had enlisted, and the way in which civil workers had otherwise acceded to the demands of the Government. In respect to women the position was not so satisfactory, and although the number of unemployed on the register had decreased by 120 it was still greater to the extent of 293 than in the corresponding period of last year.

Attempts to persuade cotton operatives to transfer to the Yorkshire woollen mills had met with little success, owing to the objections which many had to taking up work other than that to which they are accustomed, and to moving outside the Manchester area. About 100 women were being placed each week by the Labour Exchange, and the women's workrooms were finding employment for about 200.

It had been shown by inquiry that of 2,012 women in trades exclusively for women only 156 were unemployed, but 1,502 women were partially unemployed.

The Unemployment Relief Sub-committee reported that up to and including December 5 last they received 18,121 applications of which 12,128 were granted. The number of grants distributed was 74,015, and at an average cost of 6s. 2d. amounted to £22,951 14s.

Alderman Holt gave a report on the work of the Soldiers' and Sailors' Families' Association, in which he stated that there had been 100,000 applications to the local committee, and of these 40,000 had been granted. There had been a continuous reduction of numbers and in the amount of payments since the last week in September, until this week, when, owing to the departure from the district of the 5th, 6th, 7th, and 8th City Battalions, there had been an increase in numbers to the extent of £500 in the expenditure. The sum of £4,280 had been paid out in separation allowances, and of that amount only £50 had been so far recovered.

Local Relief Work.

Sir Thomas Shann stated that since the commencement of the work of the local relief committee, out of 20,000 applications received, 13,000 had been relieved at a total cost of £29,000. The number of meals supplied to mothers and young children continued to increase, 31,000 having been given to mothers and 27,500 to children at a total cost of £815. There was a decrease in the number of meals served to children since December 8, and returns showed that the Education Committee had provided 727,000 meals during the past year, against 244,000 for the previous year. Up to date 12,400 dinners had been supplied by various cafés on Sundays.

A statistical report of the Manchester local fund stated that the various items of expenditure included—£28,738 11s. for provisions for unemployed persons, £815 11s. 11d. in food for mothers and children, £986 18s. 7d. in wages and insurance contributions of temporary assistants of the Unemployed Relief Sub-committee and refreshment, £187 4s. 9d. for a similar purpose in respect to the Voluntary Workers' Sub-committee, £537 in wages and the insurance contributions for the Women's Unemployment Sub-committee, and £128 7s. 8d. for incidental expenses. There was a balance in hand of £27,096 0s. 5d.

Manchester Courier, Jan. 8th 1915.

SPECIAL EMPLOYMENT FOUND FOR DEPENDENTS.

The efforts which are being made in Manchester for the provision of work for women who have been thrown out of employment on account of the war were reported to the Manchester Relief Committee yesterday by Mrs. Smith, Secretary of the Women's Employment Sub-Committee. The principal work which the Committee have undertaken was that of doll dressing at the workroom, which was opened by the Committee at 1, Police-street, and for which work a loan of £160 was granted out of the Local Relief Fund.

This workroom has employed 30 workers and two forewomen since October 19th last in the premises at 1, Police-street, Manchester, which were kindly lent free of charge by Messrs. Kendal, Milne and Co.

The Women's Sub-Committee draw attention to the fact that for a period of 11 weeks, from October 19th to 31st December, 40 women have been kept employed for varying periods and paid at the rate of 10s. per week until they obtained other work. These women were all unemployed through the war, and would— except for the workroom—have been in receipt of war relief from the Unemployment Sub-Committee, at a cost of about £100. In addition to this fact, some of the women employed during his period have received a training, whilst others have become more skilled, results which cannot be measured in pounds, shillings and pence. That the results from this point of view have been beneficial, the Sub-committee add, is proved by the fact that several of the workers have been able to obtain employment in the particular trade taught at this room, and of these some have obtained situations at a higher rate of wages than previously.

The tin shops attached to the great wholesale provision factories fulfilling Government contracts have never been so busy as they are now, every man and boy who can handle a soldering iron being assured of employment. The extraordinary pressure has, indeed, led one well-known firm to train women and girls for the more mechanical side of the work. Each tin requires to be soldered at the top, bottom, and the side seam, and to be provided with a self-opening tongue, the cutting of the latter being entrusted to the girls. So great is the demand for tins that, so far as the home trade is concerned, firms are preferring to pack in glass, even at a reduced profit.

SHORTAGE OF WORKERS.

Facts Gleaned From the Trade Unions

IN BUSY MANCHESTER

Wages Showing an Upward Tendency.

The war has not resulted—at any rate, so far as Manchester is concerned—in the large amount of unemployment that was predicted by the wise-acres at the outset.

An improvement is reported all round by secretaries of trade unions and other organisations dealing with labour problems, and the outlook is officially spoken of in quite optimistic terms.

Reviewed generally, a Daily Dispatch representative was informed yesterday in Manchester, the number of persons out of work in men's trades is abnormally low, and in many unions there has been a big decrease since the outbreak of war in the number of members on the funds. The Workers' Union describes the decrease in unemployment due to the war as remarkable, and in the Manchester district, which includes Lancashire, Cheshire, and North Wales, the volume of unemployment is returned as nil.

Lack of work among the organised carpenters and joiners in Manchester at present is stated to be practically an unknown thing. The engineering trade, too, is reported to be in a prosperous state, and the margin of unemployment, always visible in peace time, namely between 2 and 3 per cent., has nearly disappeared since the military operations commenced.

Search for Grocers' Assistants.

According to the Amalgamated Union of Co-operative Employers the war has resulted in a pronounced shortage of assistants for the grocery and provision trades in Manchester and throughout the whole country. Manchester possesses eight co-operative societies, in connection with which there is a joint board composed of directors drawn from each of the societies. This board has appealed to the A.U.C.E. to obtain for them a considerable number of grocers' assistants, but, despite the efforts made to meet the application, there are still many unfilled posts.

The union, in addition to reporting that the war has caused the absorption of all its unemployed members, states that wages show a distinct upward tendency, the increase being as much as five shillings a week.

In regard to other trades and occupations it is found that the demand exceeds the supply of workers in the joinery trade, engineering trade, among Government workers, carters, general labourers, builders' labourers, foundry labourers, and engineers' labourers.

With regard to Manchester's women workers, several interesting facts were gleaned by our representative. The Corporation inspectors, who visited 592 outworkers last month, discovered only thirteen cases of distress. Among other women workers an improvement was noticed. The Women's Labour Exchange reports a distinct advance in the demand for workers extending over a large number of trades. In approximately 200 private houses in Manchester domestic servants with good references are required, but the demand is unsatisfied. Half a hundred hotel "hands" are also wanted.

Some half-dozen of the trade unions catering solely for female workers state that there is at present no permanent unemployment in their ranks, and that trade prospects are bright. Machinists and others are needed in the shirt and jacket trade.

The labour position in Manchester, as affected by the war, was summed up in the following by a trade union secretary: "There is little cause for grumbling on our part."

To Prevent Unemployment.

It is one of the features of war time that the whole energy and thought of the Government is necessarily taken up with the business of carrying on the war. Emergency legislation, and emergency administration, become essential, and their inconveniences are endured with resignation by the people, because their necessity is admitted. Expedients which would arouse a storm of opposition as "Socialistic" at one end of the scale, or "autocratic" at the other, pass almost without criticism, and practically unopposed. We desire, now, to plead that such measures should be taken not only for the protection and regulation of finance, but also in the interests of industry.

At a recent meeting in London, Sir George Pragnell urged that if the same steps had been taken to avoid unemployment as had been taken to tide over the financial crisis, an enormous amount of distress might have been avoided. Unemployment, as he truly said, has been due not to lack of work, but to the dislocation of industry. Such industries as suffered from real shortage were largely relieved by recruiting as far as the men were concerned; while huge orders for army clothing and other necessaries, created by the war, might, with due care, have been placed in such a way as to give employment to the rest of the men and to the women. The work was there. It was only a question of spreading it over the right areas.

It is, of course, true that such a shifting of employment could not have been effected without difficulty. Human beings cannot be drafted off from one industry, to which they have been trained, to another for which they have no training at all, without loss. But we have to consider not an economic ideal, but a choice of several difficult plans. As things stood, we had a large number of women—many of them skilled workers in the cotton trade—working on half-time, or altogether unemployed; while others, mostly in the woollen industry, were working the most appalling hours, with factory legislation suspended, and overtime regulations gone by the board, in order to keep up with the enormous orders placed by the Government for army clothing. The economic result (to speak of that only) is a large number of workers starved into inefficiency by unemployment, and another large number destroyed by over-work. This is a problem whose disastrous results will outlast the war, for these women are the mothers of children.

The Government has done wonders with our railways and our finance. And these wonders have been done because the interests concerned were put into the hands of experts. We strongly urge the same treatment for unemployment. A committee of experts—not philanthropists or Government officials or retired army men, but experts in industrial organisation—should be appointed to deal with the whole matter. As a very large proportion of unemployment is among women, there should be women on the board; women representing employed as well as employers, and women from those who have already gained experience on the Queen's Work for Women Fund. As, however, most large businesses are in the hands of men, men with this experience should be there also; and men, again, from the ranks of labour. Such a committee would be competent to deal with the question of industrial dislocation with real knowledge of the obstacles and the possibilities. They would know how far—and how quickly—it is possible to draft workers from one industry to another, and which branch of a new industry would be most congenial to which workers. It is, for instance, notoriously easier to train a highly skilled worker to a new form of skill, than an unskilled to a skilled trade; but there are degrees even here. It would be easier to turn a cotton operative into a woollen worker—both accustomed to factory life and factory conditions—than either of them into a cook; just as it would probably be better to make a dressmaker into a milliner than either into a clerk. We take crude instances, but they serve to show the kind of knowledge our body of experts would require to deal with this matter with the least human and economic loss. They should also be able to decide how each worker was to be maintained during the period of training, for if we are to "cut our losses" it is better to spend money on the maintenance of workers for a short time, than to have their efficiency permanently lowered by unemployment or over-work.

The period of acute economic distress seems for the time to be passing. But both unemployment and overwork still exist and cause intense suffering to women, and through them to their children. Nor do we know at what moment the problem may become intensified, or how long war conditions will last. We plead, therefore, most earnestly that the Government should do for industry what it has done with such admirable effect for banking and for transport, and put the matter for the time being into the hands of experts.

LITTLE DISTRESS IN MANCHESTER.

SATISFACTORY REPORT BY EXPERTS.

WOMEN WELL EMPLOYED.

The condition of trade in Manchester, according to a report compiled by the Town Clerk (Mr. T. Hudson) and Professor S. J. Chapman, continues fairly satisfactory under the circumstances. The report, which was presented to the Manchester Relief Committee yesterday, stated that the general state of employment was reported by the Labour Exchange to be good and to compare favourably with conditions for the last four years. The position had been improving. The applications for employment during the past week were 407 less than a fortnight ago. In insured trades the number of claims for unemployment benefit had come down enormously since the latter end of August.

For the week ending December 4th two hundred claims were paid, compared with an average of 460 for the year. In some occupations—joiners and men employed in engineering works—the demand was in excess of the supply, due to Government work. In almost every male occupation the state of employment tended to be better than in corresponding periods of previous years. The result was attributed to the number of men who had enlisted and to the demands of the Government.

As regarded women, the position was not satisfactory. Compared with a fortnight ago, the number on the register had decreased by one hundred and twenty, but it was still two hundred and ninety-three more than in the corresponding period last year.

The following details relating to various occupations bear out these points:

Clerks.—Good demand during last fortnight and supply about equal.

Engineers.—Large demand for machinists and turners. The supply has been inadequate for some time, and remains so.

Joiners.—Demand which has been exceedingly good recently fell off; but applications had now arrived for many joiners for Wales for the purpose of erecting huts for troops, etc.

Labourers and Carters.—The demand for carters, general labourers, builders' labourers, foundry and engineers' labourers exceeds the supply.

Warehouse Workers.—The position is still unsatisfactory.

Cloth Porters.—Some improvement, but far from satisfactory. The average wage on Friday last was 13s., but a fortnight ago it was 10s. 7½d.

For other classes of workmen on the register, the position may be regarded as normal compared with previous years.

With regard to women, the Corporation inspectors visited 582 out-workers and found only 13 cases of distress. These cases existed principally among women engaged upon inferior classes of work. Among the other workers an improvement was noticed, which is largely, though not entirely, attributed to the work resulting from good orders. The Women's Labour Exchange reports a distinct advance in the demand for workers extending over a large number of trades.

Attempts to persuade cotton operatives to transfer to the Yorkshire woollen mills have met with little success. The obstacles are the objection which many girls and women have to taking up work other than that to which they are accustomed, and the objection to moving outside the Manchester area.

About a hundred women are being placed each week by the Labour Exchange. This number represents rather more than normal activity for the period of the year. The demand for domestic servants in private houses keeps up. There are now about sixty vacancies in private houses for servants with good references. Places could also be found for about 40 hotel hands.

Dundee Courier, Jan: 9th. 1915.

DUNDEE SOCIETIES TACKLE

QUESTION OF PROVIDING WORK FOR WOMEN.

A scheme for the provision of work for women and girls out of employment in Dundee on account of the war was inaugurated yesterday.

The question was under the consideration of two societies, but every care is to be taken to prevent overlapping.

A Sub-Committee of the Women's Employment Committee of the Prince of Wales' Central Executive discussed the advisability of opening workrooms to relieve distress, but after carefully considering the whole situation it was felt that there was not sufficient evidence of unemployment to justify any action. It was agreed, however, to recommend the Central Executive to apply for a grant from the Scottish Committee on Women's Employment to develop the existing toy industry recently established in the city by the Women's War Relief Fund.

Cases for Consideration.

The Dundee Advisory Board of the Scottish Council for Women's Trade afterwards met. Mr James Thomson, who presided, explained that the meeting had been called to decide whether they should provide work for women in unorganised trades who were either wholly or partially unemployed. He pointed out that Glasgow had already tackled this problem, and had opened three centres for work. The Local Government Board had recognised the work by giving grants, and they in Dundee were anxious to see if they could not do something on the same lines.

The Rev. A. C. Mackenzie said, while it was extremely gratifying that the staple industry was practically normal, at the same time they would admit that since the war began there had been a certain dislocation of business, resulting on the one hand in the dismissal of employees, and on the other hand in the non-employment of new workers. It was the casual cases that would require most careful consideration and thought.

He submitted a resolution to the effect that, in view of the dislocation in certain departments of business due to the war, with consequent unemployment or under-employment for women and girls, they resolve to co-operate with others, or, if need be, to originate and organise such temporary work for women and girls as might be considered necessary.

No Competition.

Canon Turner, who seconded, said he did not think they were beginning too soon with the scheme. He added that they would not be competing with any other industries.

Miss Husband said that whatever they did they would have to keep clear of what had already been done in the city. There was no doubt there was an opening for a workroom.

The Chairman said they did not want to run counter to any work that had been started.

Miss Henderson asked if they had definite information which would lead them to think that it was necessary to open a workroom, as the Women's Employment Committee, after carefully considering the whole situation, came to the conclusion that they could not recommend the opening of a workroom.

Mr Mackenzie said that, from his own knowledge, he could contribute as many instances of unemployment and under-employment as they began with in Edinburgh, where they started with a very limited number indeed. For five months the labour market had been in a state of unrest, and girls belonging to working-class families who were just preparing to enter on work had been held back.

Miss Husband thought there was quite definite work for the Board to do.

The resolution was adopted, and a committee was appointed to consider and report upon the best methods of carrying the objects into practical effect with the least possible delay.

City of London Advertiser, Jan: 9th. 1915.

EMPLOYMENT OF WOMEN.

We must all sympathise with the devoted efforts of those ladies who, under the presidency of her Majesty the Queen, have been organising a fund to provide work for women. But at the same time we cannot forget that there is a field of employment open to women in which the supply of workers is never equal to the demand. We have never been able to understand the prejudice which appears to exist against domestic service, which, as a field of employment for women, is in every way superior to the workroom, the shop, the factory, or even the office. By some strange freak of human nature, domestic service has been left largely to a class of inefficients who have it in their power to create constant irritation and friction in the home. A glance in the advertisement columns of any daily paper will show the immense demand for this class of workers, and the supply is so inadequate that even the least efficient can demand better terms of employment than can be obtained in any shop or workroom.

Unfortunately no successful attempt has ever been made to organise this form of employment. The registry offices supply the names of applicants for employment, but the would-be employers have to hunt them up and undertake all the negotiations. Even where references are forthcoming they are frequently delusive, and the interval between engagement and dismissal is often a matter of days, even when the servant does not desert her post for some trifling reason.

We would suggest, therefore, that some part of the Queen's Fund might be devoted to the training of really efficient domestic servants, and we are quite confident that there would be no difficulty whatever in finding employment for them. The charitable public can hardly be expected to pay for the establishment of special workrooms and the creation of artificial forms of employment when they are unable to obtain the service which they require in their own homes, even when they are willing to pay high wages for it.

The Glasgow News, Jan 11th. 1915.

UNEMPLOYED WOMEN.

Glasgow Distress Committee have found that the toymaking workrooms which they have provided for the employment of women, who are at present out of work, are not sufficient to meet the requirements of the various classes who apply. They have been given permission, however, by the Local Government Board to enter into arrangements with suitable existing agencies in Glasgow for affording employment to women for whom the Distress Committee are responsible. The Scottish Council for Women's Trades are quite willing, according to arrangement to give employment to 40 women from the Distress Committee for three months. Edinburgh Distress Committee have agreed to the scheme, and it is expected that at to-morrow's meeting the Glasgow body will also approve of the sub-committee's recommendation.

Daily Sketch, Jan: 12th. 1915.

WOMEN HAVE SUFFERED MOST.

Unemployment Not So Serious As Some People Feared.

Fears of a widespread dislocation of trade entertained by some people at the beginning of the war have, happily, not been realised.

Unemployment, the Local Government Board reports, has proved much less serious than was anticipated, and unemployed labour has, as far as possible, been absorbed in schemes of useful work, the cost of which is chargeable on public funds.

It has been unnecessary to make demands on the National Relief Fund for the relief of distress. The total amount of grants recommended up to the date of the report was £152,226.

Women have felt the effects of the war on employment more severely than men.

The Scotsman, Jan: 9th. 1915.

LADY BANK CLERKS.

186-188 Bishopsgate,
London, E.C., January 7, 1915.

SIR,—I have read with interest the paragraph in your issue of the 2nd inst. as to lady bank clerks, and I hope it will be read and well considered by all bank clerks. One result of the war has undoubtedly been that whereas male clerks displaced in some quarters have, as a rule, been able to fill vacancies created by enlistment, in other quarters the large number of women clerks who have lost their positions through the war have found considerable difficulty in obtaining fresh positions, and for them the innovation forced by circumstances upon some of the banking houses is very fortunate.

There is evidence, however, that the banks are not paying the lady typists whom they are now engaging anything like the same salaries they formerly paid for the same work, and unless some steps are taken to counteract this tendency to underpayment, the ultimate result will probably be a displacement of men by women at lower rates of pay.

With this class of work there can be no question that women can be found quite as competent as any of the men. The only safeguard which the male bank clerk has is that of organisation, and to be effective this must take the form of combination with his fellow-clerks, male and female, in the commercial world from which these substitutes are drawn.—I am, &c.

FRED. HUGHES, Asst. General Secretary.

Scottish Mercury, Jan: 9th.

There are considerably over 7,000 women unemployed in Blackburn through the war. A great number of them are already engaged making articles of clothing for the poor at a special centre, and as a grant has since been received from the Queen Mary's Fund, it was decided on Wednesday night to extend the work by opening a second workroom immediately.

Glasgow Herald, Jan: 12th. 1915

AID FOR UNEMPLOYED WOMEN.

The question of unemployment among women has been engaging the attention of the Glasgow Burgh Distress Committee. Some time ago a deputation waited upon the Local Government Board, and urged the necessity for action being taken to enable the committee to provide work for the women who applied to the committee for assistance. Sir George M'Crae, in his reply to the deputation, stated that the principal objection, in his opinion, to toy-making workrooms was the limited employment that it could give, and the committee would be faced with the question of providing other classes of work for, say, charwomen and others. He thought, taking into account the whole circumstances, that the committee would be well advised to come to an arrangement with some of the agencies of existing workrooms to take cases from the Distress Committee which had been passed as eligible for assistance under the Act. Acting upon this suggestion, the Distress Committee have accepted an offer from the Scottish Council for Women's Trades to give employment in cases for which the committee are responsible. Under the agreement the Scottish Council for Women's Trades will receive 40 women at their workrooms. The scheme has been in operation for about a week, and already 20 women have been given work.

Northern Daily Telegraph, Jan: 12th 1915.

Table Talk.

Since the inauguration of workrooms for unemployed women in Burnley the sub-committee and the local Distress Committee have repeatedly received applications for work from young persons whose ages kept them outside the scheme. As a result of a request to the central committee in London, a new scheme will come into operation shortly under which girls of from 14 to 16 may receive some benefit. They will be engaged 30 hours per week, 15 in one of the workrooms and the rest in a class, in which they will receive instruction in such subjects as cooking, hygiene, millinery, &c. The Director of Education has promised to see to the latter part of the scheme being carried into effect, whilst the directors of the Mechanics' Institute will provide accommodation in that building for the employment of 50 girls.

Manchester Despatch, Jan 9th 1915

WOMEN BEHIND THE COUNTER

In regard to the employment of women in the grocery trade, the Manchester Women's Council of the Shop Assistants' Union have passed a resolution urging their Executive Committee "to adopt the equal pay for equal work basis for the minimum wage in the grocery trade."

"Only by doing this," they state, "can we battle with the undercutting of wages in this particular trade, as women inevitably will take a greater share of employment in this trade in the near future."

TYPISTS: HOW THEY ARE AFFECTED IN WAR TIME.

George M'Adam, 55 and 57 Shandwick Place, writes: I observed in your issue of Saturday's date an informative article entitled "Edinburgh in War Time." It is interesting to learn how the war affects various industries, and the writer deals ably and fully with the subject. I feel in duty bound, however, to question one of his statements. He says that typists, among others were adversely affected by the war, after the outbreak of which there was a greatly "decreased demand" for their services. I do not know where the writer of the article got his information, but it is at so much variance with my own experience, and I understand the experience of others who are, like myself, engaged in training girls for this occupation, that I venture to ask for fuller details. If he had stated that a few typists, owing to the shrinkage in certain businesses, had lost their positions I could have agreed with him, but where one door was thus closed two were opened. My experience has been that, at no previous time has there been so much activity in filling posts for typists as since the war began. If we give but the slightest consideration to the matter we can easily understand how this comes about. The military demand for young men has denuded our offices to a large extent of their help, and as our motto is "Business as usual" such assistance as girls can efficiently give is being made use of. As the shorthand-typist's occupation is one in which girls, as a rule, excel, there need be no surprise that at the present critical time their services are in greater demand than ever before. The military authorities themselves have absorbed a large number of such workers, and I know of several large insurance, chartered accountants, and commercial offices in Edinburgh which have increased their staffs of typists.

WAR DISTRESS.

WORK FOR WOMEN SCHEMES.

Since the war a new movement for women has been developed—no small matter in any interest, although previous schemes have been mere experiments or temporary expedients, while the present openings are promises of a permanent work in the coming. At present only comparatively small beginnings are being made, but these have been planned on sound business-like lines, which have taken the desirability and probability of expansion into account.

To-day there is being opened in the Sportsmouth a woman's workroom which is fitted with twenty power machines, and the object of which is the training of young women and girls so that they may pass from the overcrowded ranks of the unskilled into those of the skilled women workers for whom, even at present, the demand is greater than can be supplied. These girls will receive in addition to the standard wage a meal of soup, meat, and tea or meat, pudding, and tea at a cost of threepence, and it is part of the scheme to teach other girls how to market, plan and cook so that these meals may be retailed at threepence per head and yet pay their own cost. Such a training should be invaluable in the future married life to which these girls are no doubt looking forward.

In other respects, of course, the scheme cannot pay, but must be subsidised. In the case of the Sportsmouth, premises have been given by the Corporation, and there is accommodation for a future group of over a hundred women. But there are the expenses of superintendents and materials, &c., to be defrayed, and it is here that the scheme becomes of interest to supporters of the National Fund, which through our Relief Fund Citizens' Committee is paying the cost of this method of alleviating war distress.

The first workroom under the auspices of the Citizens' Relief Fund Committee was opened six weeks ago, and there are now workrooms in Woodlands Road, Possil Road, and Springburn, as well as the new rooms which are being opened to-day, each workroom having its own well-defined method of dealing with women who have lost their work owing to the war. In addition, there is the Central Bureau which acts as a Labour Exchange for women workers of the better class. In each case there is an able consultative committee and a convener chosen from the women members of the Citizens' Committee, while the technical advice of Labour Exchange experts has also been available.

Such work as this is far more satisfactory than the doling out of temporary relief, for the women retain their self respect, and see the means they may help themselves in the future. In no direction can the National Fund be doing work with a higher practical result as cause deserving of support.

Shop Girls and Employment.

Sir,—Knowing how excellent your paper has been in helping during the war-time, I am wondering whether you would give some prominence to a subject that is becoming a very serious one. Many of the leading manufacturers, also the shops and stores, have given large to sums to the various war funds. At the same time trade is bad, and they have had to dismiss their employees.

A case has lately come to my knowledge in which one of our large West-End shops has had to dismiss two hundred girls. Some of these girls have no homes, and as they cannot get fresh employment it means starvation or the streets. Their employer had given largely to the relief funds. This is only one case in many. Surely it would be wiser and better to keep on the poor girls and give less to public charities.

Meanwhile, what is to be done for the girls? One perhaps in a hundred will get re-employment.

EMPLOYMENT FOR WOMEN.

INTERESTING GLASGOW SCHEME.

SUITE OF WORKROOMS OPENED.

An interesting sidelight on the problem of unemployment amongst women in Glasgow owing to the war was afforded yesterday at the opening of a suite of workrooms for the training of machinists at 11 Sportsmouth, Gallowgate.

The rooms, which are under the auspices of the Glasgow District of H.R.H. the Prince of Wales' National Fund for the Relief of Distress, are well lighted and ventilated and have been adequately equipped.

In one of them have been placed over a score of shirt-making machines, kindly supplied by the Singer Company and by Messrs. Salton, Brown & Co., Ltd. Another room has been furnished as a kitchen, in which the women will be taught to cook their own meals. These meals will be supplied to the workers at a nominal price.

Yesterday's opening ceremony was performed by Mr. Francis Henderson, convener of the Committee on Employment, who presided over a large attendance of ladies and gentlemen.

The Chairman explained the steps which had led to the institution of the scheme, and stated that those who had interested themselves in the unemployment question included the Corporation, representatives of various ladies' societies in the city, and the officials of the Labour Exchanges.

The employers concerned in the kind of work which they proposed to carry on in those rooms, viz., the making of shirts, underclothing, etc., had neither time nor opportunity at present to teach beginners, and it had occurred to the Committee that the best way to help young women to help themselves was to open those rooms so that they might learn to become expert machinists and earn a remunerative living.

Councillor P. C. Stewart said that women were being very much better employed in the city than had been anticipated when the war broke out, but in those rooms they had provided accommodation sufficient for the real crisis when it came, although it was to be hoped it would not arise.

Mr. F. Roberts, manager of Singer's Works, commenting upon the great need for efficient machinists in Glasgow, said he believed that the institution would serve its purpose if means could be found for affiliating it with one of their educational departments or making it the nucleus for a thoroughly organised system of training workers. In this way they would do more than they had done in the past to combat German trade. (Applause.)

Eastern Daily Press, 6554
Jan: 13th 1915

The report presented to yesterday's meeting of the Norwich Distress Committee is quite astonishingly satisfactory, so far as the unemployment of men in the city is concerned. Except for a very small margin, the smallest with which the Distress Committee has had to deal for years, the unemployed problem has practically ceased to exist so far as the men workers of the city are concerned. Three years ago, at the corresponding period of the year, we had 1100 unemployed men registered under the Distress Committee; two years ago 730; and last year 590. The number now is only 106; a remarkable reduction which is all the more welcome because it is quite contrary to what, at the outset of the war, everybody expected and predicted for this winter. It was to have been a record winter for serious distress. It is a record winter, truly; but happily the record is in the reverse direction from that to which the gloomy forecasts pointed.

With regard to unemployment amongst women, the position is not so satisfactory; and it is there that the main call is made upon the Distress Committee. There are 343 women registered; and of these 134 are being employed in the workrooms set up by the committee. Thanks to the way in which numbers of subscriptions to the National Distress Fund have been earmarked for local purposes, it has been possible to deal much more effectively with this problem of women thrown out of employment by the war than would otherwise have been the case. The industrial effect of the war has been felt most heavily in the minor luxury industries; hence the disproportionate way in which the effect has shown itself as between the employment of men and of women. We hope that the application which is to be made to the Local Government Board will be successful. It is all very well in normal times to have a regulation limiting to sixteen weeks the amount of employment for any individual in a single year. The purpose of such a regulation is to prevent people from relying chronically upon the Distress Committee and ceasing, because of such distress employment, to trouble about finding normal employment. But these are not normal times. The industry from which numbers of these women workers have been thrown out is industry which will probably remain in abeyance while the war lasts; and to meet the exceptional and quite abnormal facts the ordinary regulation should be suspended, and the Distress Committee—who, after all, know most about the matter; much more than Whitehall can possibly know—empowered to deal with cases on their merits and according to their needs.

WHAT LABOUR EXCHANGES REGISTER.

The Board of Trade state that in the trades compulsorily insured against unemployment the percentage of unemployment at January 8 was 3·36, as compared with 3·62 a week ago, 3·41 a month ago, and 5·73 a year ago.

As regards the uninsured trades the number of men and women on the registers of the Labour Exchanges at January 8 shows an increase on the figure a week ago, being 46,000, as compared with 37,567. For men alone the corresponding figures were 13,203 and 10,310, and for women 27,000 and 21,102.

UNEMPLOYED WOMEN.

A GLASGOW TRAINING SCHEME.

To meet as far as possible the present demand for competent machinists and to provide the means of earning a livelihood for women and girls unemployed owing to the war, a scheme for the training of machinists has been inaugurated in connection with the Glasgow District of the Prince of Wales's National Relief Fund. Commodious premises at 11 Spoutmouth, Glasgow, were opened yesterday, when the hope was expressed that the venture would be the beginning of an organised scheme for the training of workers. The premises consist of three large rooms. One of them has been fitted up as a machine-room, and 20 machines given by the Singer Company have been installed. Another room has been converted into a kitchen, where, under the direction of Miss Dick, of the Glasgow and West of Scotland College of Domestic Science, girls will be taught domestic economy and will cook meals which will be supplied to the other workers at a nominal charge. The third apartment will be used as a workroom. The organisers hope to turn out each month 20 trained machinists competent to take situations in factories.

Mr Francis Henderson, chairman of the Sub-committee on Employment of the Glasgow District, presided at the opening ceremony, which was also attended by Councillor P. G. Stewart, Mr Robert Graham, Mr Cramond, of Glasgow Labour Exchange Mr Frank Roberts, of the Singer Company, and a member of the members of Glasgow Corporation.

The Chairman explained the steps taken to cope with unemployment consequent on the war, and said that the general public, Corporation representatives, women's societies in Glasgow, and the officials of the Labour Exchange were co-operating with a view to dealing with the question. They were restricted by the regulations of the fund to assist only those who were unemployed in consequence of the war. They found there was a great demand in Glasgow for capable machinists. Employers were so busy with contracts that they had not the time and opportunity they usually had to teach learners, and it occurred to the committee that they could help women to help themselves by establishing workrooms where they would be taught to be expert machinists. (Applause.) The Singer Company had given them machines, and Messrs Saltoun, Brown and Co. had also lent some machines.

Councillor P. G. Stewart said that in men's industries there was plenty of employment in Glasgow, and women were very much better employed than it was thought they would be in time of war. In the workrooms they had provided sufficient accommodation for many more women whom they hoped would not require it but whom they feared would.

Mr Frank Roberts said that for some years past there had been in Glasgow a great need for efficient machinists. Under normal conditions within the last few years in almost every trade there had been calls for labour, and if under normal conditions we could not do what we were called to do, what were we going to do to get German trade? If we were going to organise and have some plan it was time we started. Could the workrooms which were being opened not be the nucleus of an institution where there would be some organised system of training workers?

Miss Paterson, Edinburgh, secretary of the Scottish Committee on Women's Employment, also spoke; and Mr Robert Graham proposed a vote of thanks to the chairman.

EMERGENCY WORKROOMS.

The 19th annual meeting of the Scottish Council for Women's Trades was held at 58 Renfield Street, Glasgow. Mr R. L. Bremner, chairman of the Executive Committee, presided. Miss Irwin, general secretary, presented a report on the past year's work. Previous to the outbreak of the war the council had been engaged in three main investigations:—(1) The hours in shops exempted either wholly or provisionally under the Shop Hours Act; (2) wages and other conditions of work in the blouse and women's underwear trades; (3) conditions of employment among message girls. The legislative reforms with which they had been actively occupied included extensions of the Trade Board Act to additional sweated industries, amendments of the Shop Hours Act for dealing with excessive hours in certain shops, the Employment of Children Bill and the Underground Workrooms Bill. The council had sent deputations to Ministers of the Crown in London, and had also held conferences with members of Parliament in regard to these measures, with good hopes of success. Unfortunately all these activities had necessarily been suspended since the war broke out. They had also made urgent representation to the Corporation of Glasgow for the prohibition of street trading of boys as well as girls under the age of 16. The council had published a pamphlet by Mr R. L. Bremner entitled "The Case Against Juvenile Street Trading." This has done much to educate public opinion on the subject. It was very gratifying that subsequently the Glasgow Corporation had agreed to make a by-law giving effect to these recommendations.

SUCCESS OF WORKROOMS.

In common with other societies the council had suffered interruption in its work through the war. It had therefore agreed to take up lines of work specially suited to the national crisis. At an early stage the council had been confronted with evidence that unemployment amongst women was becoming widespread and acute, and that special hardships were likely to be endured by workers in certain trades. Many of these women and girls lived in lodgings, and were entirely dependent on their own earnings. Frequently these did not exceed 8s or 10s a week. This left no margin for saving. Consequently a short period of unemployment reduced the workers to destitution. The council saw that steps had to be taken at once to provide for these urgent cases. They felt that, as a society existing for the care of women's industrial interests, they had a special responsibility in this matter, and that their long experience in dealing with women's industrial affairs ought to guide them in devising practical measures for help. The council appointed a special sub-committee to organise a scheme of emergency workrooms. These had proved a conspicuous success. Three workrooms have been opened by the council. These give employment to 100 women and girls, including the respective staffs. The following is a summary of what has been done under the council's schemes for relief of unemployed women:—1181 women and girls registered at the council's office, 100 provided with steady employment in their workrooms, 171 provided with temporary work, 70 provided with temporary agricultural work, 4 placed in training for dairy work, 81 passed out of the workrooms to regular employment, 426 workers relieved. Among other schemes the council provided temporary agricultural employment for 70 women and girls. A dairy training scheme has also been started in which girls are trained for work at dairy farms. The council have received official recognition of the practical nature of their work in a recommendation recently made to the Glasgow Distress Committee by the Local Government Board of Scotland, namely, that the council should be asked to take into their workrooms, and under their supervision, the cases coming at present under the Distress Committee. This recommendation had been unanimously adopted by the Distress Committee, and the extensions necessary for receiving these cases are now being made. Contributions in aid of the work in money, provisions, materials, clothing (new or cast off) will be gratefully received.

APPOINTMENT OF OFFICE-BEARERS.

The following office-bearers were appointed:—Chairman of council, Principal George Adam Smith; chairman of Executive Committee, Mr Robert L. Bremner; chairman of Parliamentary Bills Committee, Mr Donald Currie; chairman of Industrial Investigations Committee, the Very Rev. Provost Fred. Ll. Deane; vice-chairman, the Rev. A. Herbert Gray; chairman of Industrial Conciliation Committee, Mr William Twaddle; chairman of Committee on Children's Employment, the Rev. Dr David Watson; chairman of Finance Committee, Miss Janie Allan; joint hon. treasurers, Miss Janie Allan and Mr John Mann; secretary, Miss Irwin; assistant secretary, Miss Madeline W. Millar.

LANDLADIES AND UNEMPLOYMENT.

104 West George St., Jan. 13.

Sir,—In reply to inquiries I should like to point out that those who have made a living by keeping lodgers have not been ignored in the present crisis. They can apply to the Town Clerk for relief in the usual way by filling up application forms, which may be obtained from free libraries, public baths, etc. The Glasgow Central Office for Women has a sub-committee for landladies, and by means of it has been able to deal successfully with cases passed on from the National Relief Fund. The committee will be glad to take an interest in cases if they are reported by letter to the Secretary, Central Office for Women, 104 West George Street, Glasgow.

WORK FOR WOMEN.

2,000 Shop Girls Affected in the West End.

Reports from various agencies which deal with the employment of women agree that there has been an improvement since the early days of the war.

Nearly 2,000 shop girls in the West-End alone had lost their work, but many of these have gained other employment and others may get back again.

Influence is being brought to bear on the larger houses to retain as many of their women workers as possible, though, in many instances, all is being done already that can be done in this direction.

Girl clerks have suffered severely, but the secretary of the National Union of Clerks informs The Evening News that typists and secretaries are finding it easier to get places now that men clerks have become scarcer.

"We have not a single male shorthand-typist unemployed," he said. "There is a disposition to find work for the men because most of them have people dependent on them, but so many have enlisted that vacancies can now only be filled by girls.

"The Government has also taken on a large number of girls for special war work, and as conditions show signs of continual improvement we are hopeful that unemployment will decrease to a great extent.

"But to-day we have 100 per cent. more girls out of work than we had twelve months ago."

The Queen's Work for Women Fund is doing something for the unemployed girl clerks, of whom a number selected by the Central Committee on Women's Employment have been put in the way of securing a commercial training. They are allowed a maintenance grant of 10s. a week, with 4s. for expenses.

Miss M. G. Spencer, secretary of the Central Bureau for the Employment of Women, says that thousands of professional women have been badly hit by the war.

"They have not all lost their occupations," she said, "but those who are still in employment have had to reduce their expenses considerably. We deal with all classes of professional women with the exception of nurses and school teachers, and the cases of distress caused by the war which have come to our notice are deplorable."

People's Journal, Jan. 16th. 1915.

What of the Fishermen?

For months many sympathetic landlubbers have been asking "What has become of all the fishermen who were thrown out of employment when the war began?" The result is gradually becoming known that the fishermen are a more enterprising class of men than they have usually been esteemed. The Royal Naval Brigade and the army have naturally absorbed a considerable number, but large numbers of the Buckie men, for instance, have resumed employment in ocean-going liners, and in different parts of the country. At Rosyth they have also shown a considerable amount of enterprise, many of them having taken up net-mending, hawsing coal at Inverkeithing, and acting as mine-sweepers as much as that very few able-bodied men, who have sought work, are now unemployed.

The Fisher Lassies.

Perhaps the class which has suffered even more severely than the fishermen are the female fish workers, who returned home when the war broke out with practically nothing. A few of them have become domestic servants, but for the most part they are experts at their own peculiar craft. In many houses whose hosts have gone to the front supporters of the home who depend for the winter's earnings [illegible] and it is to be hoped the local [illegible] will [illegible] their claims before the National Relief Fund.

The Glasgow Eve. Citizen,
Jan: 14th. 1915.

The committee of the Glasgow District of the National Relief Fund has so far only been called on to deal with unemployment among women. On the invitation of the Sub-committee on Employment a number of ladies and gentlemen were present yesterday afternoon at the opening of a new workroom at 11 Spoutmouth, Glasgow. A roomy flat has been transformed into a workroom for the training of machinists, and there is also a well-equipped kitchen attached. Mr Francis Henderson, convener of the sub-committee, declared the workroom opened, and referred to the great demand at present for machinists. In that workroom they would be able to train girls and start them on a new career.

EMPLOYMENT FOR SCOTCH WOMEN

To the Editor of the "Aberdeen Free Press."]

Sir,—In the midst of so many demands upon a generous public, one almost hesitates to issue yet another appeal, and especially an appeal for cast-off clothing, as it would seem that the urgent needs in this line of the nation's Belgian guests must have well night exhausted the supply.

Should there, however, be some amongst your readers who have not entirely come to an end of the resources of their wardrobe, I should like to call their attention to the needs of the workrooms which are being carried on in different parts of Scotland, under the Queen's Work for Women Fund. These workrooms are providing employment for hundreds of women who have been thrown out of work owing to the war, and who are now engaged in making, amongst other things, clothing for the destitute poor, and infants' outfits for distribution through the maternity hospitals and nursing associations. The cost of sufficient new material to keep so many workers constantly employed is a heavy drain upon the Fund, and the various local committees managing the workrooms are most grateful for donations of cast-off garments in fairly good condition, which can be altered, repaired, and made down. The infants' outfits must necessarily be made of new material, but the workers are becoming expert in the fashioning of children's clothing out of old garments "of a larger growth," and very attractive little frocks, suits, and under-garments are made from what may seem at first sight to be rather unpromising material. The chief aim of the workrooms is not so much the production of large quantities of work in a given time as the encouragement of neat workmanship and the giving of thorough training in cutting out, making, and mending, which will not only serve to tide the workers over a season of unemployment, but will be of lasting benefit to them in after life.

No one need, therefore, hesitate to present to the workrooms garments which may seem to require a good deal of time and work in order to render them fit for use.

If any of your readers have clothing to dispose of, it would be extremely kind if they would communicate with the Hon. Secretary, Scottish Committee on Women's Employment, 20 Melville Street, Edinburgh, stating what articles they would propose to send. The Committee would then give information as to where such gift might be most acceptable at the time, and the cost of carriage would be met. The garments would, in this way, be serving a double purpose, in clothing the destitute, and in furnishing work for the unemployed.—I am, etc.,

MR. D. H. L. YOUNG ON WAR UNEMPLOYMENT.

At the monthly meeting of the Glasgow Chamber of Commerce Mr. D. H. L. Young (Messrs. James Templeton & Co., carpet manufacturers) wrote that he had been in communication with some of the members of the Women's Committee, and he had been asked to inquire whether the manufacture of plush felt for making ladies' hats would not be an opening for women's work in this country. The industry had hitherto been mainly carried on in Austria. He understood there was likely to be a continued and growing outlet for the product. The raw material consisted of the loose fur of hares or rabbits, which was blown on to revolving cylinders by compressed air. That, he believed, was afterwards felted, and the hats moulded by hand. Such information might, as far as it went, be of interest to some manufacturers and merchants. Another scheme which had occupied his attention was the possibility of employing a certain class of women's labour next summer in trying to exterminate the bracken which was so largely encroaching on sheep pasture in Scotland.

The Chairman explained that they had received from the Board of Trade an exhaustive statement showing the number of persons occupied in German industrial centres in certain industries and a number of trades which the Board suggested the Chamber might deal with.

KEEPING THE HOME TOGETHER.

WORK WANTED FOR UNEMPLOYED WOMEN.

Mrs. H. M. Swanwick, honorary secretary of the Richmond Committee of Organised Women, writes:—

The need for finding work for unemployed women at the Town Hall is unfortunately increasing. Women are losing employment in many ways. On the books at the Town Hall are women who have lost lodgers or boarders owing to the war, or who are obliged to find other or unaccustomed work; women usually engaged in dressmaking or millinery, whose clients are making their old clothes serve; women who just scraped along with the prices of necessaries as they were before the war, and who now must earn more because the loaf has gone up to 7d.; women who were employed by foreigners or other persons who have been removed from the district.

Many of these women have growing children; some have invalid husbands or other relatives to support. It is not only humane, it is good business to keep the home together and to prevent these women and their dependents from coming on the rates. It is good business to help them before absolute destitution has set in, and they have pawned their furniture and even their clothes. The Women's Committee working at the Town Hall has had several cases where it has been necessary to provide a decent hard-working woman with clothes before she could be given work. It is obviously bad economy to leave a woman so destitute that she has actually to pawn her print dresses, her aprons, and even (as in one case) her underclothing. It is better to find such a woman work, provided she is fit for work, because when she has pawned everything she will have to go to the Workhouse and be economically unproductive. It is creditable to our women that most of them have the greatest desire not to go "into the house." The Women's Committee does not employ the unemployable. It endeavours to keep up a good standard of work, and already some of the workers have improved and learned better work. Appreciative letters have been received from a number of ladies whose material has been worked up, and a constant supply of material is the chief need. In particular the committee would be glad of prints and shirtings for servants' dresses, linen and cotton for aprons, black dress material for house dresses, tweed and serge for boys' suits, wool for knitting.

Materials have been received during the month of January from Miss Rake, Mrs. Ford, Miss Scorer, Mrs. Westcott, Miss Hales, Mrs. Thomas, Miss Estridge, Mrs. Beasley, Mrs. Sandover, Mrs. Bailey, Miss Lane, Miss Clare, Mrs. Alexander, Lady Yonall, Mrs. Frost, Mrs. Mackenzie, Mrs. Oates, and Lady Noel Buxton.

More please! The finished clothes are either handed back to the donor of the material (if for a charity) or are distributed by the Committee of Organised Women and the Relief Committee under careful supervision.

DISTRESS AMONGST DRESSMAKERS.

In the early autumn arose an increased amount of unemployment among women engaged in the dressmaking, trimming, and other similar trades. In order to alleviate the distress among such women a committee was formed with the object of starting the United Workrooms, which raised a sufficient sum of money to ensure the project a fair trial. The efforts of the promoters of the United Workrooms, of which Lady Jane Gathorne Hardy and Lord Plunket are two of the most energetic members, have been so successful that, although they started with only twenty women, they have now been able to increase this number and to find employment for fifty-six. Lady Jane Gathorne-Hardy invites inspection of the various articles for disposal by the United Workrooms at 2, Basil-mansions, Sloane-street, and those who respond to the appeal are assured of a warm welcome and will not be pressed to purchase should they see nothing to suit their particular requirements.

Daily Call,
January 18th. 1915.

It is very bad taste, to say the least, to complain of English dressmakers, as a class, at this time, when all good people—which is the same as saying all patriots—should make it their business to discover ways and means to keep trade going and to give employment to the thousands trying their level best to weather times beset with non-employment and many other disadvantages. Of course, to argue with the woman that complains or considers that she has any grievance whatever is more than useless, but for the rest of us a statement recently made by one of the best-dressed women in London should have considerable weight. Miss Marie Tempest, the actress, whose frocks attract attention both on and off the stage, declares that for more than tens of years she has employed none but London dressmakers and worn none but English fabrics. "But you supply the dressmakers with ideas," it was suggested. "Not to any great extent," she replied. "Of course, we talk things over, for two heads are better than one, but on the whole I find English dressmakers as clever and resourceful as any I ever dealt with."

IN SEARCH OF A LIVING.

A WOMAN'S QUEST IN WAR TIME.

SECOND ARTICLE.

Of course, there were the ordinary agents to look out—a class of human I stand in real awe of! They ask you a string of impertinent questions wholly irrelevant—they ask you to lay bare your very soul. What is your father? Your religion? Your politics? etc. What has this to do with your capacity, say, for writing shorthand or cooking cabbage? One day I was rung up: "That Miss Z——?" "Yes." "What is your father? Mine was an officer." "Well, mine wasn't; and as far as I know he is an angel now; at least he has every claim to be if there are such things off this earth," and I rang off. I failed absolutely to see what my father had to do with the job. He was far too nice to have put such a question. There are the 5s. agents still, who absorb 5s. from poverty-stricken females on the promise that they will get her a good berth in no time. These people rarely have any of these berths to offer such as they profess to be able to provide; and if they advertise in the columns of the best "dailies" anything approaching the thing, some one else has always got it or you lack some qualification; and if they really can't find anything else the matter with you, you are too old, or too young—too old, that is always a slap in the face they have ready for you, if you worry them, although you may be in your prime. How I have heard long-suffering women complain over their vagaries. It is not so long since I read of one of these sharks being hauled up by the L.C.C. for having several thousand names on their books, the owners of which had paid down sums of money, and only about 100 jobs had been found. They are consequently improving, and the best do not demand a preliminary fee; some few are quite nice and comprehensive, and some merely treat you in accordance with your marketable value from their own point of view. Young girls should be very careful about accepting foreign situations offered through agents, unless full inquiry is made from a British Consul.

I should like to tell you one experience I had of an agent and her client. I argued with the agent that it was a very doubtful possibility and I did not feel inclined to gamble on it. She compromised and accepted 2s. 6d. instead of 5s. I was to call on her client in one of the fashionable squares at 12 o'clock. I found the hall literally lined with a nondescript collection of women of all ages. Doubtless they had paid 5s. each, representing several pounds to the agent. After wasting half an hour, a young footman came forward and spoke to each one in a subdued voice. Arriving at myself, he said: "Will you go away, and come back in about two to three hours?" I was ready to breathe fire—I had been out since early morning, and like many another did not know where to go to kill time—going into a restaurant meant spending. It was drizzling; I certainly would not come back! However, curiosity got the upper hand. I went into the city and returned about 5 p.m., weary, pale-faced, hungry, and the bloom certainly rubbed off my ordinarily, I can't say exactly peachy, appearance; but let it pass.

The hall was empty, the footman in full afternoon uniform, and I was at once shown into the presence. There, sitting in an armchair, was a very big woman, luxuriously clothed, with a hat trimmed with about three different lots of Prince of Wales's feathers, yellow in hue; they bowed and nodded energetically as I entered.

The lady raised a tortoiseshell lorgnette, and stared at me in an intensely arrogant manner. "Are you a maid?" she queried. I was non-plussed. Did I look like a lady's maid? I stammered and blurted out "no."!

"Oh," said she, and paused—"Secretary?"

"Yes, Secretary," rejoined I, standing first on one leg, then on the other, and ready to drop with fatigue.

She continued, in sepulchral and measured tones, which seemed to come out of the cellar, enough to make the most hardy out-of-work tremble.

"I want—a young girl—a—nice—young—girl, about twenty—go back and tell the agent—I want a—young girl—to do the flowers!"

I curbed my impatience somehow. "Not a Secretary, then?"

"Oh ye-s—to write my letters, and she must have a big, heavy style." It was a 10s.-a-week-morning job; I did not write a heavy scrawl, and doubtless looked twice twenty at the moment. Endeavouring to be as rudely polite as she was crudely rude, I requested her to inform the agent of her needs herself, as I did not intend going to her again, and withdrew, thinking with sorrow of my wasted half-crown, and equally wasted day.

* * * *

One day an acquaintance told me she knew of a lady frantically anxious to dispose of a private hotel, who wanted some one to look after it for a week or two—it might be sold any day—would I care to go? "Yes," said I," if you think I am your man; it's not exactly in my line, but——"

"You'll do," she said. Mrs. X. was rung up, and in the course of an hour or two I was installed.

A widowed friend of Mrs. X's had previously been in charge, but had gone away suddenly, saying she was ill. I was left to make the best of it. I had to carve for a handful of people off a very small joint at a side table; it was hard work to get a decent slice off the thing, and I was rather flustered. I slept in the office—which never saw the sun, cold as a cave—in a cupboard bed. The first morning I was aroused a little before eight o'clock by the most awful row I have ever heard. The English waiter, aged 20, and a housemaid, 40 (a most excellent servant with a violent temper), were going it hammer and tongs. They had come up from the lower regions, and were close to my door; I sprang out of bed and hurried on to the scene. I implored them to cease. I stood between them, I entreated, I pleaded for the sake of the good name of the establishment in vain. Finally the housemaid went upstairs, talking at the top of her voice all the way up. The boy retired into the dining-room and sought my sympathy. I was shivering and left him, still chuntering, to dress. At breakfast some one asked if there had been a murder committed across the street.

I was kept very tight for money, and had to order in supplies in bits. The proprietress looked in, and said I was a treasure; but she was premature. I bought English meat! What a fuss there was. She at once declared she must have some one used to managing private hotels. I showed my weekly bill later to people used to catering, and they said they couldn't have done it on the money. For hotel fare it was very plain, and there was naturally some grumbling; therefore I got it from both sides. There was one so-called eccentric guest (to my belief there was method in her madness), a spoilt, pampered Anglo-Indian, who rung her bell at every turn, pestering the one solitary housemaid and myself in turn; she was always trying to get round me to let her have food taken up to her room, and other privileges. "And you won't charge me extra?" She was always ordering or demanding something that was not there. "I never take anything but ham for breakfast," she told me. I got some. She sent it down, and demanded eggs—"fresh eggs, please to understand!"

I had been instructed to buy eggs at 10 in a box for a shilling. She told me she always required a chop for lunch, then turned round to the others at their different tables, waving her arms dramatically. "Chops, chops, chops—nothing but chops."

I tried her another day with veal and ham pie and a mince. "Where is my chop?" she inquired savagely. "No chop, then I must have a sole."

One evening dinner commenced with hake, merely to ring the changes on cod and slips, for I had to get the cheapest things going.

"What is this fish?" she asked. "Hake," replied I seriously.

"Hake! Hake?" she shrieked, "I couldn't touch it, I used to like it, but—I once saw one, ugh, a hideous creature with whiskers—whiskers," and she extended her arms excitedly, twisting round in all directions, where she could catch an eye.

"What else is there?"

"Roast beef and—"

"I never touch beef—I must dine out, and I shall charge it to Mrs. X." Off she flounced, a real boarding-house terror.

Fresh joys came my way daily; through the housemaid, who was a conscientious soul, I learned that the cook was out at all hours. Cook had only been a week, turned out of a house lower down the street through a scamp of a husband, who would hang round. History was repeating itself, and it seemed cook had him in the kitchen sometimes at midnight.

I remonstrated, but she excused herself quite civilly—and took no notice. On appealing to Mrs. X, she had nothing to suggest, and was only horribly afraid of her giving notice. I got the key of the area door, and took to sitting up. However, cook did give notice, and said she must leave in a day or two, as her husband had got a joint job for them both. Mrs. X was frantic; another cook hunt!

There was nothing the cheeky waiter loved more than to fasten his own backslidings and mistakes on to the "Manageress." The Manageress said this or told him to do the other, and if we ran short of anything, before the visitors he would make remarks of this kind:—

"What are the staff to have?" or "There's no coffee, madame." Such small quantities were ordered that you had almost to sit by and watch to know that they were run out. Cook was no earthly help.

I know on this occasion there was some coffee—and this wretch knew it too—and he went down the kitchen stairs laughing like a hyena because he thought he had done me one. He knew well enough he would have to go, so gave notice with a flourish, though for a few days he was quite lamb-like. He would seek me out to admire his dining room—cleaned properly for once!

The weekend found cook—I think to see how things were going—"You're so wonderfully calm," said she. Well, I'm not one of those people who [illegible]

TECHNICAL EDUCATION.

EMPLOYMENT OF MILL WORKERS.

A meeting of the City Technical Instruction Committee was held at half-past three o'clock Monday in the School of Art. Mr A F Sharman Crawford J P (Vice-Chairman), presided. Also present—W Hart, T C (Deputy Vice-Chairman), Alderman H Dale, Treasurer Nicholson Messrs W Fleming, T C; W Ellis, D O'Mahony T C; J Good, J L Fawsitt, T A Conroy, M A.

The Secretary (Mr F B Giltinan) submitted a statement of current accounts which showed that the balance at bank on 31st of last month was £1,232 5s 10d as compared with a balance of £298 10s 6d for the corresponding period last year.

The agenda included a reference to consider request of Local Representative Relief Committee, as contained in letter from Secretary dated 4th inst. that a conference be arranged between this committee and sub-committees of ladies, appointed by the Relief Committee, to devise means of providing employment in the Institute for women, particularly mill-workers, who will and have been disemployed in consequenc of the war, on the lines suggested by Mr Aston, L G B Inspector, and to take such action in the matter as is deemed advisable.

In connection with this matter, Messrs J F O'Sullivan (Chairman Relief Committee), C Daly, James Dwyer, Miss Stanton and Mr B C Galvin, City Solicitor, attended as a deputation from the Relief Committee. and Mr O'Sullivan referred to the course taken in Dublin to relieve women who had been disemployed in consequence of the war. They were sorry to say that the amount of unemployment of women workers in the city would increase in the next month or two. They had come to ask for the co-operation of the Technical Committee in this work.

The Chairman said the Local Government Board would allow the Technical Committee grants to cover the expenses of teaching, and they would also reimburse them any money they expended in giving the workers the pay they would receive were they employed. The mill-workers would attend the school for fifteen hours a week.

Mr Galvin said if the committee was in favour of the request of the Relief Committee, the best thing would be to appoint a few members to confer with the Sub-Committee of the Relief Committee and bring up a report as to what was best to be done.

After some discussion, the Vice-Chairman, Deputy Vice-Chairman, Messrs W Fleming and J L Fawsitt were appointed a sub-committee, as suggested.

A letter was read from Dr Winder solicitor, stating that he was organising a Voluntary Aid Detachment of the St John's Ambulance Association in the city, and would be obliged if the committee would give the use of the Lecture Theatre in the School of Art for the purpose of lectures, to be given on Tuesday evenings from 8 to 9.30, commencing on Tuesday, 12th inst, and continuing for the five following weeks. Fire and light and any other necessary outlay would be paid for.

Dr Winder appeared before the committee in support of the application, and said that he had at present thirty members anxious to obtain certificates and Dr Crosbie had kindly consented to lecture for them. The difficulty they had was to find a room in which to accommodate about 60 persons, and failing to find such a place they were obliged to ask for the Lecture Theatre. The lectures would be open to everyone who liked to attend.

On the motion of Mr Hart, seconded by Mr Fleming, the application, which was warmly supported by several members, was unanimously granted.

A letter was received from the Department dated 14th ult, stating that they were unable to sanction the proposal to make a grant of £20 annually towards the maintenance of the Christian Brothers' Day Trades' Preparatory School, but they would be prepared to consider proposals to award scholarships to the value of £20 tenable at this school.

Mr Fleming said the Department sanctioned such grants to the Christian Brothers' Schools in Belfast, and gave them scholarships as well. Under these circumstances he failed to understand why they were unable to do in Cork what they did in Belfast. Their action was inconsistent and illogical, and he proposed that they again write to the Department pointing out these facts to them.

This was seconded by Mr Hart, who said he considered the action of the Department in the matter very unfair.

The motion was agreed to unanimously.

The Department also wrote under date 18th ult, stating that they were unable to sanction the appointment of Mr M J Galligan as teacher of cabinet making, and again suggesting that the opening of a class in this subject be deferred until the services of a well-qualified cabinet maker could be secured.

Mr Fleming said it was well for the cabinet makers of the city to know that there was an opening for a well-qualified teacher of this subject. It was open to any one, whether he attended classes or not, to take out the diplomas of the City and Guilds of London.

The next business was to consider minutes of meeting of committee held on 4th instant, recommending that proceeds of the concert organised under the auspices of the school, in aid of the local distress caused by the war, amounting to £31 1s 6d, be divided equally between the St Vincent de Paul Society, Indigent Roomkeepers' Society, and the Sick Poor Societies of the Middle, North, and South Parishes.

This was approved of, and the meeting ended.

For Unemployed Women.

There has seldom been a time when skilled machinists were kept so steadily employed as they are at present. The demand for expert shirtmakers, indeed, far exceeds the supply. On the other hand, many unskilled women and girls are out of work as a result of the war. It has therefore been the object of those interested in women's work to try as much as possible to help the unemployed in a way likely to be of lasting use to the women themselves, instead of merely giving them temporary employment. This twofold object was certainly kept in view by the Glasgow district of the Prince of Wales's National Relief Fund when making arrangements connected with the workrooms opened last week at 11 Spoutmouth. It is hoped that this venture may be the beginning of an organised scheme for the training of women workers, and meantime the promoters expect to turn out each month a score of trained machinists fitted to take situations in factories. The Spoutmouth premises consist of three commodious rooms—a machine-room, a workroom, and a well-equipped kitchen, where the girls will be taught domestic economy and simple cooking. The meals cooked here will be sold to the workers at a nominal charge. A good three-course dinner is supplied for the modest sum of threepence. Miss Dick, of the Glasgow and West of Scotland College of Domestic Science, is kindly giving her services in this department, and under her skilled tuition the girls should soon learn how to cook and clean. Miss MacLean is superintendent at the Spoutmouth, and the general arrangements have been made by the Consultative Committee, whose representatives are Mrs Thomas Johnstone, Mrs Brownlie, and Miss Agnes Young. Mrs Elizabeth Ross, of the Labour Exchange, acting as a member of the Citizens' Relief Committee.

Banks and Female Clerks.

It is interesting to note in the report just issued by the Board of Trade that statistics relating to commercial employment in London show that since the war the number of women employed in the London banks has increased 25 per cent., whilst a somewhat similar state of affairs is indicated in other centres of employment in the City. It need hardly be said that the extensive enlistment of male clerks is mainly responsible for this state of affairs, although the employment in Government offices of many thousands of temporary clerks is held to be partially responsible.

FEWER UNEMPLOYED THAN IN PEACE.

WAR TRADE BOOM.

MANY MORE GIRLS AT WORK IN LONDON BANKS.

PROFESSIONS IN TROUBLE.

Based mainly on returns received from 23,000 industrial firms, employing about 4,000,000 workpeople—roughly 43 per cent. of the industrial population—a report was issued by the Board of Trade yesterday showing the state of unemployment in the United Kingdom in December.

According to this report from July to December there has been an actual diminution in the number of people unemployed.

The number of men on short time has been reduced from 17.3 per cent. in October to 10.8 per cent. in December, while the percentage on overtime has risen from 5.2 per cent. to 13 per cent.

Women were more seriously affected by the war than men, but the recent improvement in their case has been almost equally marked.

As compared with July the reduction in the numbers employed was 3.2 per cent. in December, as against 6.2 in October.

Short time has fallen from 26 per cent. to 19.1 per cent., while overtime has increased from 5.9 per cent. to 10.8 per cent.

TRANSFORMED INDUSTRY.

By December, in lieu of the displacement of men previously employed, there has been a replacement of men previously unemployed; that is to say, the war has actually reduced the numbers unemployed in July by absorbing a proportion of them into industry.

This, of course, does not imply that no trades have had to dismiss employees, but that after allowing for enlistment the number of cases in which employees have been taken on is considerably in excess of the dismissals.

"The employment figures indicate that there has been a big transformation of industry. While private business has fallen off to an unprecedented extent, the requirements of the Government have undergone so great an expansion that, when account is taken of the numbers joining the forces, the labour market presents the appearance of a trade boom.

The most noteworthy feature of the situation is that so important a transition should have been effected so easily and with so little unemployment.

GONE TO FRANCE.

The notable feature of the return from the coal and other mines, iron and steel, shipbuilding, engineering, wool and worsted, boot and shoe, leather, chemical, timber, hosiery, and food industries, is the fact that, in spite of the abundance of Government orders, and the keen demand for labour, there is a marked increase in enlistment in each.

In all these trades those who have joined the forces have been replaced to a very large extent, and there is much more overtime than short time.

Enlistment from Government offices has been heavy—about 15 per cent.—and it has been necessary to fill places temporarily on a large scale.

Returns from 460 local authorities show that over 19,700 persons have been taken on to fill the places of 27,783 who have joined the Colours.

Business has fallen off particularly heavily in the legal professions, but the decline is compensated from the employers' point of view by the enlistment of a very large percentage of lawyers' clerks.

WAR AND EMPLOYMENT

A NOTABLE IMPROVEMENT

EFFECT OF RECRUITING.

Further gratifying evidence of the favourable position of British trade and industry is furnished in a report, just issued by the Board of Trade, on the state of employment in the United Kingdom in December. It is a continuation of the report published some weeks ago, dealing with the position in October, and a comparison of the figures for the two periods discloses a notable improvement.

The document is based mainly on returns received from 23,000 industrial firms, which employed over 4,000,000 workpeople in July. The total number occupied in the trades in which these 4,000,000 persons were engaged amounted, according to the census of 1911, to nearly 9,250,000 persons. The investigation, therefore, covers about 43 per cent. of the industrial population. Information is also given concerning employment in professional and commercial occupations.

So far as industrial employment is concerned, the main facts brought out are these:

By December the reduction in the number of male workers employed, compared with July, had fallen to 10.6 per cent., while the percentage joining the forces had risen from 10.6 in October to 13.3. Hence there has been an actual diminution in the number of males unemployed, as compared with July, of 2.7 per cent.

The number of men on short time fell from 17.3 per cent. in October to 10.8 per cent. in December, while the percentage on overtime rose from 5.2 to 13.

In the case of women the improvement has been almost equally marked. As compared with July, the reduction in the numbers employed was 3.2 per cent. in December, as against 6.2 in October. Short time fell from 26 per cent. to 19.1 per cent., while overtime increased from 5.9 per cent. to 10.8 per cent.

Except in the building, furniture, cotton, and one or two other industries, there is now a shortage rather than a surplus of labour.

This favourable position does not mean that the war has had a small effect on the industrial system. Decline of private business and the great expansion of Government requirements have caused a big transformation of industry, which has been effected with surprisingly little disturbance.

AN INDUSTRIAL TRANSITION.

Dealing with the figures in detail, the report points out that while for September and October the contraction of the numbers employed among males exceeded the numbers known to have joined the forces, in December the position was reversed. In lieu of displacement of men previously employed, there has been a replacement in employment of men previously unemployed: that is to say, the war has actually reduced the numbers unemployed in July by absorbing a proportion of them into industry. This, of course, does not imply that no trades have had to dismiss employés, but that after allowing for enlistment the number of cases in which employés have been taken on is considerably in excess of the dismissals. The changes are shown in the following table, in which the state of employment in October and December is compared with employment before the war:

	Oct.		Dec.
	Males.	Females.	Males.	Females.
	Per cent.		Per cent.
Employed in July	100	100	100	100
Still on full time	66·8	61·9	65·6	66·9
On overtime	5·2	5·9	13·0	10·8
On short time	17·3	26·0	10·8	19·1
Contraction of numbers employed	10·7	6·2	10·6	3·2
Known by Employers to have joined the Forces	10·6	—	13·3	—
Net displacement (−) or replacement (+)	−0·1	−6·2	+2·7	−3·2

The contraction figure in the case of females is chiefly due to the state of affairs in the cotton trade. If the North-Western division (Lancashire and Cheshire) is excluded, the contraction of employment of females in the rest of the United Kingdom is as follows: September, 6.2 per cent.; October, 3.8 per cent.; December, 1.2 per cent.

In regard to the effect of the war on industry, it is pointed out that while private business has fallen off to an unprecedented extent, the requirements of the Government have undergone so great an expansion that, when account is taken of the numbers joining the forces, the labour market presents the appearance of a trade boom. The most noteworthy feature of the situation is that so important a transition should have been effected so easily, and with so little unemployment. There has been an important transference of labour and machinery, which has been effected, on the whole, much more smoothly than might have been anticipated. But the fact that short time and overtime are found together, not only when the figures for the whole country are taken, but also in the same trade and district, shows that there is still considerable room for further adjustment.

LAST MONTH'S FIGURES.

The difficulty of transferring labour from trade to trade is brought out by an examination of the results for separate industries. The appended table shows for men the results of the inquiry in various industries under three heads:

1. Industries in which there is a marked shortage of male labour, and in which it has been necessary to attract men from the outside.
2. Industries which are in a fairly normal condition as regards male labour, and
3. Industries in which the contraction of numbers employed is considerably greater than the withdrawal of men for the forces.

The figures represent the state of employment in December compared with the period before the war:

	Contraction of numbers employed.	Known to have joined the Forces.	Net displacement (−) or replacement (+).	On Short Time.	On Overtime.
GROUP 1.	Per cent.	Per cent.	Per cent.	Per cent.	Per cent.
Coal and other mines	10·4	13·7	+ 3·3	14·1	0·6
Iron and steel	7·5	13·9	+ 6·4	7·1	12·1
Shipbuilding	6·0	13·6	+ 7·6	1·3	33·4
Engineering	8·7	14·6	+ 5·9	5·7	27·0
Wool & worsted	0·7	7·2	+ 7·9	5·9	29·5

PROSPERITY MORE WIDESPREAD.

Of the first group the most notable feature is the fact that, in spite of the abundance of Government orders, and the keen demand for labour, there is a marked increase in enlistment in each of these trades. The wool and worsted percentage, though still the lowest on the list, is nearly 2½ per cent. higher than in October. In all these trades those who have joined the forces have been replaced to a very large extent, and there is much more overtime than short time. The improvement in the chemical trade is not only the consequence of the stoppage of German imports into the home market, but is in part due to an expansion of exports. The woollen and worsted trades show better results than ever, partly owing to the fact that worsted is now being used extensively for uniforms. Prosperity is, therefore, more widespread than before.

In all the industries in the second group there has been a net replacement of men, enlistment more than accounting for the contraction of male employment. The linen trade is one of the few where the condition of things was worse in December than in October; linen depends largely on supplies of flax from Russia, and the closing of the Baltic by the war has caused a serious shortage. The jute trade, too, though there are here and there complaints of a shortage of men, is not in an entirely satisfactory condition. The paper and printing trades have benefited much less than usual from the Christmas season, and mention is made of the diminution in catalogues.

Although shirtmaking and wholesale tailoring show a great deal of additional employment, the result for the clothing trades, as a whole, is fairly normal. The sections which remain most depressed are high-class dressmaking and bespoke tailoring, while laundries are experiencing a good deal of short time. In the cycle, motor, and carriage trades, there has been a considerable improvement in the railway carriage section, and some improvement in others.

In all the industries in the third group the enlistment figure has increased since October, and has, except in the cases of the building and brick and stone trades, reduced the net displacement. The building trade, in fact, stands out as the one important industry which shows results greatly inferior to those of October. A large number of carpenters are, however, employed directly by the Government in the erection of soldiers' huts, and as the tables refer only to employment by private firms, these men help to swell the contraction figures, and give them, as an index of unemployment, an artificially high appearance. A further part of the contraction represents the seasonal depression which the building trade regularly undergoes, while it has also to be noted that a good deal of enlistment from the building trades probably occurs after the men have left their employment, and is therefore not recorded in the employers' returns.

Employment in the cotton trade shows an appreciable improvement in spite of some unfavourable factors, for example, the cutting off of the Turkish market. The furniture trade has also improved. There has been no improvement either in tinplate or in the brick and cement group, and in the latter case there is an increased "net displacement."

Of the trades which do not appear in the table, there has been a considerable displacement of both men and women, and a large amount of short time in the lace trade. There is a good deal of short time in the silk trade; but as regards unemployment the condition of this industry is not unsatisfactory. There has been a marked renewal of employment in the jewellery and musical instrument trades, in which a large amount of short time and overtime now co-exist.

DISTRICT RECRUITING.

With regard to enlistment, it is pointed out that the percentages given above as "joining the forces" do not by any means represent the number of recruits enlisted. They relate solely to men known by their employers to have left industrial employment for the purpose of joining. Thus they do not include any recruits who enlisted while unemployed, or whose occupation was not industrial. On the other hand, they include reservists besides new recruits.

In this connection the annexed table, showing the percentages of the total number of men employed in July in the various districts who are known to have enlisted, is of considerable interest:

	Sept.	Oct.	Dec.
London	8·5	10·3	13·0
South Eastern	11·4	12·9	15·2
South Western	12·8	13·2	16·0
West Midlands	8·4	11·0	12·7
East Midlands	7·3	8·1	11·2
Yorkshire	6·2	8·1	10·7
Northern	8·3	11·1	14·6
North Western	7·9	9·3	12·8
Wales	8·4	10·8	13·4
Scotland	10·4	13·2	16·0
Ireland	6·2	9·8	11·6
United Kingdom	8·8	10·6	13·3

One fact disclosed by the December investigation is that the contraction of employment in small firms is still considerably more serious than in large firms, the contraction of employment in the former being 12.8 per cent., compared with 9.4 per cent. in the case of the latter. One of the tendencies of the war, says the report, is clearly to transfer a more than normal proportion of the nation's business to large concerns.

PROFESSIONAL OCCUPATIONS.

In the section of the report dealing with professional and commercial occupations, it is stated that enlistment from Government offices has been heavy (about 15 per cent.), and it has been necessary to fill places temporarily on a large scale. As to employment by local bodies, returns from 460 authorities show that over 19,700 persons have been taken on to fill the places of 27,783 who have joined the colours. The enlistment percentage works out at nearly 13½ per cent.

As regards the professions, the general tenor of such reports as come to hand is that while business is restricted it does not yet involve any considerable amount of distress. Business has fallen off particularly heavily in the legal professions, but the decline is compensated from the employers' point of view by the enlistment of a very large percentage of lawyers' clerks. The musical profession has also suffered rather heavily, but apparently more in London than in the provinces. Male school teachers are scarcer than ever, owing to heavy enlistment, and places are being filled by women to such an extent that a shortage of women teachers is reported. Artists and architects seem to be among the worst hit of the professional classes.

There is no evidence of serious lack of employment among domestic servants, except charwomen. Railway companies have been compelled to apply to the War Office for permission to put pressure on their employés not to enlist, and the number who have joined the forces has therefore only risen slightly since October, and is now about [illegible] out of some [illegible] employed. In the London docks [illegible] were employed in the middle of December, compared with [illegible]

By December the reduction in the number of male workers employed, compared with July, had fallen to 10.6 per cent., while the percentage joining the forces had risen from 10.6 in October to 13.3. Hence there has been an actual diminution in the number of males unemployed, as compared with July, of 2.7 per cent.

The number of men on short time fell from 17.3 per cent. in October to 10.8 per cent. in December, while the percentage on overtime rose from 5.2 to 13.

In the case of women the improvement has been almost equally marked. As compared with July, the reduction in the numbers employed was 3.2 per cent. in December, as against 6.2 in October. Short time fell from 26 per cent. to 19.1 per cent., while overtime increased from 5.9 per cent. to 10.8 per cent.

Except in the building, furniture, cotton, and one or two other industries, there is now a shortage rather than a surplus of labour.

This favourable position does not mean that the war has had a small effect on the industrial system. Decline of private business and the great expansion of Government requirements have caused a big transformation of industry, which has been effected with surprisingly little disturbance.

AN INDUSTRIAL TRANSITION.

Dealing with the figures in detail, the report points out that while for September and October the contraction of the numbers employed among males exceeded the numbers known to have joined the forces, in December the position was reversed. In lieu of displacement of men previously employed, there has been a replacement in employment of men previously unemployed: that is to say, the war has actually reduced the numbers unemployed in July by absorbing a proportion of them into industry. This, of course, does not imply that no trades have had to dismiss employés, but that after allowing for enlistment the number of cases in which employés have been taken on is considerably in excess of the dismissals. The changes are shown in the following table, in which the state of employment in October and December is compared with employment before the war:

	Oct.		Dec.
	Males.	Females.	Males.	Females.
	Per cent.		Per cent.
Employed in July	100	100	100	100
Still on full time	66·8	61·9	65·6	66·9
On overtime	5·2	5·9	13·0	10·8
On short time	17·3	26·0	10·8	19·1
Contraction of numbers employed	10·7	6·2	10·6	3·2
Known by Employers to have joined the Forces	10·6	—	13·3	—
Net displacement (−) or replacement (+)	−0·1	−6·2	+2·7	−3·2

The contraction figure in the case of females is chiefly due to the state of affairs in the cotton trade. If the North-Western division (Lancashire and Cheshire) is excluded, the contraction of employment of females in the rest of the United Kingdom is as follows: September, 6.2 per cent.; October, 3.8 per cent.; December, 1.2 per cent.

In the London docks 28,258 men were employed in the middle of December, compared with 24,311 a year ago, an increase of 8 per cent. Liverpool, on the other hand, records a decline of 13.8 per cent. On the East Coast generally employment is below normal; on the West and South Coasts it is good.

WOMEN AS BANK CLERKS.

In commercial occupations there has never been much evidence outside London of serious unemployment, though the situation has been relieved by enlistment on a heavier scale than in other occupations. In London there was in September a considerable discharge of male and female clerks, but enlistment, together with the engagement of several thousands of temporary clerks in various Government offices, has produced a shortage of male clerks, while among the female clerks the situation has been greatly improved.

There has been an increase of 25 per cent. in the employment of women in London banks since the war, while similar, though not quite such striking, figures are given for some other City employments. The enlistment percentage for commercial employments as a whole in London is 18½, which about balances the contraction of numbers employed. There is no evidence of lack of employment among shop assistants.

As to agriculture, while in most districts there is a sufficiency of labour for winter needs, there is likely to be difficulty in getting the necessary work done in the spring, owing to the considerable numbers who have enlisted. Shortage of labour is already marked in the Wold district of Yorkshire and in the Home Counties in the case of milkers and market gardeners.

A PROBLEM FOR LABOUR.

In the Board of Trade's report on the state of employment in this country during December there is much matter both for congratulation and reflection. The state of employment continues to improve in a manner most marked. Returns have been received from 23,000 industrial firms, employing some 4,000,000 workpeople, or just short of 50 per cent. of the whole industrial population. In October the number of male workpeople displaced by the war was balanced by the number who enlisted. In December the latter number had so increased that there was on balance a diminution in the number of unemployed equal to 2.7 per cent. of the male workpeople engaged in industry. Similarly, the reduction of men on short time was very large—from 17.3 per cent. in October to 10.8 per cent. in December, while the percentage on overtime increased from 5.2 per cent. to 13 per cent. This signal improvement is found in a less degree only in the statistics relating to women's employment, which was the first to be seriously affected by war conditions. The reduction in the number of women unemployed and in the number on short time has been considerable, while the number of women on overtime has doubled. No doubt this improvement is not spread equally over the country's industries, and some, like the cotton, building, and furniture trades, are still suffering severely. But it is evident that the worst effects of the dislocation due to the war are over and that the figures of unemployment to-day are actually lower than in pre-war times. There has been, as the Board of Trade report points out, a big transformation of industry, and "the most noteworthy feature of the situation is that such a transition should have been effected so easily." The fact that short time and overtime exist together shows that the necessary adjustment is not yet complete; but we can at least dismiss the forebodings that were so confidently expressed at the opening of the war. This result is very largely due to the prompt response which the workers have made to the call to arms, for it is a notable fact that recruiting has been highest in those very trades where there is an abundance of Government orders. All honour is due to the men who have thus unhesitatingly thrown up well-paid work to serve their country, and to their leaders who have exerted their influence to promote the interests of voluntary enlistment. If only in requital of such services, it must be a first care to do nothing that would injure the legitimate interests of organised labour. But it is possible to suggest to those who direct and advise organised labour that the time has now come when freer scope might be given to the employment of that great mass of labour which the overrunning of Belgium by the German hordes has driven to our shores. These new statistics prove that it would be possible, without injury to Trade Union rates and conditions, and with immense advantage to the country as a whole, to absorb a large proportion of the Belgian refugees who now find themselves compelled against their will to eat the bitter bread of charity and to rust in idleness. A shortage of labour—and that is the prospect that has now been realised in some industries and that is imminent in others—can only result in sending up prices more and more, with consequences incalculably distressing for those whose welfare is the immediate concern of the labour organisations. On the other hand, the absorption of this available labour can only lead to an increase of the nation's power to bear its burden of charity, together with a decrease of the burden itself. The sufferings and wrongs of the Belgian people have most profoundly moved the workpeople of this country, and it is certain that they will not look askance at any arrangements that may be possible to relieve in the best way the distress of those who have been invited to seek sanctuary among us.

Daily News & Leader, Jan. 19th 1915.

WORK IN TIME OF WAR.

Marked Improvement in December.

HOW THE MEN HAVE JOINED THE COLOURS.

From the Board of Trade a most interesting report was issued yesterday on the state of employment in December, with particular relation to the war. The report is in continuation of that for October, and is based mainly on returns received from 23,000 industrial firms, employing about 4,000,000 workpeople, that is, about 43 per cent. of the industrial population.

The report states that the improvement which was noted for October has continued. In October the reduction in the number of male workpeople employed, compared with July, was 10.7 per cent., while the percentage joining the forces up to that date was 10.6 per cent., so that, allowing for enlistment, there was practically no net increase of unemployment as between July and October.

By December the reduction in the number of male workpeople employed had fallen to 10.6 per cent., while the percentage joining the forces had risen to 13.3. There had, therefore, from July to December, been an actual diminution in the number unemployed, representing 2.7 per cent. of the male workpeople in industry.

The favourable tendency shown by the statistics is emphasised by the figures for short time and overtime. The number of men on short time has been reduced from 17.3 per cent. in October to 10.8 per cent. in December, while the percentage on overtime has risen from 5.2 per cent. to 13.0 per cent.

Women Seriously Affected.

Women were more seriously affected by the war than men, but the recent improvement in their case has been almost equally marked. As compared with July, the reduction in the numbers employed was 3.2 per cent. in December, as against 6.2 in October.

It is pointed out that the contraction in the case of females is chiefly due to the state of affairs in the cotton trade, for if Lancashire and Cheshire are excluded the contraction of female employment in the rest of the United Kingdom is as follows:

September	6.2 per cent.
October	3.8 „ „
December	1.2 „ „

Except in the building, furniture, cotton, and one or two other industries, there is a shortage rather than a surplus of labour. The employment in the cotton trade, however, shows "an appreciable improvement."

Transformation of Industry.

"The employment figures," the report says, "are not very far from normal, but they do not indicate that the war has had a small effect on the industrial system. On the contrary, there has been a big transformation of industry; for while private business has fallen off to an unprecedented extent, the requirements of the Government have undergone so great an expansion that, when account is taken of the numbers joining the forces, the labour market presents the appearance of a trade boom.

"The most noteworthy feature of the situation is that so important a transition should have been effected so easily, and with so little unemployment. There has been an important transference of labour and machinery, which has been effected, on the whole, much more smoothly than might have been anticipated. But the fact that short time and overtime are found together, not only when the figures for the whole country are taken, but also in the same trade and the same district, shows that there is still considerable room for further adjustment."

Employment and Enlistment.

A noteworthy feature of the report is the statement that, although recruiting is no doubt encouraged by unemployment, the prosperity or depression of a trade is by no means the only factor in determining the percentage of enlistment. As a matter of fact, in some of the most prosperous trades the percentage of enlistment is very high, and is apparently the cause of a good deal of overtime amongst those who remain at home.

Taking the number of employed males in July, the contraction of the number employed and those known to have joined the forces since the beginning of the war, the percentages for the various industries

INDUSTRY'S GIFT IN MEN.

HOW ALL TRADES HAVE JOINED THE COLOURS.

WOMEN BANK CLERKS.

Cheery optimism is the note struck by a Government return issued last night dealing with the condition of British industries at the end of December. It is shown that while in September and October there was a decided increase in unemployment owing to war, by the end of December the trouble had more than righted itself.

It is a remarkable fact that in many industries, in spite of the abundance of Government orders and the keen demand for labour, there has been a marked increase in enlistment.

The net result has been that the war, instead of increasing unemployment, has actually reduced the numbers that were unemployed in July by absorbing a proportion of them into industry. In many industries there is an actual shortage of labour.

Three groups of trades which give employment to 7,000,000 men are set out in detail, and it is shown that of these 13.3 per cent., or 931,000 men, have joined the forces. Different trades have varied in the proportion of men they have sent. Some of the trades are as follows:—

	Men employed		Joined the forces.
Coal and other mines	1,164,000	.....	13.7
Iron and steel	311,000	.....	13.9
Shipbuilding	164,000	.....	13.6
Engineering	567,000	.....	14.6
Wool and worsted ...	129,000	.....	7.2
Boot and shoe	199,000	.....	9.9
Leather goods	116,000	.....	16.6
Food	344,500	.....	13.4
Clothing	235,000	.....	12.5
Paper and printing	242,000	.....	12.5
Cycle and motor	202,800	.....	14.3
Building	1,422,500	.....	12.2
Furniture	132,000	.....	13.5
Cotton	254,000	.....	4.6

Translated into numbers some of the percentages show the following actual numbers who have joined the colours:—

	Men.
Coalminers	159,468
Iron and steel workers	43,229
Shipbuilders	22,904
Engineers	82,782
Papermakers and printers	29,796
Builders	124,745
Cycle and motor makers	28,886

OTHER SOURCES.

In addition to the enlistment among the trades indicated, enlistment from Government offices has been very heavy, about 15 per cent., and it has been necessary to fill places temporarily on a large scale. Then 27,783 men employed by 400 local authorities have joined the colours, and their places have had to be filled, some 19,700 persons having already been taken on.

The Professions.—The general tenor of the reports received is that while business is restricted it does not yet involve any considerable amount of distress. Business has fallen off particularly heavily in the legal professions, but the decline is compensated from the employers' point of view by the enlistment of a very large percentage of lawyers' clerks.

The musical profession has also suffered rather heavily, but apparently more in London than in the provinces. Male school teachers are scarcer than ever owing to heavy enlistment, and places are being filled by women to such an extent that a shortage of women teachers is reported. Artists and architects seem to be among the worst hit of the professional classes.

Domestic Service.—The fear expressed in the autumn that there would be very little employment later in the year has not been realised, and except among charwomen there is no evidence of serious lack of employment.

Commercial Occupations.—There has never been much evidence outside London of serious unemployment, though the situation has been relieved by enlistment on a heavier scale than in other occupations.

In London there was in September a considerable discharge of male and female clerks, but enlistment, with the engagement of several thousands of temporary clerks in various Government offices, has produced a shortage of male clerks, while among the female clerks the situation has been [illegible]

There has been, as the Board of Trade report points out, a big transformation of industry, and "the most noteworthy feature of the situation is that such a transition should have been effected so easily." The fact that short time and overtime exist together shows that the necessary adjustment is not yet complete; but we can at least dismiss the forebodings that were so confidently expressed at the opening of the war. This result is very largely due to the prompt response which the workers have made to the call to arms, for it is a notable fact that recruiting has been highest in those very trades where there is an abundance of Government orders. All honour is due to the men who have thus unhesitatingly thrown up well-paid work to serve their country, and to their leaders who have exerted their influence to promote the interests of voluntary enlistment. If only in requital of such services, it must be a first care to do nothing that would injure the legitimate interests of organised labour. But it is possible to suggest to those who direct and advise organised labour that the time has now come when freer scope might be given to the employment of that great mass of labour which the overrunning of Belgium by the German hordes has driven to our shores. These new statistics prove that it would be possible, without injury to Trade Union rates and conditions, and with immense advantage to the country as a whole, to absorb a large proportion of the Belgian refugees who now find themselves compelled against their will to eat the bitter bread of charity and to rust in idleness. A shortage of labour—and that is the prospect that has now been realised in some industries and that is imminent in others—can only result in sending up prices more and more, with consequences incalculably distressing for those whose welfare is the immediate concern of the labour organisations. On the other hand, the absorption of this available labour can only lead to an increase of the nation's power to bear its burden of charity, together with a decrease of the burden itself. The sufferings and wrongs of the Belgian people have most profoundly moved the workpeople of this country, and it is certain that they will not look askance at any arrangements that may be possible to relieve in the best way the distress of those who have been invited to seek sanctuary among us.

net increase of unemployment as between July and October.

By December the reduction in the number of male workpeople employed had fallen to 10.6 per cent., while the percentage joining the forces had risen to 13.3. There had, therefore, from July to December, been an actual diminution in the number unemployed, representing 2.7 per cent. of the male workpeople in industry.

The favourable tendency shown by the statistics is emphasised by the figures for short time and overtime. The number of men on short time has been reduced from 17.3 per cent. in October to 10.8 per cent. in December, while the percentage on overtime has risen from 5.2 per cent. to 13.0 per cent.

Women Seriously Affected.

Women were more seriously affected by the war than men, but the recent improvement in their case has been almost equally marked. As compared with July, the reduction in the numbers employed was 3.2 per cent. in December, as against 6.2 in October.

It is pointed out that the contraction in the case of females is chiefly due to the state of affairs in the cotton trade, for if Lancashire and Cheshire are excluded the contraction of female employment in the rest of the United Kingdom is as follows:

September	6.2 per cent.
October	3.8 „ „
December	1.2 „ „

Except in the building, furniture, cotton, and one or two other industries, there is a shortage rather than a surplus of labour. The employment in the cotton trade, however, shows "an appreciable improvement."

Transformation of Industry.

"The employment figures," the report says, "are not very far from normal, but they do not indicate that the war has had a small effect on the industrial system. On the contrary, there has been a big transformation of industry; for while private business has fallen off to an unprecedented extent, the requirements of the Government have undergone so great an expansion that, when account is taken of the numbers joining the forces, the labour market presents the appearance of a trade boom.

"The most noteworthy feature of the situation is that so important a transition should have been effected so easily, and with so little unemployment. There has been an important transference of labour and machinery, which has been effected, on the whole, much more smoothly than might have been anticipated. But the fact that short time and overtime are found together, not only when the figures for the whole country are taken, but also in the same trade and the same district, shows that there is still considerable room for further adjustment."

Employment and Enlistment.

A noteworthy feature of the report is the statement that, although recruiting is, no doubt, encouraged by unemployment, the prosperity or depression of a trade is by no means the only factor in determining the percentage of enlistment. As a matter of fact, in some of the most prosperous trades the percentage of enlistment is very high, and is apparently the cause of a good deal of overtime amongst those who remain at home.

Taking the number of employed males in July, the contraction of the numbers employed and those known to have joined the forces show for December the following percentages for the various labour exchange divisions:

	Contraction of Employed. Per cent.	Joined the Forces. Per cent.
London	11.5	13.0
South-Eastern	12.5	15.2
South-Western	13.2	16.0
W. Midlands	10.0	12.7
East Midlands	10.4	11.2
Yorkshire	7.4	10.7
Northern	11.8	14.6
N.-Western	12.1	12.8
Wales	10.0	13.4
Scotland	11.0	16.0
Ireland	7.2	11.6

The enlistment figures relate solely to men known to their employers to have left industrial employment for the purpose of joining the forces. Recruits who enlisted whilst unemployed are not included.

unemployed in July by absorbing a proportion of them into industry. In many industries there is an actual shortage of labour.

Three groups of trades which give employment to 7,000,000 men are set out in detail, and it is shown that of these 13.3 per cent., or 931,000 men, have joined the forces. Different trades have varied in the proportion of men they have sent. Some of the trades are as follows:—

	Men employed	Joined the forces.
Coal and other mines	1,164,000	13.7
Iron and steel	311,000	13.9
Shipbuilding	164,000	13.6
Engineering	567,000	14.6
Wool and worsted	129,000	7.2
Boot and shoe	199,000	9.9
Leather goods	116,000	16.6
Food	314,500	13.4
Clothing	235,000	12.5
Paper and printing	242,000	12.5
Cycle and motor	202,000	14.3
Building	1,022,500	12.2
Furniture	132,000	13.5
Cotton	254,000	9.6

	Men.
Coalminers	159,468
Iron and steel workers	43,229
Shipbuilders	22,904
Engineers	82,782
Papermakers and printers	29,796
Builders	124,745
Cycle and motor makers	28,886

OTHER SOURCES.

In addition to the enlistment among the trades indicated, enlistment from Government offices has been very heavy, about 15 per cent., and it has been necessary to fill places temporarily on a large scale. When 27,783 men employed by 460 local authorities have joined the colours, and their places have had to be filled, some 19,700 persons having already been taken on.

The Professions.—The general tenor of the reports received is that while business is restricted it does not yet involve any considerable amount of distress. Business has fallen off particularly heavily in the legal professions, but the decline is compensated from the employers' point of view by the enlistment of a very large percentage of lawyers' clerks.

The musical profession has also suffered rather heavily, but apparently more in London than in the provinces. Male school teachers are scarcer than ever owing to heavy enlistment, and places are being filled by women to such an extent that a shortage of women teachers is reported. Artists and architects seem to be among the worst hit of the professional classes.

Domestic Service.—The fear expressed in the autumn that there would be very little employment later in the year has not been realised, and except among charwomen there is no evidence of serious lack of employment

Commercial Occupations.—There has never been much evidence outside London of serious unemployment, though the situation has been relieved by enlistment on a heavier scale than in other occupations.

In London there was in September a considerable discharge of male and female clerks, but enlistment, with the engagement of several thousands of temporary clerks in various Government offices, has produced a shortage of male clerks, while among the female clerks the situation has been greatly improved, partly through Government employment and partly through the filling of places vacated by men in banks and other commercial offices.

Statistics relating to commercial employment in London show that there has been an increase of 25 per cent. in the employment of women in London banks since the war, while similar, though not quite such striking, figures are given for some other City employments. The enlistment percentage for commercial employments as a whole in London is 18½, which about balances the contraction of numbers employed

Railways.—The companies have been compelled to apply to the War Office for permission to put pressure on their employees not to enlist, and the number who have joined the forces has therefore only risen slightly since our last report, and is now about 60,000 out of some 600,000 employed.

Docks.—Employment in London was abnormally brisk throughout November and December, and certain classes of work in the port have been held up for lack of labour. The number enlisting of this class of worker is very high throughout the country.

Agriculture.—The correspondents of the Board of Agriculture report that while in most districts there is a sufficiency of labour for winter needs, there is likely to be difficulty in getting the necessary work done in the spring owing to the considerable numbers who have enlisted. Shortage of labour is already marked in the Wold district of Yorkshire and in the home counties in the case of milkers and market gardeners. At the November hirings in several districts competition among farmers has caused a considerable advance in wages.

FEWER UNEMPLOYED.

IMPROVEMENT SHOWN IN DECEMBER.

THE PROFESSIONS.

Based mainly on returns received from 23,000 industrial firms employing about 4,000,000 workpeople—roughly 43 per cent. of the industrial population—a report was issued by the Board of Trade yesterday showing the state of unemployment in the United Kingdom in December.

The improvement which was noted in the report for October was continued. In October the reduction in the number of male workpeople employed, compared with July, was 10.7 per cent., while the percentage joining the forces up to that date was 10.6 per cent. By December the reduction had fallen to 10.6 per cent., while the percentage joining the forces had risen to 13.3.

Women were more seriously affected, but the recent improvement in their case has been almost equally marked. As compared with July, the reduction in the numbers employed was 3.2 per cent. in December, as against 6.2 in October.

The trades which show the largest contraction of employment are building, cotton, and furniture, but in many a shortage of labour is noticeable.

As regards the professions, the general tenour of such reports as come to hand is that while business is restricted it does not yet involve any considerable amount of distress. Business has fallen off particularly heavily in the legal professions, but the decline is compensated from the employers' point of view by the enlistment of a very large percentage of lawyers' clerks. The musical profession has also suffered rather heavily, but apparently more in London than in the provinces. Male school teachers are scarcer than ever owing to heavy enlistment, and places are being filled by women to such an extent that a shortage of women teachers is reported. Artists and architects seem to be among the worst hit of the professional classes.

MORE WOMEN BANK CLERKS.

In domestic service the fear expressed in the autumn that there would be very little employment later in the year has not been realised, and except among charwomen there is no evidence of serious lack of employment.

In commercial occupations there has never been much evidence outside London of serious unemployment, though the situation has been relieved by enlistment on a heavier scale than in other occupations. In London there was in September a considerable discharge of male and female clerks, but enlistment, together with the engagement of several thousands of temporary clerks in various Government offices, has produced a shortage of male clerks, while among the female clerks the situation has been greatly improved, partly through Government employment and partly through the filling of places vacated by men in banks and other commercial offices. Statistics relating to commercial employment in London show that there has been an increase of 25 per cent. in the employment of women in London banks since the war, while similar, though not quite such striking figures, are given for some other City employments. The enlistment percentage for commercial employments as a whole in London is 18½, which about balances the contraction of numbers employed. Fuller details of this investigation are given in the supplement to this report.

As regards railways, says the report, the companies have been compelled to apply to the War Office for permission to put pressure on their employees not to enlist, and the number who have joined the forces has therefore only risen slightly since our last report, and is now about 60,000 out of some 600,000 employed. In view of the abnormal pressure of Christmas and the demands of the Government for transport, the companies have been compelled temporarily to fill places to some extent. The situation with regard to tramway and omnibus services is little changed compared with October.

As regards the docks, the need of labour is pressing. As to agriculture, while in most districts there is a sufficiency of labour for winter needs, there is likely to be difficulty in getting the necessary work done in the spring owing to the considerable numbers who have enlisted. There is no evidence of lack of employment among shop assistants.

PLYMOUTH CONFERENCE.

MISS M. P. WILLCOCKS ON WOMEN'S EMPLOYMENT.

The Plymouth Conference, which assembles in the Belgrave Electric Theatre, Mutley, was addressed on Sunday afternoon by Miss M. P. Willcocks, B.A., the well-known novelist. Miss Slater resided.

Miss Willcocks's subject was "War and Women's Employment." She believed there was little, if any, unemployment among women in Plymouth, but the position in many towns was less favourable. Out of the question of police supervision over the recipients of separation allowances she thought two points arose in respect of those who were mothers—whether the grants were made by the State because of their service to the State as mothers, or whether the grants were made as wages earned by their husbands. She agreed that if the allowances were given as wages earned by their husbands, subject to police supervision, it followed that the wives of all in the public service must be subject to supervision in the same way—(applause). She dwelt upon the importance of the support of motherhood. The woman who gave birth to, and reared, a future citizen was doing a piece of work of first class value, and she had a right to support during the period of life that the claim of that work was paramount. If the State paid it would, of course, be entitled to take away the child if it was not properly cared for, but that was not a thing to be lightly done.

The war had brought them up against certain realities which asked them questions, and the answers they gave would settle the fate of civilisation for centuries to come. Among the great questions before them was the one to which she had referred. The State that first solved the problem how to give its children a full share of the gifts of life was the State that would not only win battles, but would also settle the final heights to which they would rise. Another was to decide what was to be done, after the war, with the widow with children.

Then there was the problem of the employment of women. Speaking principally of the middle classes, she lamented the fact that spinster life was very largely thrown away in this country. They were wasting much power, ability, and energy possessed by the genteel young women. How to get over the difficulties she did not know. She recognised the difficulties which would arise if all the women entered the labour market, and yet it was pathetic that any energy, any ability, any willingness to work should be lost.

Many women were engaged in the finery trade, and at present they were suffering badly. All who were engaged in the production of what could be classified "luxuries" were hit in war time. She spoke of cases where contracts had been lost because some of the labour masters would not put aside their prejudice against women and allow them to do work which hitherto had been done by men. Prejudice ought not to be allowed to stand in the way. In the factory, in the shop, in the office, and in the agricultural industry she thought women should be employed to take the places of the men who had gone away—(hear, hear)

Were women going to be unnecessarily sheltered in some respects, and not protected where they should be: or were they going to let them come out and render national service where that was possible? Women shared in the greatness of England, as they shared in the greatness of the human race and the hopes of the future, and they wanted to pay back something for what had been given to them—(applause).

ADDRESS ON "PEACE."

In the evening the Rev. Hatty Baker addressed the Conference on "Peace."

In her opening remarks she stated that the Scriptures said "He has made every man of one flesh." In dealing with the sufferings of war she thought that the women suffered more than the men. The whole energy of women was to save life, and they found women going right away to France for that purpose. The question she asked was "What are the Churches doing to bring about peace?" It appeared to her that the Churches had lost their lead. The Chinese were praying daily for peace, and praying also that the people of Europe might be forgiven for killing one another. What was wanted was an educated democracy and that the voice of the people should be heard. There should be no Triple Alliance; only one alliance to prevent terrible wars—one great union, in which all nations should take a place. The individual must be brought to realise sufficiently the horrors of war, so that appeal should be made to the nations to lay down arms at once. Let them remember that their foes were the same blood as themselves, and that they should not pick out the bad in them, but the good. In conclusion, she stated that if the Pope could bring about a great International Council and demand peace, no Government could stand against it.

Miss Bisson, of Devonport, was the soloist, and the Rev. Hatty Baker was thanked for her outspoken address. Miss E. J. Rendell presided at the organ.

Employment and Recruiting.

The Board of Trade's preliminary report on its special inquiry into unemployment last month shows that (except in particular localities, such as cotton-towns or fishing-towns) there is no sort of abnormal distress. This is primarily due to the numbers joining the Colours, which in October approximately balanced the contraction of the labour market, but have now gone so far beyond it that except in the building, furniture, and one or two other industries there is a shortage rather than a surplus of labour. The December percentages of unemployment among males were therefore extremely low; and the shortage has indirectly stimulated the demand for female labour, so that except in the cotton area the percentages of female unemployment are low also. Indeed the drain caused by recruiting has been so enormous that the difficulty is coming to be much less that of finding work for the workers than that of finding workers for the work. Most of the "war trades" (though not, for some reason or other, the cycle, motor, carriage, and wagon building group) are experiencing the dearth of male labour, and finding it necessary to attract men from the outside.

The figures for men joining the Colours, which were collected and analysed side by side with those for unemployment, throw some new lights of their own. Over 23,000 firms, employing over 4,000,000 workpeople, made returns regarding industrial employment (as distinct from professional, commercial, transport, and agricultural employment); and though the totals of males and females respectively are not given, it appears that in the whole membership of the trades studied, the males formed about three-quarters. The percentage of males enlisted by December was 13.3, which if it may be calculated on 3,000,000 males means 399,000. When it is remembered that not much above a third of these employed males can be of military age, or say 1,000,000 of the total before us, it would seem that we had already by December enlisted roughly 40 per cent. of the gross number available. But this gross number includes all those—the undersized, the narrow-chested, the lame, the weak-sighted, and so on—who, though they have a place in industry, can find no place in war. The net number really available must be much less, and the number joining the Colours must be well over half it. When we start making further deductions for men employed in the short-handed "war trades" it will be seen that the unrecruited margin can be by no means large. Some idea of it can be perhaps obtained by comparing districts. The districts supplying most men to the Colours were Scotland and South-West England, with 16.0 each, followed by South-East England with 15.2. Those supplying least were Yorkshire with 10.7 and the East Midlands with 11.2. In each case they are men supplied from producing industries only, and the difference of the figures certainly seems excessive; for though West Riding cloth and East Midland boots are conspicuous "war trades" a large proportion of the production in Scotland is also for the Government, and so, too, one would have thought in South-West England. Of occupations other than industrial it is interesting to note that Government offices have sent 9 per cent of their staff to the Colours, and local authorities 13½ per cent.; while the percentage for commercial employments (clerks, &c.) as a whole in London reached 18½ per cent.

THE LABOUR MARKET.

EMPLOYMENT IN DECEMBER

IMPROVEMENT MAINTAINED.

The improvement in the state of employment in the United Kingdom, which was officially noted in the late autumn, is further emphasised in the Board of Trade report for December, issued as a White Paper. The report is based mainly on returns received from 23,000 industrial firms employing about 4,000,000 workpeople, i.e., about 43 per cent. of the industrial population

Sir H. Llewellyn Smith, Permanent Secretary to the Board of Trade, in a covering memorandum to the President of the Board, states that in October the reduction in the number of male workpeople employed, compared with July, was 10.7 per cent., while the percentage joining the forces up to that date was 10.6 per cent., so that allowing for enlistment there was practically no net increase of unemployment as between July and October. By December the reduction in the number of male workpeople employed had fallen to 10.6 per cent., while the percentage joining the Forces had risen to 13.3. There had, therefore, from July to December, been an actual dimimution in the number unemployed, representing 2.7 per cent. of the male workpeople in industry.

"The favourable tendency shown by the statistics is emphasised by the figures for short time and overtime. The number of men on short time has been reduced from 17.3 per cent. in October to 10.8 per cent. in December, while the percentage on overtime has risen from 5.2 per cent. to 13.0 per cent.

"Women were more seriously affected by the war than men, but the recent improvement in their case has been almost equally marked. As compared with July the reduction in the numbers employed was 3.2 per cent. in December, as against 6.2 in October. Short time has fallen from 26 per cent. to 19.1 per cent., while overtime has increased from 5.9 per cent. to 10.0 per cent.

"The trades which show the largest contraction of employment are the building, cotton, and the furniture trades, but in many industries a shortage of labour, rather than a lack of employment, has become the chief feature of the situation."

MALE AND FEMALE WORKERS.

Statistical tables given in the report show that while for September and October the contraction of the numbers employed among males exceeded numbers known to have joined the forces, in December the position was reversed, and the numbers known to have joined the forces exceeded the contraction of the numbers employed. In lieu of displacement of men previously employed, there had been a replacement in employment of men previously unemployed; that is to say, the war has actually reduced the numbers unemployed in July by absorbing a proportion of them into industry.

Among females the contraction of numbers employed (8.4 per cent. in September, 6.2 October, and 3.2 December) was chiefly due to the state of affairs in the cotton trade, and if Lancashire and Cheshire had been excluded the contraction in December would have been only 1 per cent

"The employment figures are thus not very far from normal," says the report, "but they do not indicate that the war has had a small effect on the industrial system. On the contrary, there has been a big transformation of industry; for while private business has fallen off to an unprecedented extent, the requirements of the Government have undergone so great an expansion that, when account is taken of the numbers joining the forces, the labour market presents the appearance of a trade boom. The most noteworthy feature of the situation is that so important a transition should have been effected so easily, and with so little unemployment. There has been an important transference of labour and [illegible] which has been effected, on the whole, much more smoothly than might have been anticipated. But the fact that short time and overtime are found together, not only when the figures for the whole country are taken, but also in the same trade and the same district, shows that there is still considerable room for further adjustment."

In the following trades there was a marked shortage of male labour, and it has been necessary to attract men from outside: Coal and other mines, iron and steel, shipbuilding, engineering, wool and worsted, boot and shoe, leather, leather goods, canvas, rubber, etc., chemicals, timber, hosiery, and food. The most notable feature in regard to these trades is stated to be the fact that there has been a marked increase in enlistment in each, in spite of the abundance of Government orders and the keen demand for labour. The leather, etc., trades show the highest percentage of men known to have joined the forces (16.6), and the wool and worsted the lowest (7.2), but the latter figure is nearly 2½ per cent. higher than in October. In all these trades, except the coal trade, there is much more overtime than short time.

NORMAL CONDITIONS.

Industries showing a fairly normal condition as regards male labour were the clothing, paper and printing, china, pottery and glass, linen, jute and hemp, cycle and motor and carriage and wagon-building. On the other hand, in the building, brick and stone, furniture, cotton and tinplate trades the contraction of numbers employed was considerably greater than the withdrawal of men for the forces. The building trade stands out as the one important industry showing results greatly inferior to those of October. The gross contraction figure rose to 21.5 per cent., and after making allowance for those joining the forces, there was still a net contraction of 9.3 per cent. It is pointed out, however, that the large number of carpenters employed directly by the Government in the erection of soldiers' huts, help to swell the contraction figures, as the tables refer only to employment by private firms.

Of the approximate male industrial population (7,000,000) the percentage on short time in December was 10.8, and on overtime 13.0. In the case of the female industrial population (2,250,000), however, the numbers on short time are much larger than those on overtime, the respective percentages being 19.1 and 10.8.

The report states that enlistment from Government offices has been heavy (about 16 per cent.), and it has been necessary to fill places temporarily on a large scale; but an estimate of the additional employment given in this way cannot yet be made. As to employment by local bodies, returns from 460 authorities show that over 19,700 persons have been taken on to fill the places of 27,783 who have joined the Colours.

PROFESSIONAL CLASSES

"As regards the professions, the general tenor of such reports as come to hand is that, while business is restricted, it does not yet involve any considerable amount of distress Business has fallen off particularly heavily in the legal professions, but the decline is compensated from the employers' point of view by the enlistment of a very large percentage of lawyers' clerks. The musical profession has also suffered rather heavily, but apparently more in London than the provinces. Male school teachers are scarcer than ever owing to heavy enlistment, and places are being filled by women to such an extent that a shortage of women teachers is reported. Artists and architects seem to be among the worst hit of the professional classes."

Statistics relating to commercial employment show that there has been an increase of 25 per cent. in the employment of women in London banks since the war.

As regards agriculture, the correspondents of the Board of Agriculture report that while in most districts there is a sufficiency of labour for winter needs, there is likely to be difficulty in getting the necessary work done in the spring, owing to the considerable numbers who have enlisted.

REASSURING evidence has already been quoted from the Board of Trade statistics to show that, in spite of the war and active recruiting, work is plentiful in the country and wages good—that unemployment in the last month of the year was actually lower than in the corresponding month of 1913, and only about half of the mean of the previous five years. Fuller statistics, published to-day, which cover occupations employing nearly 9¼ millions of persons, or some 43 per cent. of the whole industrial population of these islands, enable us to form a more accurate and definite opinion regarding the influence of the war and of recruitment on particular trades and in particular districts. The general impression drawn from these figures is highly gratifying. Two movements, which might seem to be strongly antagonistic—the voluntary flow of men into the ranks of the Army and the maintenance of the efficiency of the national industries—proceed satisfactorily. Enlistment has, of course, served, to a certain extent, to drain away unemployment. But it would appear that, under war conditions, the national industries have begun to replace in employment men who were unable to find work. In December, "in lieu of displacement of men previously employed," there was "a replacement of men previously unemployed"; workmen have been absorbed back into industry as well as drafted in larger numbers into the service of the country. After allowing for enlistment, which, in the industries covered by the returns rose from 8.8 per cent. in September to 10.6 per cent. in October, and to 13.3 per cent. in December, the cases in which employees were taken on in these trades rose in the latter month considerably over the number of dismissals. This is traceable to the fact that, while, owing to the war, "private business has fallen off to an unprecedented extent," Government requirements have undergone so great an expansion that, "when account is taken of the numbers "joining the forces, the labour market pre- "sents the appearance of a trade boom." What is proceeding is, in fact, an industrial transition, among the features of which is an extension of female employment and "the "transfer of more than a normal proportion "of the nation's business to large concerns"; while most noteworthy and most gratifying of all is the fact that this big transformation is being effected with "surprisingly little disturbance." We have come to a time when, except in the building and certain other industries, there is now "a shortage rather than a surplus of labour," and when overtime is in excess of short time. Compared with the period before the war, there is a contraction in the numbers employed in the industries covered by the return to the extent of 10.6 per cent., while the numbers known to have joined the forces amount, as has been seen, to 13.3 per cent., leaving a net replacement from the ranks of the unemployed of 2.7 per cent. The number of men on short time fell from 17.3 per cent. in October to 10.8 per cent. in December; while the number working overtime rose in the same period from 5.2 to 13 per cent. The proportions varied greatly in different branches of trade. Thus, in the iron and steel, shipbuilding, engineering, leather and timber trades, the contraction in the number employed has been relatively small, notwithstanding that the percentages known to have joined the Army have been equal to or above the average. In the wool and worsted and hosiery industries, the contraction, for obvious reasons, has been less than 1 per cent., and in chemicals only 3.3 per cent. These are all trades in which there has been a marked shortage of male labour, rendering it necessary to draw upon supplies from outside, and overtime has risen to a high percentage. On the other hand, in the building, brick and stone, and furniture businesses, the decrease in the number of employed in December, compared with the period before the war, has been over 20 per cent., and there has been a displacement of labour, after deducting recruits drafted into the forces, varying from 9.3 to 6.7 per cent. Employment in the cotton trade, in spite of certain adverse new factors, shows an improvement, but the contraction in numbers employed 13.5 per cent. is still not nearly accounted industry.

"The favourable tendency shown by the statistics is emphasised by the figures for short time and overtime. The number of men on short time has been reduced from 17.3 per cent. in October to 10.8 per cent. in December, while the percentage on overtime has risen from 5.2 per cent. to 13.0 per cent.

"Women were more seriously affected by the war than men, but the recent improvement in their case has been almost equally marked. As compared with July the reduction in the numbers employed was 3.2 per cent. in December, as against 6.2 in October. Short time has fallen from 25 per cent. to 19.1 per cent., while overtime has increased from 5.9 per cent. to 10.0 per cent.

"The trades which show the largest contraction of employment are the building, cotton, and the furniture trades, but in many industries a shortage of labour, rather than a lack of employment, has become the chief feature of the situation."

MALE AND FEMALE WORKERS.

Statistical tables given in the report show that while for September and October the contraction of the numbers employed among males exceeded numbers known to have joined the forces, in December the position was reversed, and the numbers known to have joined the forces exceeded the contraction of the numbers employed. In lieu of displacement of men previously employed, there had been a replacement in employment of men previously unemployed: that is to say, the war has actually reduced the numbers unemployed in July by absorbing a proportion of them into industry.

Among females the contraction of numbers employed (8.4 per cent. in September, 6.2 October, and 3.2 December) was chiefly due to the state of affairs in the cotton trade, and if Lancashire and Cheshire had been excluded the contraction in December would have been only 1 per cent.

"The employment figures are thus not very far from normal," says the report, "but they do not indicate that the war has had a small effect on the industrial system. On the contrary, there has been a big transformation of industry; for while private business has fallen off to an unprecedented extent, the requirements of the Government have undergone so great an expansion that, when account is taken of the numbers joining the forces, the labour market presents the appearance of a trade boom. showing results greatly inferior to those of October. The gross contraction figure rose to 21.5 per cent., and after making allowance for those joining the forces, there was still a net contraction of 9.3 per cent. It is pointed out, however, that the large number of carpenters employed directly by the Government in the erection of soldiers' huts, help to swell the contraction figures, as the tables refer only to employment by private firms.

Of the approximate male industrial population (7,000,000) the percentage on short time in December was 10.8, and on overtime 13.0. In the case of the female industrial population (2,250,000), however, the numbers on short time are much larger than those on overtime, the respective percentages being 19.1 and 10.8.

The report states that enlistment from Government offices has been heavy (about 15 per cent.), and it has been necessary to fill places temporarily on a large scale; but an estimate of the additional employment given in this way cannot yet be made. As to employment by local bodies, returns from 460 authorities show that over 19,700 persons have been taken on to fill the places of 27,783 who have joined the Colours.

PROFESSIONAL CLASSES

"As regards the professions, the general tenor of such reports as come to hand is that, while business is restricted, it does not yet involve any considerable amount of distress. Business has fallen off particularly heavily in the legal professions, but the decline is compensated from the employers' point of view by the enlistment of a very large percentage of lawyers' clerks. The musical profession has also suffered rather heavily, but apparently more in London than the provinces. Male school teachers are scarcer than ever owing to heavy enlistment, and places are being filled by women to such an extent that a shortage of women teachers is reported. Artists and architects seem to be among the worst hit of the professional classes."

Statistics relating to commercial employment show that there has been an increase of 25 per cent. in the employment of women in London banks since the war.

As regards agriculture, the correspondents of the Board of Agriculture report that while in most districts there is a sufficiency of labour for winter needs, there is likely to be difficulty in getting the necessary work done in the spring, owing to the considerable numbers who have enlisted.

numbers into the service of the country. After allowing for enlistment, which, in the industries covered by the returns rose from 8.8 per cent. in September to 10.6 per cent. in October, and to 13.3 per cent. in December, the cases in which employees were taken on in these trades rose in the latter month considerably over the number of dismissals. This is traceable to the fact that, while, owing to the war, "private business has fallen off to an unprecedented extent," Government requirements have undergone so great an expansion that, "when account is taken of the numbers "joining the forces, the labour market pre-"sents the appearance of a trade boom." What is proceeding is, in fact, an industrial transition, among the features of which is an extension of female employment and "the "transfer of more than a normal proportion "of the nation's business to large concerns"; while most noteworthy and most gratifying of all is the fact that this big transformation is being effected with "surprisingly little disturbance." We have come to a time when, except in the building and certain other industries, there is now "a shortage rather than a surplus of labour," and when overtime is in excess of short time. Compared with the period before the war, there is a contraction in the numbers employed in the industries covered by the return to the extent of 10.6 per cent., while the numbers known to have joined the forces amount, as has been seen, to 13.3 per cent., leaving a net replacement from the ranks of the unemployed of 2.7 per cent. The number of men on short time fell from 17.3 per cent. in October to 10.8 per cent. in December; while the number working overtime rose in the same period from 5.2 to 13 per cent. The proportions varied greatly in different branches of trade. Thus, in the iron and steel, shipbuilding, engineering, leather and timber trades, the contraction in the number employed has been relatively small, notwithstanding that the percentages known to have joined the Army have been equal to or above the average. In the wool and worsted and hosiery industries, the contraction, for obvious reasons, has been less than 1 per cent., and in chemicals only 3.3 per cent. These are all trades in which there has been a marked shortage of male labour, rendering it necessary to draw upon supplies from outside, and overtime has risen to a high percentage. On the other hand, in the building, brick and stone, and furniture businesses, the decrease in the number of employed in December, compared with the period before the war, has been over 20 per cent., and there has been a displacement of labour, after deducting recruits drafted into the forces, varying from 9.3 to 6.7 per cent. Employment in the cotton trade, in spite of certain adverse new factors, shows an improvement, but the contraction in numbers employed—13.5 per cent.—is still not nearly accounted for by the numbers who have joined the forces; and while 30.4 per cent. of the workers are on short time, only 1.6 per cent. are on overtime. Altogether, the returns yield proof that "industrial prosperity is more widespread" than at the earlier stages of the war; and, as has been seen, the volume of industrial recruiting continues to expand. Examined as to districts, the figures, which by no means embrace the whole trade enlistments, but solely those of men "known by "the employers to have left industrial em-"ployment for the purpose of joining," show that Scotland continues to keep well in the front. It had the third highest percentage—10.4—in September; it came abreast the South-Western district of England with 13.2 per cent., for first place in October; and it still tied for the lead at 16 per cent., with South-Western England in December. Yorkshire is still at the bottom of the list, with 10.7 per cent.—a position for which its busy woollen industries may help to account; Ireland has risen to 11.6 per cent. for December, thus surpassing the East Midlands, which have a recruiting record of 11.2; while London, with 13 per cent., and Wales, with 13.4 per cent., are respectively slightly above and slightly below the average for the whole country.

WAR AND LABOUR.

EFFECT IN THE WOLVERHAMPTON DISTRICT.

("Midland Evening News" Special.)

Those who five months ago predicted that the war would have a disastrous effect upon the industries of this country have, it is pleasing to know, so far been confounded.

The grave problems of unemployment which they said would arise have not come. Up to now, the 176th day of the gigantic struggle, things have gone fairly smoothly at home, and the latest statistics issued by the Board of Trade make healthy reading, for we are told that employment is not very far from normal—altogether a most excellent report that must be rather annoying to our enemies.

In Wolverhampton alone, at the present time, it is estimated that some 80 per cent. of the total manufactured output is War Office or Admiralty material. It was stated last week that the number of claims for unemployment insurance benefit had decreased by 34, compared with last year. Those who were thrown out at the commencement of hostilities quickly found jobs again, the skilled men having no difficulty, whilst the semi-skilled and the majority of unskilled also gradually worked back.

A Partial Migration

In two of the local branches of the Amalgamated Society of Engineers, embracing between them 600 members, there were on Wednesday only some six signing as out of employment. Quite a large number of Wolverhampton men unable to get berths here have gone to parts of the country where they are in more demand. Particularly has this been the case with carpenters, who have been required to erect huts for the troops.

But the generally satisfactory condition must not be taken to imply that there is no unemployment in Wolverhampton. There are the men who are unfit for the army—men between 40 and 50 as a rule, and as a class labourers. Unless they can prove that they are out directly owing to the war no relief whatever is given to them, and their case presents some difficulty. That some scheme should be launched for their benefit is felt in several circles, although it is contended that the position hardly warrants such a course at present. However, as a local labour leader pointed out to a representative of this journal, the predicament of these men is acute. Another Rough Hills levelling has, as is known, been suggested, and from what is gathered there will be a further ventilation of the subject at the next meeting of the Distress Committee.

Female Workers.

There is another aspect of the question, and that is the case of the girls who have been discharged through the studying of economy in workshops, etc. In Wolverhampton a fairly large number of young women are out of work—chiefly tailoresses and dressmakers. Queen Mary, in appealing for subscriptions to her splendid fund for women, expressed the firm belief that "prevention of distress was better than its relief, and that employment was better than charity." It is upon those admirable lines that the girls are to be assisted if possible. The local committee of ladies in charge of the position are endeavouring to obtain a grant from the fund whereby they could start a workroom in which to employ the girls.

The Central Committee in London, however, require full evidence as to the amount of unemployment before making any advance, and at present figures are being collected to place before the officials. Should they then make a grant a building will be taken—St. Paul's Schools have been suggested—and clothes and articles made to be given away to the poor. The girls would not be allowed to work more than forty hours a week, and would be paid at the rate of 3d. per hour—a rate higher than the majority earn in Wolverhampton. It is hoped that within a few weeks the scheme will take shape.

Too much optimism should not be entertained as to the future. There is a trying time ahead, as when peace comes, when factories stop turning out military equipment and the great armies disband, mighty problems will assuredly arise. That period during which trade is being adjusted to its new conditions will be a critical one, and then, above all others, it will be seen that the Prince of Wales's Fund was a vital necessity.

NOVEL UNEMPLOYMENT SCHEME.

AT THE COOKERY CLASS.

Burnley is trying a novel unemployment scheme. By arrangement between the Work for Women Committee and the Education Committee, fifty unemployed girls, aged between 14 and 18, are being trained "work" every morning, for which they will be paid, and in the afternoons they attend special classes in household management, dressmaking, millinery, cookery, etc., for which they will be made a grant of 5s. a week.

War Benefits the East End.

A remark made to me to-day by a leading member of one of the Metropolitan Distress Committees throws a significant light upon both the progress of the recruiting movement and the state of the labour market here in London. "There are," I was told, "no young men now applying for employment. If the war had occasioned much distress through want of work among the industrial community it would assuredly be found in the East End, whose population is seldom far removed from the brink of real poverty. Yet there is actually less unemployment in such quarters as Poplar and Stepney than there was in the first month of 1913, and in some cases there is even a shortage of labour."

The fact is that while on the one hand the rush to enlist took off a lot of surplus labour in the first three months of the war, the last three months have, on the other hand, witnessed a remarkable extension of the industrial boom, so that several East End trades are now sharing in the harvest of Government orders by which the north country has been benefiting. The transport workers, especially the dock hands, are busier than they have been for years, and the packing case makers down Poplar way—there are nearly two thousand of them—are turning out huge quantities of light wooden boxes required for army supplies.

In one respect only must I qualify this roseate picture of conditions in industrial London just now. There is acute unemployment among the women workers. Whatever may be stated to the contrary, the fact remains that 11,700 women had registered themselves as unemployed at the beginning of the month.

A BURNLEY EXPERIMENT.

CLASSES FOR UNEMPLOYED GIRLS.

Replying to Mr H. Lees at the monthly meeting of the Burnley Education Authority yesterday afternoon, Mr Pickles, the director of Education, said that classes for unemployed girls between the ages of 14 and 16 years were commenced at the Mechanics' Institute on Monday. Forty attended in the morning for work, and in the afternoon and every afternoon since classes had been conducted in cookery, dressmaking, millinery, English, and household management. No provision had been made yet for females of from 16 to 18 years. These classes would be started so soon as sanction was given by the Central Committee in London.

COURT OF COMMON COUNCIL.

GIFT TO FRENCH RED CROSS SOCIETY.

The Lord Mayor presided at yesterday's meeting of the Court of Common Council, held in the Guildhall.

On the motion of Mr. R. Davies, a sum of 1,000 guineas was voted to the English branch of the French Red Cross Society, the money to be handed to the French Ambassador for transmission.

A sum of 100l. was voted for the fitting up of Bridewell House, now being used as a workroom and training centre for City girl typists thrown out of work by the war. It was stated that the girls were paid 10s. each per week from the Prince of Wales's Fund.

In reply to Mr. Morton, M.P., it was stated that the Billingsgate porters' dispute had been settled.

Mr. Billings, chairman of the Billingsgate Markets Committee, said the strike was among a few of the outside porters, and it was a pity they did not consult the superintendent of the market before taking so serious a step, as the committee had always favourably considered the complaints of the men. Instead of doing this they struck at a moment's notice, with the result that many hundreds of tons of fish were returned to Hull, and London's very limited supply was still further restricted. No doubt the grievance of the men arose from the fact that owing to the limited supply of fish coming to the market in consequence of the war the men were not able to earn so much as they had been doing.

Textile Mercury,
Jan: 23rd 1915.

At the Accrington Trades Council meeting, on January 14, Mr. Emmett, secretary of the Weavers' Association, reported on the action taken in regard to the proposal for the inauguration and maintenance of a workshop for women and girls who had become unemployed owing to the war. A committee had been formed to carry out the scheme, and they got to work quickly, with the result that a workroom had been established. They started with 20 women, and now the number had increased to over 50. The committee had decided to pay wages at the rate of 4d. an hour, as at Blackburn, so that the employees would earn 10s. for a week of 30 hours. They had received a grant of £85 to cover three weeks' wages from the Queen Mary Fund, and so far as the workshop had gone it was doing nicely. Manufacturers were circularised asking if they could give any cloth for the workshop, though the response had not been good, but since then a deputation had waited upon some of the manufacturers with good results. The committee had received a large consignment of material from London, but that had not to be used unless all possible sources of supply locally had failed to meet requirements.

Kensington News.
January 23rd. 1915.

Many in Kensington and elsewhere are suffering in silence as a consequence of this terrible war. There are the wives, mothers, and friends of those who have already fallen in the conflict, and likewise many gentlewomen who have lost their means of livelihood, in some cases through the depreciation of securities and others owing to being deprived of the little employment that has hitherto helped them to keep a home together. I see that a committee of ladies, with Mrs. Gordon McArthur as hon. secretary, are endeavouring to provide a residence in the Royal Borough for some of these gentlewomen in distress, and all who can should help to give them the financial and other assistance needed. The Duchess of Marlborough is the president, and Lady Cowdray fulfils the duties of chairman, with Mrs. Herbert Samuel as vice-chairman, of the very influential committee. An appeal is made in a letter appearing in another column, and from this it will be seen that a suitable house in the southern part of the borough has been lent for the purpose, but this will have to be equipped and furnished, and then there is the future upkeep to be provided for.

ORGANISING EMPLOYMENT.

The Queen's Work for Women Fund yesterday reached £127,275 14s. 3d.

Every week that passes adds to the employment which has been organised for unemployed women by the Central Committee on Women's Employment. This week an order for 15,000 double flannel body belts for the French Army, obtained through Sir George Pragnell, has kept about 200 women employed.

The making of ulsters for girls who are emigrating to Australia has employed 70 or 80 women whose firm was on the point of dismissing them. The contract for 2,000,000 pairs of Army socks obtained by the committee, which will keep well over 1,000 women employed weekly until August, has been taken in hand.

LABOUR IN WAR TIME.

Regularisation Plan in Operation.

SUCCESSFUL EXPERIMENT AT TOYNBEE HALL.

An interesting experiment, with encouraging prospects, is being carried out at Toynbee Hall, Whitechapel, the object being the transference of skilled labour from an underworked to an overdriven trade.

The Toynbee Hall experiment deals with the upholstering trade and other branches of wood-working, and a training school has been set up to train men in leather-stitching and riveting, in regard to which there is something like a famine of hands. The co-operation of several different agencies was necessary to make the scheme a success. The officials of the Upholsterers and the Amalgamated Furnishing Trade Unions have given it their warm support and nominated the men for tuition; Toynbee Hall has lent three large rooms for workshops; the Cabinet Committee on the Prevention and Relief of Distress have secured grants (for maintenance) from the Prince of Wales's Fund; and a number of individual supporters, notably Sir Bamfylde Fuller and Mr. J. St. George Heath, Warden of Toynbee Hall, have given valuable aid to the project.

Finding New Employment.

What has been accomplished can be briefly told. In the six weeks ending last Friday 139 men had been enrolled—wood-carvers, upholsterers, French polishers, and others—of these two have been sent away through inability to learn the trade; 15 have obtained work at their old industry; 64 had been found employment in leather stitching and riveting, and 58 were then (Jan. 15) in the school. Since that date the number of those who have obtained regular work (leather) has considerably increased.

This constitutes a very notable result, particularly when it is considered that many men who had never had an awl in their hands or a clamp between their knees are already in steady work at wages averaging 30s. to 35s a week without overtime. A few, indeed, are at present drawing 10s. a day. A dozen have been taken on at Woolwich Arsenal, and the rest with well-known leather firms. All the men who have had a full month have found regular work, some of them, indeed, obtaining places after only a fortnight's training.

Making all allowance for the fact that the leather trades are ready at the present moment to absorb any worker of even moderate competence, the success of the scheme is remarkable and of obvious significance. Nothing more impressed a "Daily News" visitor who went over the workshops yesterday than the age of the men who were thus striking out into a new path of industry. One white-haired veteran, just mastering the elements of "making a thread," arrested immediate attention, and it was pointed out that his age—which was 66—need be regarded as no bar whatever in view of the number of his friends, men of 64, 65, 60, 59, 63, who had already passed through the school into permanent jobs. The bottom has been knocked out of the "too old at 40" cry very badly indeed.

Co-operative Venture.

An interesting development in the training school has been the establishment of a little co-operative venture by a couple of dozen members of the Upholsterers' Union who had been through the training school.

"I had offered to me," said Mr. L. Leckie, the secretary of that union, "the option on a contract for the supply of leather work for haversacks for the French Army. I accepted it and fitted up the hall of our club in Gower-street as a workshop. There the men are in regular employment under two foremen elected by themselves from their own number turning out the work to the complete satisfaction of the contractor who gave us the option."

What the Toynbee experiment has established is, first, the practicability of transferring willing men from one skilled industry to another; and, second, the value of trade schools for adult workers, supported by an adequate maintenance grant during training. (The Central Committee on Women's Employment has already been working successfully on these lines.)

What is further clear is that the scheme is without doubt capable of wise and carefully planned extension. It is a question that might profitably engage the attention of the Cabinet Committee.

IN SEARCH OF A LIVING.

A WOMAN'S QUEST IN WAR TIME.

THIRD ARTICLE.

(Special to The Yorkshire Post.)

Again looking for a billet, I came across a lady (connected with one of the Suffrage Societies), who observed "You look very thin. I think we shall have work for you shortly, in the meantime you had better go down to my country cottage for a few days." I jumped at the offer, and was packed off with a young woman also looking rather worn and lean, and at the station we were to look out for a third. She was nowhere to be seen; we accosted several likely looking girls, told various porters, and nearly missed the train with looking for No. 3.

Arriving at our country station, we still looked conscientiously for the illusive No. 3, and still she eluded us. "The fly is waiting," said the porter, "I have put in the luggage," as we strolled across to the other side of the station. "Where is the fly?" we inquired; we could see no fly or anything pertaining thereto. We looked blankly at each other, and asked various people, "Where is the fly for X——." "Oh," said one man, "B——'s fly has just driven off with a lady."

A lady? No. 3! What was she up to going off with our luggage too; this was too much, and six miles off our destination.

We strolled out of the station and came across a man with a landau. He would take us for 7s. The correct thing to say here undoubtedly would be: "Do you take us for blooming heiresses?" We told him we were refugees, and he grinned. If a woman has a good gown on her back and a fashionable hat, men of all classes are all alike, and they think she is amply provided for, as if she grew clothes and lived on air, and if you succeed in convincing them she is not, you reduce her at once to a "competitor" or an object of pity.

That reminds me of a woman who begged from me in the street. Said I, exchanging a few words, "Can you not find work to do; I have to earn my own living?" "Lor," she cried, "I thought yer was a laidy," and turned away with a sniff. We bargained with the landau man to set us on our way for the sum of 1s. 6d. He took us about a mile and dumped us down on the outskirts of a glorified village.

We trudged on up hill and down dale—quite chirpy. My friend was an actress by profession, though she had plied another trade of late to fill in—being thrown out through this ghastly war. She played the Belgian refugee and talked broken English.

After a considerable tramp we arrived at the inn from which our flown fly had been ordered, and asked why it had flown without us. The landlord was a surly boor; it wasn't his fault—his son had passed that way with the fly and a lady—and he didn't know why we were not in it. Observing that it was rather strange not to have looked round a little more carefully, I asked could he let us have another vehicle?

"And who's going to pay for it?" inquired he, morosely.

"I thought I was," I rejoined, "but I have changed my mind"; and we walked out disgusted. Would you believe it, but that grumpy old boor bounced after us, passed us at a stride on the road, and presently we met him driving back with his son, lest the son, being young and probably more amenable, might have given us a lift and turned back?

We toiled on. It was twilight when we reached another inn. Here were ordinary civil folk, who offered to telephone for a carriage—it would take three-quarters of an hour if we would wait—they did not possess one.

They sold glasses of port wine from 3d. upwards, and we indulged in a "fourpenny" each. Somewhat soothed, we continued our way—still two miles to go—it was a long six; the "shades of night were falling fast," the scenery began to grow fantastic, almost unfriendly, trees creaked and groaned as we passed ghostly spots in the woods, and they were closing in upon us. We halted now and again in hesitation—paths diverged—which should we take? Not a soul to be seen! We had to pass through some gated land, and came to one very high gate, which would not open. We might have climbed it with some little effort, as hobble skirts wouldn't be allowed to prevent us; but for the moment I sat down and wept as the more easy of the two performances. My friend observed, with some pardonable vehemence, "Where can the —— cottage be? There's something over there, but whether it's a house or a haystack, I can't tell"——

Should we have to go back, or should we climb and get lost in the endless woods? Quite unexpectedly she got the gate open, and we groped on a little further. It was almost dark now. "See, a light!" cried my friend, but it seemed some way off across uncrossable ground on our left.

Another light became visible on our right, and at last some real cottages loomed out of the gloom; we had reached our goal.

A fire was burning on an open hearth, a lamp on the table; there was a piano in one corner of the room—and—No. 3 sitting in the other toasting her toes. Talk about looking wan and lean, I have never seen any one more so—a classic head, with pale, pinched almost transparent features. Here was an old woman, and we had been looking out for a girl.

We mildly demanded an explanation: they had not seen us; some-one said "Drive on," so they drove, and we need not grumble at having had to walk, as it had been horribly cold driving; thus our murmurs were severely suppressed.

A nice, middle-aged woman, who lived hard by with a very old mother, had set out a meal.

We had to fetch water from a stream, and it was No. 2 who, like "Rebecca," hied thither each morning with a pitcher and fetched it—unless perchance two or three cows rambled down the valley, tinkling their neck-bells like the cows of the Swiss mountains, when Rebecca was full of fear and cried off; she was ready to climb a tree if she saw a harmless cow half a mile away.

At our mid-day meal No. 3 told me she did not think I knew how to order in meat or cook—she did! So I intimated my willingness to resign in her favour. Next day, I think she must have been playing the piano instead of minding the meal, for the potatoes—potatoes once more in evidence—were boiled to mash, the rice was mostly cooked to the pan, and she had deposited one onion and one carrot in the stew; as there wasn't much meat there wasn't much to eat. The third day we tried the range—No. 3 put the joint into a cold oven—I took it out—discussion followed. It took us three-parts of the day to cook that dinner; we couldn't get the oven hot, and never tried again. We made "Beatrice" do after that. The fourth day No. 3 said plaintively, "Don't you think we had better take the cooking in turns?" Anything for peace; however, she never took a turn again. She talked of making a sketch of "Rebecca," but it never came off. She was very restless and cranky, and soon returned to Town. We had quite a good time after that, lunching out at country inns; on one occasion for the sum of ninepence between us we were given as much bread and cheese and beer as we could stow away, it was excellent; we partook of it on a bench in the open, the sun shining gloriously, nature and all around at peace, and but 50 miles away a ghastly war going on—the papers which we got the butcher to bring us were full of slaughter and of massacres, so that we might not forget.

The fringe of the woodland paths was heavy with luscious blackberries—I have never seen so many; we sent some quarts away. "Rebecca" made two pots of jam to save the lives of some we could not get through. She wrote me afterwards that everything in her valise was a brilliant purple hue when she arrived at ——. She wished she had taken my advice! I don't remember giving her any—it's such a waste of time, and I leave it to the lawyers, who get something for it.

Rebecca went off on her own on one occasion—the hours passed, I was getting very uneasy, the cottage felt lonely without her, it grew dusk, long past tea time. I looked out in all directions; it was useless my going to seek her. At last she reappeared looking very scared, and said she would certainly have had to spend the night in the woods had she not fallen in with a wood-cutter.

She amused me immensely. We decided to have a blackberry and apple pudding—I chopped the suet, but as we did not want to stay in in the morning, we left it to finish some other time. Next day Rebecca made the pudding, but did not cook it till evening, after our supper, when she had it boiling away on the sitting-room fire up to 10 o'clock. The third day she hotted it up for supper, after the fire got over the quenching it received from the kettle having turned a somersault. The fourth day and onward, whenever Rebecca seemed at a loose end, she was cooking up the remains of that pudding. I don't know if it were ever finished.

We were startled one evening by a gentle rap tap on the window-pane. I pulled aside the curtain, and a voice called out "Don't be frightened." We opened the door and discovered a lady and gentleman with a lantern, each carrying a large casket, one of apples, the other of potatoes. They were such pleasant people (Yorkshire, as it happened), and had walked through the woods a couple of miles to look us up.

The next evening we were again startled by a persistent scratching at the door. What could it be? Very gingerly I opened—there stood a fine "Airedale," demanding admittance. We had just been wishing for a dog, and he came in and made himself quite at home, sharing our milk and roast potatoes baked on the hearth. It turned out that he belonged to our friends, and so loved hunting in the woods they were afraid of his getting shot by a keeper; he knew the cottage well, and evidently thought he would take shelter for the night.

In our regret, Rebecca got a call to return—a job in prospect. So at the end of twelve days we left our country cottage to return to Town, to finds its streets by night still more shrouded in gloom than when we left—London was not itself. People by day were hustling about much as usual, but of an evening the great city was subdued, the streets were thinly peopled, the motor 'buses, dimly lighted by candles as of ancient days, were not running to time, and searchlights swept the dark blue vault of heaven.

The day following I was appointed secretary to a Committee connected with war work. We were very busy—we worked in a cold, draughty building, fires not yet started, and, alas, at the end of a week I was down with a chill. I don't generally give in to chills, but this one developed violent ear-ache, which ended in a month's agony nearly incessant day and night.

I had the good luck to have been asked to stay at the flat of two ladies who were greatly interested in war work, out all day long in their car, taking bales of flannel, cut-out belts, shirts, etc., to the factories, workshops, and dressmakers all over London. There I was laid aside, treated with every kindness and attention possible; tended by the dearest of maids (a Yorkshire woman) who had been with these ladies for years, and who was a capital nurse, and, with all her usual work to do, yet made time to poultice and look after me, and the sight of her kind face was in itself a source of comfort. I was attended by a woman doctor, a practical, capable woman, and I also received great kindness and help from another woman-doctor friend.

As soon as I was able to get out I was told that an accountant was wanted at —— on the South Coast for a fortnight. Would I go? I am not an accountant! However, after a little parleying over the matter I, Jack-of-all-trades, went, and again met with great kindness, and my job was made as light as circumstances permitted, for I was still obliged to go about with my head swathed in cotton wool, and was most assuredly taken for one of the wounded.

I write now from the heart of the country, from a farm—again an out-of-the world spot where it is very difficult to get provisions, especially butter and eggs—though we had a delicious fowl, like a small turkey, for 3s. 3d., the other day. There is a new cow in the yard—she is disconsolate—her new mates are not over friendly to her, "and she don't take to they," said the cowherd, and while she moos and moans in a most heart-rending manner, the wind not only moans, but every now and again howls and shrieks, and the rain has been lashing in at the latticed windows, leaving rivulets all along the broad sills. The land is flooded, some villages are cut off. We were in the hollow, and the lanes are quagmiry, but, getting out of them, the main roads are good. There is a station some five miles away at which cabs and even taxis can be hired, but taximen don't like coming down here.

A lady came to stay lately and she got an old cabby, being cheaper, to bring her—it was pitch dark, and he took exactly two hours—she asked him if he could not go a little quicker—"no mum, slow and sure!"

Great camps of soldiers are within a few miles in various directions. Two miles away you may hear Gaelic and the broadest Scotch such as have probably never been heard before in that village. The ducks, geese, cows, and other live stock stand and listen, making observations of astonishment at the unaccustomed notes of the bugle or the squirl of the pipes wafted on the wind. Pheasants are plentiful and often perch on the trees. I was out one of these glorious, wild nights, the moon at full, and nearly fell down in the mud at the harsh cry of some pheasants, and the sudden whirr of three or four pairs of strong wings in woods skirting the lane. There is a Y.M.C.A. marquee on the Green, and on Sunday it was full of "Tommies" as we passed, singing "Onward, Christian Soldiers" with a will. We meet detachments swinging along the roads, we meet them carrying panniers of potatoes and joints from the cooking stoves to the tents; we see them hard at work, drilling, etc.

The men are billeted about amongst the cottagers, in barns, in the schoolhouse (school is closed), etc. Said a bugler I have a talk to sometimes: "It's noo convenient, but it's a nice wee place," and another: "We're short of underclothing and all sorts, but we come with a good heart, we know we're in for a tough job, and we mean to try and win." They're good fellows and it makes one's heart ache to think of the work in store for them. The farm is to be lent to officers, so we are leaving it.

Well, we are all "merely players," and what is going to be my next role I know not, but I feel cut out for a sinecure; this perpetual moving on, this uncertainty is demoralising, and I think I am fast developing the instincts of a tramp.

EMPLOYMENT AND THE WAR.

The Board of Trade has published a report on the state of employment in the United Kingdom in December last, based mainly on returns received from 23,000 industrial firms, employing about 4 million workpeople, or 43 per cent. of the industrial population. The improvement which took place in October has continued. In October the number of male workpeople employed showed a reduction compared with July of 10.7 per cent., which, however, was just about balanced by the percentage of men joining the forces up to that time—10.6. By December the reduction had fallen to 10.6 and the percentage joining the forces had risen to 13.3. From July to December, therefore, an actual diminution took place in the number unemployed, representing 2.7 per cent. of the male workpeople in industry. The percentages given as "joining the forces" should not, it is pointed out, be taken to represent the number of recruits enlisted. They only refer to men known by their employers to have left industrial employment to join the forces.

The trades which showed the largest contraction of employment were the building, cotton, and furniture trades, but in many industries a deficiency of labour rather than lack of employment had become the chief feature of the situation. The contraction which still existed in women's employment was chiefly due to the state of affairs in the cotton trade. In the mining, iron and steel, shipbuilding, engineering, wool and worsted, boot and shoe, leathers, chemical, timber, hosiery, and food trades, notwithstanding the abundance of Government orders and the keen demand for labour, there was a marked increase in enlistment. The wool and worsted percentage, 7.2, though still the lowest, was nearly 2½ per cent. higher than in October. In the metal trades the figures varied from 13.6 in shipbuilding to 14.6 in engineering. The improvement in the chemical trade was not only the consequence of the stoppage of German imports into the home market, but was in part due to an expansion of exports: for the trade returns of the last three months showed an increase, which was doubtless due to a deficiency of certain German chemicals in neutral markets.

In the building trade the employment figures compared unfavourably with those of October. The contraction had risen from 14.0 to 21.5 per cent., and after allowance had been made for those who had joined the Forces, there was still a net contraction of 9.3 per cent. Employment in the cotton trade showed an appreciable improvement. In the case of men the net contraction had fallen from 10.1 per cent. to 3.7, and in the case of women from 14.2 to 9.3.

It is pointed out that though recruiting was no doubt encouraged by unemployment, the prosperity or depression of a trade was by no means the only factor in determining the percentage of enlistment. In some of the most prosperous trades the percentage was very high. Enlistment from Government offices had been heavy, about 15 per cent.; 460 local governing bodies had taken into employment 19,700 persons to fill the places of 27,783 who had joined the Colours. The enlistment percentage was nearly 13½ per cent. The enlistment percentage for commercial employments as a whole in London was 18½, which about balanced the contraction of numbers employed.

In September there was a considerable discharge of male and female clerks in London, but enlistment, together with the engagement of temporary clerks in Government offices, produced a deficiency of male clerks. Among female clerks the situation had greatly improved. There had been an increase of 25 per cent. in the employment of women in London banks since the war, and a similar state of things existed in some other city employments.

As regards railways, the companies have been compelled to apply to the War Office for permission to put pressure on their employés not to enlist, and the number who have joined the forces has, therefore, only risen slightly since the last report, and is now about 60,000 out of some 600,000 employed.* In view of the abnormal pressure of Christmas and the demands of the Government for transport, the companies have been compelled temporarily to fill places to some extent. The situation with regard to tramway and omnibus services is little changed compared with October. As regards the docks, employment in London was abnormally brisk throughout November and December, and certain classes of work in the port have been held up for lack of labour. Figures comparing employment in the middle of December with the corresponding week last year show 26,258 employed by the Port Authority, wharves, shipowners, etc., as compared with 24,311 a year ago, an increase of 8 per cent. In Liverpool, on the other hand, the numbers of men paid at the clearing houses under the Liverpool Dock Scheme was 18,896, against 21,917 a year ago, a decline of 13.8 per cent. On the east coast generally the state of employment is below the normal, owing to the shipping difficulties, but there is evidence that men have found employment in other directions. On the west coast the state of employment is good. At Cardiff there is a shortage of labour, largely owing to heavy enlistment. On the south coast the state of employment is also good. The number enlisting of this class of worker is very high throughout the country.

WOMEN AND EMPLOYMENT.

DISCUSSION BY WOOLWICH TUTORIAL CLASS.

The Woolwich Tutorial Class began the study of the third section of its syllabus ("Problems of Employment: Modern Conditions and Constructive Forces") at its ninth meeting, held at the Polytechnic on Wednesday, January 13. The section deals with "woman and man," and the subjects for the evening's study were as follows:—

(1).—Woman and Employment.
(2).—Position of married women as workers. The burden of maternity. Effective payment for motherhood.

The question of the relations of men and women in industry, as well as in politics, administration, and other spheres of activity, was becoming more and more important at the present day. It was becoming more important because women, owing to a variety of causes and circumstances, were taking a larger and larger part in these spheres; and they were taking this larger part, not merely as the result of a temporary movement, but as the result of a movement—a re-adjustment of the conception of woman's place in life and work, which was certain to be permanent and to produce far-reaching results. We were seeing with increasing clearness to-day that the sexes, despite their differences, both biological and psychological, were not merely different, were not really antagonistic, but were complementary. If, then, men and women were by their nature complementary, it follows that there must be many fields open to them for co-operative action, and that there must be other fields of activity for which the one or the other sex was more fittingly adapted. The more extreme of the opponents of the movements for women's freedom and scope for action tended to restrict very narrowly the sphere of woman; while on the other hand there was a tendency on the part of the extreme supporters of the movements to ignore biological and psychological facts and to regard the woman's sphere as practically unlimited. Biological and psychological facts must be allowed for, but even then it would be found that the sphere of women's employment and activity could be widely extended; though it must be admitted that to-day there were grave problems involved in the employment of women in certain occupations for which they were not physically so well adapted as men, or in conditions of employment which reacted injuriously upon them as actual or potential mothers. One of the greatest needs in the problem of employment to-day—and it affects social as well as industrial life in the next generation as much as the present generation—was a careful survey of the various fields of employment—using employment in the widest sense—in which men or women were respectively most fitted by nature to work, and the fields in which both men and women could be effectively employed. In earlier times woman's sphere of activity was narrowly restricted to the home. But the home then was part of a different social constitution, and was largely self-contained and self-supplying; many industries, such as baking, brewing, weaving, etc., which are now carried on almost exclusively outside the home, and altogether or largely by men, being part of the women's ordinary household occupations. The factory system had changed all that. It had drawn women outside the home into workshop and factory, put many domestic occupations upon an industrial basis, and specialised the non-domestic work of women. The Census of 1911 (from which representative figures were quoted by Mr. McGegan, the conductor of the class) showed the extent to which women were now employed in industrial, professional, and other occupations, and revealed the fact that there were few occupations in some branch of which women were not engaged.

The position of married women as workers raised many important and complex questions. Every married woman who took a direct part in the conduct of the duties of her own household was to that extent a worker, and no section of the community worked harder than the working-class mothers. Yet the Census classed all married women engaged in the duties of their own households as being "unoccupied." Here, as in so many other spheres of work, we needed a revaluation of the nature of the work performed, and of its value to the community and to the State. Under such a revaluation the work of the mother would rank with the most valuable and with the noblest work that was done by any, and would give irresistible force to the demand for a living wage or for the endowment of motherhood, or both. The question of whether married women should be employed on paid work outside or within the home was a question which could be answered satisfactorily only on consideration of all the facts of particular cases. Existing economic conditions too often made it imperative that married women and mothers should become wage-earners; but, speaking generally, it might be laid down that where the paid occupation of a married woman, either outside or within the home, made impossible adequate organisation and care of the home and its members, no matter whether the children were young or grown up, such occupation could not but react injuriously upon the home and all within it; and no married woman and mother should be compelled to have recourse to it. The problem of the withdrawal from industrial wage-earning of the mothers of young children was a problem, the solution of which was vital to the well-being of the nation. Whether the industrial wage-earning employment of such women was due to the fact that their husbands were not paid an economic wage, either because of the low standard of remuneration, or because of their being under-employed; or was due to the inadequate Outdoor Relief which was given by most Poor Law Authorities to the thousands of widows and deserted wives in need of such relief, so driving these women on to the industrial market to earn enough to maintain themselves and their children; or was due to such demands for women's employment in a specialised industry, as in the jute industry of Dundee, the results were inevitably, in many, many cases, highly injurious to the health and well-being of the family as a whole and of the next generation. It was significant of much that of the 4,830,734 females, aged ten years and upwards, classified as occupied in the 1911 Census of England and Wales, there were 680,191 married and 411,611 widowed.

The "burden" of maternity made heavy demands. Under existing conditions of home organisation it inevitably largely restricted the life and activity of mothers, so far, at least, as the majority of working-class mothers were concerned, during the school age of their children, a routine of hard and wearing domestic work and anxieties, which made their intellectual advance, adequate social intercourse and activity in social or other voluntary work practically impossible. But with adequate and effective co-operative organisation this burden could surely be greatly reduced. The co-operative organisation of home life and work was only in its rudimentary stage, if it has even reached so far, but it was along such lines that much of the relief that could be given from the burden of maternity would be built up. The admirable municipal crèches, under skilled professional supervision, which had been set up in so many French towns during the past twenty or thirty years, presented an example of what might be done.

The claim for the effective payment or the endowment of motherhood had been brought forward in recent years, especially by Mr. H. G. Wells. The claim was based upon the view (to quote Mr. Wells) that "parentage rightly undertaken is a service as well as a duty to the world, carrying with it not only obligations but a claim, the strongest of claims, upon the whole community. It must be provided for like any other public service; in any completely civilised State it must be sustained, rewarded, and controlled. And this is to be done not to supersede the love, pride, and conscience of the parent, but to supplement, encourage, and maintain it." Such a claim involved a new conception, or, at least, a re-investigation of many things, such as:—

(1). The whole question of personal liberty and of the nature of liberty itself.

(2). The real significance of parenthood, and especially of motherhood, and the value to the community and to the State of the work performed by the mother in her functions as a mother.

(3). The relation and the responsibility of the individual family to the community and to the State.

(4). The relation of the community and the responsibility of the community and the State to the individual family.

(5). The present basis and organisation of industry and standards of remuneration, in their relation to the effective life of the family and to the proper exercise of the duties of the family to the community and to the State.

WOMEN'S EMPLOYMENT IN EDINBURGH

Mary H. Eeles, Hon. Secy. Women's Emergency Corps, 29 Drumsheugh Gardens, writes: Surely it is a pity that the Edinburgh Sub-Committee on Women's Employment should have felt themselves obliged to abandon the scheme for making high-class artificial flowers. It is said to be an industry recommended by the Board of Trade as profitable. That the preliminary cost is considerable and that some time must elapse before it pays is no doubt the case, but is this sufficient reason for dropping the scheme? Unloubtedly, work of this kind requiring technical skill and artistic taste cannot be used for purposes of immediate relief for the average unskilled worker. But many of us forget that the war has brought hard times to numerous skilled workers of the middle class. They are more difficult to provide with work, and such work must necessarily be of a kind which takes time and money to set going. Yet there is no reason why it should not be done so long as it does not interfere with existing trades. A good deal is being done to meet the needs of the unemployed factory hand and less skilled operative, but little is being done to help the artists, designers, and highly skilled women workers. Here is a case in which the Women's Emergency Corps might perhaps be of use. The whole question is worthy of consideration. If the Executive Committee of the Corps decided to start flower-making it would of course mean that a special appeal would have to be made to raise the necessary funds, as it has hitherto been impossible to obtain any help for the Corps from the National Relief Fund or the Queen's Work for Women Fund.

Daily Graphic, Jan: 27th. 1915.

THE SHORTAGE OF LABOUR.

The public is slowly waking up to the fact that the war, instead of bringing unemployment and destitution, as many people imagined it would, has created a serious shortage of labour. The explanation of the fact is not far to seek. Our command of the sea enables us to carry on the greater part of our ordinary trade with all the world except our three enemies, Germany, Austria, and Turkey. At the same time the demands of our own armies and the armies of our Allies for all kinds of munitions of war have created a condition of feverish activity in many industries. Finally, at least three million men, most of whom would normally be engaged in some kind of industrial work, are now fighting or learning how to fight. The only wonder is that the shortage of labour has not made itself even more seriously felt; but already the docks have suffered badly, while farmers all over the country are beginning to take alarm. So far as farm labour is concerned, this country is in a peculiarly unfortunate position. In France and most other Continental countries when the men go to the war the women garner the harvest and prepare the soil for the next crop; in England a false feeling of social pride forbids working-class women to do agricultural work. Indeed, in some districts labourers' wives will not even work in their own gardens. Here is a splendid opportunity for women of the leisured classes. Admittedly it is more exciting for women to parade the streets in khaki than to sit in a byre milking cows; but it so happens that the country does not want women fighters at all and does want women milkers very badly. There are many other farm jobs that are perfectly suitable for women, and it would indeed be disappointing if our women should refuse to do the work that is most wanted for fear of soiling their fingers.

THE EMPLOYMENT OF LEEDS WOMEN.

The Leeds Trades Council met last evening at the Trades Hall, Mr. Arthur Hill presiding.

Miss I. O. Ford and Mrs. Butler came before the Council as a deputation from the Employment of Women Sub-Committee of the Leeds Local Committee under the National Relief Fund, to ask for assistance in maintaining the workshop for women. Miss Ford said that her sub-committee were most anxious to continue the scheme of employing women who would otherwise be left to the tender mercies of the Poor Law. As soon as she had seen that the workshop's existence was threatened owing to lack of funds, she went to London to try to obtain help from the Queen's Fund, but she was told that the distress in Leeds was nothing as compared with that in other districts, and that nothing could be done. The City Council had also said they were unable to make any grant. Unless help was immediately forthcoming the workshop would have to be closed in a fortnight.

It was decided to ask Miss Ford to put her appeal in writing, so that it could be printed and distributed amongst the affiliated societies. If each society gave 10s. or £1, it was estimated that the difficulty would be solved, at any rate for the present.

Tuition for Workless Girls.

An interesting experiment, which is likely to prove a great success, is the formation of special classes for girls between 14 and 16 years of age who are unemployed at Burnley. Forty-three girls are having a nice change from factory life. In the mornings they sew, and in the afternoons they are instructed in cookery, dressmaking, millinery, English, household management, and physical exercises. The girls, who get 4s. a week from the Work for Women Committee, are very enthusiastic over the classes, particularly those for cookery and physical exercise.

MARYLEBONE AND THE WAR.

Where Dressmakers Assistants are being Employed.

Splendid progress is being made in the scheme of assistance organised by the St. Marylebone National Relief Committee for the employment of dressmakers assistants resident in the borough. Large workrooms have been opened up for this purpose in Little Portland street, which have been kindly given over for the use of the Committee by Messrs. Peter Robinson's Ltd., who also supply sewing machines, lighting and heating installations gratis.

There are at present thirty-five hands employed in the making up of women and children's garments, lingerie, childrens frocks, overalls, bonnets, hats, &c., some of the articles being most exquisitely embroidered, while each garment reveals exceptional quality of workmanship and artistic design.

The hours are from 9 a.m. until 5.30 p.m., 40 hours a week in all, with the usual intervals for lunch and tea, while a special scale of payment has been drawn up by the Committee. The garments, when completed are either sent to the Belgian refugees, or devoted to similar charitable purposes.

The workrooms are in the capable charge of Mrs. A. Mitchell, who will be most grateful to receive gifts of materials, linings, lace, trimmings, buttons, &c., the smallest contributions being thankfully acknowledged.

EMPLOYMENT IN MANCHESTER.

IMPROVED BUT NOT NORMAL.

A DEMAND FOR WORKMEN

A comprehensive statement on the condition of trade and employment in Manchester, compiled by Professor Chapman and the Town Clerk (Mr. T. Hudson), was presented to the Manchester Relief Committee yesterday afternoon.

According to the report trade has improved since the issue of the last report a month ago, but is still far from normal. Government contracts have helped Lancashire to some considerable extent recently. They have related mainly to heavier makes of goods, and one of the consequences has been a relative rise in the price of coarse counts. On the whole the India market has somewhat rallied, particularly Karachi and Calcutta. Bombay is more stagnant. The smaller Eastern markets have done rather better, but China is still in a state of collapse. The position in China is due largely to financial stringency, which causes large accumulations of stocks in Shanghai, though up-country markets are supposed to need feeding. Another deterrent is the very low price to which silver has fallen, and the consequent state of the China exchanges. It remains to be seen to what extent Eastern markets will suffer in purchasing through the effect of the war on the value and quantity of their exports.

An inquiry into the course of the wholesale home trade in Manchester soft goods since the war shows as follows: In August and for part of September trade was phenomenally bad. Since then there has been steady recovery, and in some cases now trade is actually better than normal. Many orders cancelled in August have been taken up since, and the direct and indirect war demand has told. In many cases, however, this revival is independent of war demand. In the towns the middle-class and working-class demands are by no means weak. Some difficulty is being felt in securing such goods as used to be imported, and when they can be obtained the cost is substantially higher as a rule.

The above holds generally of the country as a whole; but Lancashire trade is down, and so is trade with North Wales, the latter being doubtless occasioned by the breakdown of the tourist season. Lancashire drapers are having a trying time, recovery being slow, particularly in Burnley and Blackburn. Customers of many years standing are needing more credit.

EVIDENCE OF ECONOMY.

Trade for the whole country shows a falling off in the sale of very high-priced goods. This is doubtless due in part to economy and in part (perhaps more especially) to the small number of social functions that are being held.

One curious feature revealed by the inquiry is that trade in some districts where there is abundance of work is not very good. This may be attributable to overtime—people not buying new clothes when kept so steadily at work. Better trade is confidently looked forward to in the spring.

Generally speaking, money has been got in well from all classes, though in Lancashire and in some of the poorer agricultural districts some difficulty has been experienced.

"Various answers," state the signatories to the report, "were received to the question whether there was any tendency for an inferior grade of goods to be substituted for a better. In the case of some classes of goods, there had been no such substitution, because the lower grade stuff used to be imported, and English manufacturers would not make it, or could not, at a price that would be paid. Trade in these grades would go abroad again, it was said, when the war was over. In consequence of the difficulty of getting certain cheap goods, there had been some substitution of a better class for an inferior class of goods. In other kinds of goods there had been substitution of the cheaper for the dearer, sometimes in consequence of a rise in prices, customers keeping rather to what they had paid than to the quality they had previously bought. In Lancashire and the poorer country districts substitution was most marked.

"Taking the country as a whole, it seems certain that there has been a great increase in the demand for men's clothing—shirts, vests, etc.—in consequence of war needs. This has been partly offset by a fall in the demand for women's clothing, notably blouses and underclothing. This is again very marked over Lancashire and North Wales.

"One would expect to find the periods of forward buying curtailed at such a time as the present, but no striking change seems to have taken place. It was suggested that the fear of rising prices had encouraged anticipation. In some instances, it was said that forward buying had been slightly affected, but that it was recovering. It is noted by some informants that, where payment for cash means payment on the first of the next month, the concentration of buying in the first week of the month (to secure the three weeks credit) was not quite so common a feature now as normally. The explanation would seem to be that purchasing as need arose had taken the place of stocking in anticipation to some extent.

PROSPECTS OF THE SPRING.

"The war needs, in their bearing on soft goods, have evidently helped to right the trade. But trade all round is not bad outside the range of influence of the new demands. Fair trade in the spring is expected, and the wholesale traders are certainly cheerful about prospects generally. It is probable, however, that the rise in the cost of living will make itself felt before long."

In regard to the employment of men, exclusive of clerks, the manager of the Labour Exchange reports an appreciable increase in the demand for all classes of workers. In the engineering trades men are at a premium, and any man can have the choice of several jobs, if capable, despite age and minor disqualifications that tell in normal times. The demand for carters greatly exceeds the supply, owing mainly to enlistments. The same is true of unskilled railway work of all types (e.g. porters), builders', engineers' and foundry labourers are in great demand, and a man with any experience is now being accepted if he can adapt himself.

The number of men on the books for the week ending January 22nd, 1915, was 1,225, the prominent groups being building trades 664, metals, machines, etc., 281, and labourers, commercial and conveyance, each with about 50 registrations. The figures alone are liable to misrepresent the state of demand, because they include re-registrations made as men move from firm to firm, and many men incapable of doing the work offered them.

The Women's Labour Exchange gives again a very favourable report. The placings, averaging about 130 per week, are considerably above those for the corresponding period of last year, and are well in advance of the average weekly placings during the early months (August and September) of the war.

The increased demand is most marked in the case of clerical and textile workers, women clerks and typists being needed to take the place of men who have joined the Forces.

A good sign is the revival of demand for unskilled women (especially charwomen and office cleaners), because this is held at the Exchange to reflect more "normal" trade. This view is borne out by the increased stability of the demand for women in retail trading concerns. The prospects of whole-time work may be contrasted with the intermittent work during the August-December period.

Northern Daily Telegraph,
Jan: 30th. 1915.

While it is no great compliment to women to offer them employment because of the scarcity of men, it says much for their complaisance and adaptability that they are able so readily to fill men's places. Women are "taking the wheel" on taxi-cabs and private cars in the Metropolis, and on tram-cars and motor-omnibuses they have shown that they are not inferior to men in the qualities—including courtesy—which make for a good conductor. The manager of the Newcastle tramways is considering the desirability of engaging women as conductors of single-deck cars on certain routes in that city. In this case, it is to be confessed, the expedient of resorting to women's aid arises from necessity rather than choice, the calls upon men being so numerous and varied that they are in great demand.

UNEMPLOYED WOMEN.

DISTRESS COMMITTEE PROBLEM.

PROPOSED SCOTTISH CONFERENCE.

The Glasgow Burgh Distress Committee at a meeting held yesterday in the City Chambers decided to promote a conference of Scottish Distress Committees with the view of formulating a national policy regarding the provision of work for unemployed women. Bailie Alston presided, and there was a large attendance of members.

Miss Irwin said that the time had come when they ought to consider fully and in detail the provisions to be made for women workers. It was a branch of the committee's work which had been considerably neglected in the past, but it was never too late to mend. They should formulate as soon as possible a national policy. They should not wait, as they had done this year, until distress was upon them and then adopt measures in a hurry. They required to use political influence in order to carry out any policy of which they approved. No policy could be effective without the assistance of the Treasury, and if they wanted the Treasury to do anything they must go straight to Parliament. In view of the importance of the work in Glasgow they could very well take the initiative in convening a Scottish conference. She moved that a conference of representatives of the distress committees of Scotland be convened in the autumn to consider and devise a national policy in regard to making provision for unemployed women, and to arrange for collective action being taken for carrying out the same. Miss Irwin added a suggestion that the conference might be held about the end of September. They would then have some idea of the prospects for the winter.

Miss Margaret S. Kerr, in seconding, said that while there were more openings for women workers at present, they should prepare in case of need.

Bailie Nicol said he was not against the proposal, but he thought the question of the expenses of the conference should be considered. A number of the distress committees of Scotland had no distrss to deal with, and were practically disbanded. These committees would not be inclined to share the expenses of such a conference, and if Glasgow took the iniative she might have to foot the whole bill.

The Chairman pointed out that a conference of all the distress committees of Britain had been held last year regarding the provision of work for men. They had been allowed the expenses of that occasion by the Government without question, and surely they would get similar treatment in regard to a conference on the provision of work for women.

Miss Irwin said that her idea of the conference was that the big committees of the four or five large industrial centres in Scotland would be parties to it. They had very valuable legislative machinery for dealing with industrial distress, and she was afraid that unless the committees took action there was a danger that all of them would be disbanded.

The Chairman said that the Local Government Board had told them emphatically that they had no fund to provide for any scheme of women's work, and that if the matter was to be dealt with the committee must approach the Treasury. The Local Government Board had asked for a written statement of their proposals so that they might lend their aid when the committee went to the Treasury. Such a conference as Miss Irwin suggested would be the proper place at which to formulate proposals.

Mr William Martin said he did not think there was any justification under existing circumstances for the motion. It implied either the existence or the anticipation of widespread distress among women workers, but there were no signs of that at the present time. Indeed, there were probably more openings just now for women workers than there had ever been, owing to their employment in munition making and in other war services.

Mr John Stewart said that they had not dealt with distress among women workers as they ought to have done. They had merely been pottering at the problem hitherto. Immediately the war ended there would be a slump in female labour. The women who were now employed on other than ordinary peace-time work would be thrown out of employment immediately the end of the war came in sight. They should be prepared for that.

The Clerk (Mr Thomas Spence) read a letter which the committee had sent to the Local Government Board asking them to obtain funds from the Treasury for a scheme of training unemployed women and girls in Glasgow and of finding work for them. The letter stated that the funds at the disposal of the committee would be barely sufficient to carry on the work of the labour colony alone for the next six months. It was pointed out that since September last until May 15 of this year 1,331 girls and women had made application to the Distress Committee and that out of that number only 181 were provided with work by the committee. The returns of the Labour Exchange showing that the number of unemployed women and girls in the city had come down [illegible]

VII.—In Edinburgh and Glasgow.

A DEMAND FOR WOMEN WORKERS.

Some people in Edinburgh—a city "poor but proud"—claim that, though in population she is but one-third of Glasgow, yet in accumulated wealth her people, house for house, are as rich as those of her commercial rival Glasgow, instancing three recent millionaire Lord Provosts, denies this, but the point here is that in both cities the great Trustee Savings Banks are putting by money, even in a financial year which, ending in November, included four months of war. In Edinburgh, the growth of deposits, including interest, was about £250,000 In Glasgow, the increase was £317,000, this on a total of more than 12 millions. With 70,000 men at the front, the new accounts were fewer than usual; but withdrawals, save in early August, were also less. It means two things—first, that the people retain confidence in these banks, and, secondly, that they are not living upon their past savings, but upon their present incomes.

In Edinburgh the best financial authority approves of Mr. Lloyd George's embargo on new issues. But it is hoped that high-class securities, which happen to be now maturing, may be allowed renewal, since this would be no drain on capital, but merely a continuance of investments made years ago. The tone is optimistic. "We can find for the war a thousand millions," was a remark which has been made to me by bankers and others in more than one large city. I am told that Sir George Paish has put the normal savings of the country as high as £400,000,000 a year, which is nearly enough to pay for Great Britain's share in the struggle.

PRINTING TRADE.

In Edinburgh the printing trade employs 12,000 persons. It has been hard hit, and has not recovered. War literature has helped things, and immense numbers of Bibles have been bound up for the soldiers. About 20 per cent. of the whole trade has enlisted, or, put in another way, 70 per cent. of the able-bodied males. Government printing helps some of the larger firms, but the general position is not satisfactory.

Both in Edinburgh and in Glasgow the landladies are in difficulties. Students and young men generally have been drafted elsewhere. Billeting, if it could be arranged, would be a blessing, but in Edinburgh, which is a prohibited area, there is not even a Belgian to be had In Glasgow the Belgians who have obtained work are placed out in lodgings selected and supervised by the local relief workers, which co-ordination helps matters considerably.

In both cities I made inquiries about the shopkeepers. The Edinburgh tradesman fears the war far less than he fears the progress of the co-operative system, with its local membership of about 30,000. Glasgow has had an amazingly good Christmas. Even a jeweller, with a prominent business, confesses that he did better this December than in December, 1913.

WOMEN WORKERS WANTED.

Scotland is, on the whole, without distress. The farmers are favoured by splendid prices, and can find work for any number of casuals. In Fifeshire the mines—dependent on export—have been closed, save for two days a week. But things are now better, and the only result of the depression was a wave of recruiting on the part of men who are peculiarly suited to trench work. On the Clydebank, the great firm of Singer, with their sewing machines, left the men severely, but even here the [illegible] would be barely sufficient to carry on the work of the labour colony alone for the next six months. It was pointed out that since September last until May 15 of this year 1331 girls and women had made application to the Distress Committee and that out of that number only 130 were provided with work by the committee. The returns of the Labour Exchange showing that the number of unemployed women and girls in the city had risen from 410 on January 1 to 1699 on April 16 were quoted as an indication of the extent to which unemployment among women prevailed.

The Chairman—The increase in the number of unemployed women on the Labour Exchange Register gives us some reason for action.

The motion was adopted, and a remit was made to the Executive Sub-Committee to make arrangements for the conference.

things are now better, and the only result of the depression was a wave of recruiting on the part of men who are precisely suited to trench work. On the Clydebank, the great firm of Singers, with their sewing machines, felt the crisis severely, but even here the average is asserting itself. The price of sugar struck the confectionery trade in Glasgow, and golf balls are no longer in demand, even if there were rubber to put into them. Also dressmaking is slack, for a social as much as an economic reason, since there are few evening dinners and receptions, for which in the ordinary way ladies would require costumes. Yet, despite these circumstances, it is literally a fact that Glasgow is short of women workers. Referring to hosiery, men's underclothing and shirtmaking, a well-informed lady said to me, "The girls cannot be got." I visited the new municipal workroom for women which has been opened in a lane which Glasgow poetically calls "the Spout Mouth." There I found twenty young girls learning to use power sewing machines, provided by Messrs. Singer. Another six were learning cookery. The girls are carefully selected, and are paid 10s. a week, or 3d. an hour, which is nearly, if not quite, double what a learner would receive in an ordinary way. A hundred machinists could be placed, here and now, with shirtmaking firms. Mechanical knitting women are also needed, which—so strange are the ramifications of industry—brings one to the fish trade.

THE "GUTTER" GIRLS.

The "gutter" girls—which is not a term of reproach, but merely the technical description of the six or seven thousand lassies who "gut" the fish—are accustomed to follow the fish round from the west of Scotland, right over the highlands, to Yarmouth, where the season ends about Christmas. These girls, and the trade on which they depend, are much troubled by the closing of the North Sea. But, although they are receiving relief, it has to be said that the families, so maintained, are often possessed of balances at the bank. Fishing is on the whole a remunerative business—a harvest without ploughing or sowing, which has only to be reaped. Many of the fishermen, with their complete indifference to danger, are of great service to the Admiralty. They undertake the riskiest tasks with absolute nonchalance.

But the lassies—how about them? Well, they are the fastest knitters in the world. They knit as they walk, and when their health fails and they take to bed, they still go on knitting. At the moment a good deal of knitting is needed, and the fishergirls are the people to do it.

Recruiting in Scotland is a phenomenon. In an important Government Office half the men have gone, and others continually ask for leave of absence, urging that people look at them in the streets as if to ask: "What are you still doing here?" Sir George Macrae is colonel of a regiment which he raised in a week. The Heart of Midlothian Football Club raised a company, which is known by its name, and will challenge any other football team on this earth to immediate combat.

Employment Returns.

BOARD OF TRADE returns show that in the trades compulsorily insured against unemployment the percentage of unemployed at the end of last week was 2.73, compared with 2.98 the previous week and 5.60 a year ago. As regards the uninsured trades, the number of men and women on the registers of the Labour Exchanges at the end of last week shows an increase compared with the preceding week, namely, 48,027, against 47,284. The increase was mainly in respect of women.

WORK FOR UNEMPLOYED WOMEN IN LEEDS.

To the Editor of The Yorkshire Post.

Sir,—In a former letter an account was given of the relief workroom for women which has been opened under the auspices of a sub-committee of the Local Representative Committee. There for some ten weeks twenty women have been employed to make garments suitable to be given away to the Belgians and to cases of civilian distress, or sent to the hospitals and troops.

Those who are employed have all lost their employment owing to the war, and were reduced to great straits for food and firing. In the case of one family the staple diet was bread and tea, and they were only able to afford a fire for one hour a day, conditions which must inevitably tend to undermine their health and strength. These women are now enabled to earn enough to keep themselves whilst they are waiting for their own work to improve. Two or three have already gone back to their own employment, and others hope to do so before long.

The Committee are very anxious to be able to give them employment where necessary till the winter is over. Their funds are, however, at an end, and they appeal for help to carry on the enterprise, especially to those who are themselves in good employment. They also ask for gifts of materials for dresses and underclothing, and for garments to renovate. All donations, however small, will be welcomed. Amounts already received:—National Union of Women's Suffrage Societies, £93 0s. 6d.; Mr. A. G. Lupton, £25; Miss B. Kitson, £10; Mrs. Roland Kitson, £3—£131 0s. 6d.—Yours, etc.,

"WORK FOR WOMEN" SCHEME IN NEWCASTLE.

The Movement Centralised.

Under the chairmanship of the Lady Mayoress (Miss Fitzgerald), schemes for giving work to women have now been centralised. A Women's Employment Sub-Committee of the Lord Mayor's War Relief Committee, upon which is represented all industrial and other women's organizations, has been formed.

At 51, Northumberland Street there has been in operation for some time a work room for the mending of clothes. Donations of clothes are gladly received, and are mended, cut down, and made into useful garments, which are distributed through the agency of the Soldiers' and Sailors' Association. Between twenty and thirty women have been employed in this way. They work five days per week and eight hours per day, thus leaving one day free to find permanent employment if possible. All workers employed by the Committee are registered at the Labour Exchange, so that they may be drafted to their own employment when the opportunity arises. The Lady Mayoress again appeals for help in this direction, children's clothes being urgently required.

An order agency has been opened at 51, Blackett Street, where an office has been lent by the North Eastern Centre of the Northern Political League. The business of this agency is to receive and place orders for goods required because of the war for soldiers, sailors, Belgian refugees, and others. From the beginning between 50 and 100 workers have been supplied with work, some earning their living and others supplementing inadequate wages.

A pleasing feature of the work is that several small firms, which otherwise would have had to suspend their workers, have been able to keep them on, because of the orders given in this way, and, up to the end of December orders amounting to £500 had been received. Further orders for knitted goods and other articles are necessary, and will be gratefully received by Miss Richardson at 51, Blackett Street.

The Committee believe that if they could now start one or two skilled trades for women in which Newcastle is lacking, they will have anticipated to some extent unemployment, and opened up fresh avenues for the women workers who will be thrown out as soon as the Government work finishes. An arrangement is being made in conjunction with the Education Committee, whereby a number of young girls will be given training in domestic work and needlework. Sewing classes are to be arranged for the morning, where the girls will make an outfit for themselves in the afternoon. Cookery and housewifery will also be taught. This course will last three months, and the girls will be paid a maintenance wage, rising from 4s. to 6s. per week. It is hoped that this may be the beginning of making domestic work a skilled trade, and that attractive posts may in due course be [illegible]

WORK FOR THE UNEMPLOYED WOMEN AT CARDIFF.

Excellent work is being done by the Women's Employment Committee at Cardiff. Since its formation on September 25 over 70 women have been employed, and are trained under the supervision of a superintendent and forewoman. They are taught needlework, laundry, housework, and economical cookery. All applicants have to register at the Women's Employment office at the City-hall, and also every week at the Labour Exchange, where suitable work will be found for them.

The work is financed by the Government committee on the Prevention of Relief and Distress, which has already granted £290, and which is prepared to make further grants as occasions arise.

A public inspection of the workrooms at St. Andrew's Institute, Cathays, was held on Wednesday, the ex-Lady Mayoress (Mrs. J. Robinson) presiding over a large gathering. A special appeal was made for the loan of sewing machines and other useful articles for the workrooms, and the secretary (Miss Russell) will be pleased to hear from anyone who is anxious to help.

DECISION OF THE PONTYPRIDD GUARDIANS.

Mr. Godfrey Clarke, J.P., presided at a meeting of the Pontypridd Board of Guardians on Wednesday, when Mr. W. C. Dyer (Abercynon) brought forward a motion that owing to war prices the outdoor relief be increased by 20 per cent. This Mr. Frank Thomas seconded. Mr. William Evans, J.P., suggested that the motion should be first referred to the relief committee for consideration, but this was opposed, and Mr. Dyer's resolution carried.

The guardians refused to alter their decision deferring the scheme with reference to the proposed alterations to the children's probationary home at Maesycoed and the erection of new buildings at a cost of £20,000.

Dundee Courier, Feb: 3rd. 1915.

Before the war broke out an interesting movement was started by a London lady with the object of solving the problem of unemployment and distress amongst educated women. The title given to the movement was "The National Guild of Housewifery," and its three main objects were (1) to elevate housecraft to the dignity of a fine art, and promote the ideal of home-making and home-keeping as a national service for women; (2) to bind together women of every class and every shade of opinion by the one interest common to all—the well-being of the home; and (3) to provide training in domestic subjects for all women who desire to make themselves efficient citizens and to qualify for posts at home or overseas. With the outbreak of the war a wider scope was given to the work of the League, for many professional women, especially actresses and music-hall performers, were thrown out of work. The League is giving free training to many women of this class, and actresses who have suddenly been deprived of a living are learning to blacklead grates and scour floors with the intention, if necessary, of earning their living as domestic servants.

THE CALL FOR WOMEN WORKERS.

Sir,—In consequence of an article entitled "The Call for Many Women Workers," which lately appeared in your columns, a great number of letters have reached the Enquiry and Employment Bureau for Educated Women, and the writers of these letters have pleaded for employment.

For such as were already qualified for definite work the committee has and will be able to find work; they, however, desire, through the medium of your valuable and widely-read journal, to reach the vast army of women who have no such equipment.

All would-be women workers must be brought to realise the futility of seeking employment unless adequately trained. What commercial firm will employ a woman of forty possessing no knowledge of office routine, and who thinks that "she can soon pick up typewriting?" What house mother will entrust children of tender years to a half-educated girl of eighteen unaccustomed to children, lacking habits of tidiness, and without even a working knowledge of needlework?

Long, long past is the age when a lady, merely because she was educated, could obtain work. In former times middle-class homes were less luxurious, and girls were better prepared to fight the battle of life.

It is imperative that those who may have to become salaried workers should now, and without delay, prepare themselves for eventualities.

Liverpool possesses institutions offering first-class trainings at reasonable figures. At this moment special privileges and terms are being offered; public committees are prepared under certain circumstances to assist. Hence there is no valid excuse for girls remaining unprepared. In later life such opportunities will be recalled with remorse, for in middle age only unskilled domestic work will be open to them. For it must be remembered that in the North positions as companions, lady housekeepers, and travelling companions are practically non-existent.

Excellent books and pamphlets on the subject are available, and the Enquiry and Employment Bureau gives, at a merely nominal fee, expert and individual advice as to future prospects, adequate preparation, and suitable institutions; also indicates whence financial assistance, with fees, can be secured.—Yours, &c.,

NOTES ON THE MAGAZINES.

MRS COURTNEY in her talk about "The War and Women's Employment" in the Fortnightly Review is manifestly perplexed like many other people by the fact that women in this country are being so comparatively little engaged to replace the men who have joined the army. She hardly takes sufficiently into account that shrinkage of business is in many cases a real, and in others a plausible, reason for the reduction in the number of employees. It is comparatively easy to dismiss a certain number of workers.

In this case dismissal is not necessary; war conditions bring about withdrawal. But considerable opposition would be offered if women workers were engaged at less wages to do the work previously performed by men. On the other hand, were women engaged at the same wages as men, a precedent would be created that would have costly results. It is probably for these reasons rather than that "the men of this country at a crisis can run it alone" that many unemployed women are kept unemployed. For in many kinds of work there is manifest under-staffing. The real difficulty is the rate of payment. If the double standard of remuneration for the work of men and women is to be maintained, much of the work hitherto done by men must be allowed to be scamped rather than have it performed by women. A curious illustration of this is afforded in the case of hotel waiters. Mrs Courtney is surprised that "the temporary exodus of a whole army of foreign waiters" should not have caused "a striking increase in the demand for caps and aprons." The real explanation is probably one of pounds, shillings, and pence. "Caps and aprons" are not considered to be in keeping with the opulent look of a fashionable hotel dining-room. They are cheap, or they are thought to be cheap, and while their presence is permitted in tea rooms or restaurants where prices rule low, they are not expected in hotels that desire to cater for moneyed guests. Yet it is obvious that many customers would feel much more comfortable and at home if they were waited on by nice young English parlourmaids than by German men. Mrs Courtney pierces further below the smooth proffered surface of things when she considers the Civil Service and the manner in which some of its officials strive to keep women at bay. Here she writes with some experience of the individuals who decide whether women are qualified to enter the service in which they themselves hold well-paid posts. She remarks: "It was curious to see how in the evidence given by witness after witness before the Royal Commission lately sitting the real reason against employing more women was that these older civil servants did not like it."

EMPLOYMENT IN LONDON.

GENERAL IMPROVEMENT.

Mr. F. BRINSLEY HARPER, chairman of the Central Unemployed Body, in the course of a statement at yesterday's meeting, said there was a general improvement in the conditions of employment for men in London. At the docks and wharves the conditions were better than last year, and many industries usually slack at this season of the year were busy on account of Government orders. Registration at the labour exchanges was decreasing, and casual pauperism and school feeding were less than usual. On the whole the poorer classes were not worse off than usual. Things were felt more among the lower middle-classes, due in many cases to the young-man boarder having enlisted.

With regard to women, work was getting better. But although there was a distinct improvement, things were still below the normal, and unemployment among dressmakers (particularly those accustomed to the better class of work) and charwomen was very noticeable.

Mr. HAZEL suggested that the chairman's review should be sent to Berlin.

UNEMPLOYED GIRLS.

EMIGRATION TO AUSTRALIA.

To-day the first party of young women who have been accepted by the Queen's Work for Women Fund for emigration to Australia will leave by the Uripides for their new home. The emigrants represent a small proportion of the girls who have been thrown out of work owing to the war, and who have been helped by the Queen's Fund.

They are the advance guard of a total of 200 girls whom the States of New South Wales and Victoria have offered to take for domestic service. The Queen's Fund has given each of the girls a complete outfit, £1 towards their fare, and £1 landing money. They are taken out for £3 each, but each girl is to repay £2 from her wages after her arrival to the State in which she settles. Eleven of the party will go to New South Wales and six to Victoria.

They have been engaged as shop-girls, typists, dressmakers, factory girls, and in other occupations, but they express their willingness to begin as domestic servants in their new home.

EMPLOYMENT OF WOMEN.

The Glasgow Burgh Distress Committee at their meeting on Tuesday will receive a report from their sub-committee as to the steps which have been taken to deal with unemployment among women. A special sub-committee was appointed some time ago to prepare a detailed estimate of the cost of running a workroom with a view to providing employment for all classes of women applying to the committee. That sub-committee was furnished with a statement showing that the number of applications for employment received from September 21 to January 30 was 954. Of that total 346 of the applicants were "working when visited" or "not found," and 415 appeared before the sub-committee, while the other cases remained to be dealt with. Of the 415 whose applications have been disposed of 106 were passed for work, 65 were refused, and 244 did not attend when summoned. Forty-one of those passed for employment failed to start, 45 were started at 281 Cathedral Street, and 20 remained waiting for vacancies. It was reported to the sub-committee that the Scottish Council for Women Trades were in a position to accommodate 100 women in their workrooms in addition to those already sent by the committee, and in view of this the sub-committee recommend that arrangements should be entered into with the Council for Women's Trades to take all the cases passed by the Distress Committee. This recommendation will come before the meeting on Tuesday.

The Queen's Work for Women Fund yesterday amounted to £131,872.

THE SWEATED WOMAN WORKER.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE POST AND MERCURY.

Sir,—The publicity given to cases of sweating in our midst has resulted, we are glad to learn, in the raising of wages to more humane levels.

In the hope that the same good result may be repeated, I beg leave to give details of work and wages in an occupation unhappily not as yet under any Trade Board determination. A machinist worked for an employer (a woman) who keeps an underclothing shop, and has the goods made on the same premises. The first day the machinist made sixteen large chemises, on the second day two of the same kind of chemises, twenty smaller ones, and in addition ten little boys' shirts, with thirty button-holes and thirty buttons stitched on. She was discharged for not doing enough; and she was paid 2s for the two days' work.

In the same shop a woman who has been at this kind of work since she left school makes twenty-six large chemises a day, with sundry odds and ends, such as children's bodices and knickers. This worker earns, or rather receives, 10s a week.

I will make no comment upon this, but ask your readers to picture it all in their minds, with its pathetic implications.

In cases of this order we have at present no possible redress but the force of public opinion. In other sewing trades there is a minimum wage and a legal remedy. The only legal offence committed here is one against the Factory Acts. The hours are 8 to 8, with one hour for dinner and half an hour for tea. The tea time is scrimped to ten minutes, or not allowed at all. This we are notifying in the proper quarter. If war were not on we could organise the workers. As things are, we and they are helpless.—Yours, &c.,

WAR AND WOMEN EARNERS.

EMPLOYMENT LOST & GAINED.

CALL FOR DOCTORS.

The war has brought changes in almost every field of our national life. In the case of women wage-earners there are notable losses and no less notable gains.

To-day we publish the first of a series of articles dealing with these questions, based on evidence carefully sought in all the chief towns and cities of the United Kingdom. While there is a slump in some professions, it is clear that the demand for women in medicine has increased enormously.

One of the most interesting questions raised by the war is: "How is it affecting women who work?"

Two considerations will qualify the optimism of those who regard the present moment as woman's golden chance. Before the war, wherever and whenever girls and women could be employed on work formerly done by men, they have been employed for the simple but regrettably sufficient reason that they cost less than men. This tendency the war has accentuated, not created. In the second place, if women have not been employed in this or that occupation prior to the war, it is either because they lacked the skill or the experience, or the strength required. This lack the war has not suddenly supplied.

Let us take first the professional woman. She was one of the earliest to suffer as a result of the war. Economy, like charity, begins at home, and the father of the family faced with the need for retrenchment told his daughters they must at least for a time forego their music or their singing or their drawing or their painting lessons, and his younger children their governess. He himself gave up his secretary, and his wife her companion. Meanwhile those governesses who had been employed in Germany, France, Belgium, and Switzerland poured back to swell the ranks of the unemployed in this country. In brief, the professions which depend upon the conditions of peace and the fluency of the market came to a sudden stop, and the creative and artistic professions, such as art, music, literature, and journalism, were seriously crippled.

WOMEN DOCTORS IN POSSESSION.

The one professional woman whom the war is undoubtedly benefiting is the woman doctor. She has swept into her own in an amazing fashion. For a generation she was regarded with a kind of critical suspicion by the public; thought, perhaps, good enough for women and children in private, but not for the hospital or dispensary, or for really serious cases. To-day hospitals are clamouring for her, and the stampede of surgeons and medical men to the front and of students to the ranks has left her in possession. No wonder Dr. Mary Scharlieb, whose skill and reputation have done much to make to-day's triumph possible, declares this to be "really the time of opportunity." That women realise this is evident from a conversation we had with Miss Brooks, the secretary of the London School of Medicine for Women.

"We began our session in October," she said, "with a record entry of 56 new students, but I do not think the war responsible for this. Since that time, however, there has been an enormous increase in the number of applications and inquiries from women with a view to taking up a medical course. I am confident a great impetus has been given to women to enter the profession, an impetus due to their realisation since the war began that there is very little use for the untrained worker in times of crisis.

MEDICAL OUTLOOK.

"But, apart from such desire, the public is faced with a most serious position in the matter of medical service. There was a shortage of supply before the war began, due, in my opinion, to the way in which the Insurance Act has improved the financial position of the ordinary general practitioner, especially in industrial districts. The need for assistance has been so great that men in big industrial practices have offered a large salary to young assistants, and thus drawn them away from less well-paid positions in hospitals and dispensaries. Every hon. [illegible]

The need for assistance has been so great that men in big industrial practices have offered a large salary to young assistants, and thus drawn them away from less well-paid positions in hospitals and dispensaries. There has been a serious shortage in applicants for the various posts during the last 12 months, and this has become acute since the war, so many men having been drawn to serve in the Red Cross, the R.A.M.C., as well as in connection with voluntary medical efforts for the wounded.

"Probably it is not realised how serious the situation may become, but if there is such pressure on the medical service in this country when 200,000 men are in the field, what will it be in the spring, when four times as many are at the front? The withdrawal of the large majority of the young men from ordinary service has necessitated the opening of posts to whoever will apply, and the big hospitals are only too thankful to get fully qualified women. For example, two of the biggest hospitals in the Midlands are now entirely staffed by women. Indeed, there is hardly a resident post not open to a qualified woman if she cares to apply for it. At the present time we have something like 220 medical students in the school, so that we hope to pass out each year 30 or 40 qualified women doctors."

At the front there are five hospitals supplied and maintained wholly by women. Inquiry at the Central Bureau for the Employment of Women showed that the war is also giving a keen impetus to nursing as a profession; otherwise it is not having a good effect on the employment of educated women or providing them with increased work or fresh opportunities, though girls and women are writing every day from every part of the British Isles asking if they can take the place of men!

WAR ITEMS.

CHAINMAKERS IN DOMESTIC TRAINING.

The unemployed women chainmakers of Cradley Heath have brought about a new position in war relief work. No less than five local Relief Committees of as many districts, have united in the management of a common workroom for their benefit. The great obstacle, which no single local Committee felt equal to removing, was the unsuitability of the chainmakers for any other work. The majority, it was said, practically did not understand the use of a needle, and their hands were so hard with the rough work to which they were accustomed, that to teach them seemed too great an undertaking. The Central Committee was not daunted by this difficulty. The establishment of a Domestic Economy Centre, which would include a needle-workroom, was suggested. There seemed no reason, in the view of the Central Committee, why the opportunity should not be used of instructing the women, who confessedly have little such knowledge in the domestic arts. The experiment has been a great success. The Workers' Institute, a large convenient building, was lent for the purpose, and the Secretaries of the different Committees approached the local Education Committee for help in forming instruction classes for the workers. Nurses and Health Visitors were promised for health talks and demonstrations, and the services of an expert cookery teacher were obtained. The scheme included, in addition, the making and mending of clothes, cradle making, and the training of sick room helps. The results of the work, (which has been started barely a month) have been far ahead of all expectations. The workers have not only learned to use the needle, but to turn out very creditable work. They have even got the length of embroidery and making buttonholes. An improvement is remarked in their own personal appearance, and pumice stone and nail brushes are used energetically to the hard hands. Keen competition takes place in the making of the cleanest garments. The domestic training is having effect upon the homes of the women, which already appear cleaner and more tidy. The food which the women cook at their lessons they are given the opportunity of buying at cost price, and taking home.

LOCAL UNEMPLOYMENT.

—:o:—

BILLETING TROOPS MITIGATES DISTRESS.

Last (Friday) evening, at the Town Hall, a meeting of the Local Committee for the Prevention and Relief of Distress was held.

The Mayor (Councillor E. A. Hocking) presided, supported by Alderman R. W. Mitchell, J.P., and others. There was a large attendance.

The Mayor said Mrs. Bagshawe, who had done much charitable work, had suffered a double bereavement, and she was far from well. He moved a vote of sympathy.

This was carried, the members upstanding.

The Assistance Sub-Committee reported that the total number of cases considered by them was 161, dealt with as appended:—Not entertained, 6; referred to Poor Law Guardians, 12; Central Aid Council, 10; Soldiers and Sailors' Families Association, 30; Society of Friends of Foreigners in Distress, 1; Industries Committee, 43; Borough Engineer for employment, 2; War Refugees Committee, 4; Mental Deficiency Committee, 1; assisted from Mayor's Emergency Fund, 19; assisted from Local Relief Committee, 49. The number of cases in hand was 25.

The total expenditure incurred on behalf of persons assisted was: From Mayor's Emergency Fund, £46 3s.; from Local Relief Fund, £211 8s. 3d.

The Finance Sub-Committee had made the following grants:—Industries Sub-Committee, £100; Industries Committee (toy-making), £50; Assistance Sub-Committee, £160; total, £310.

The Finance Committee was empowered to make grants to other Committees without the previous sanction of the principal Committee.

The Industries Sub-Committee's report stated that work had been resumed upon the ground at the Highlands provided by Mr. Crake, J.P. Owing to weather, work has not yet been commenced upon the ground at Clive Vale provided by Mrs. Sayer. By the kindness of the Committee of the Central Cricket Ground, the use of the Pavilion has been obtained gratuitously for a workroom. Mrs. Botley kindly undertook to act as hon. secretary and organiser, assisted by Miss Reeves and Miss Bowerman. Women unemployed through the War had been employed, the number varying from 7 to 15. Owing to the number of unemployed had been less than was anticipated.

The Toy-making Industry was working satisfactorily under the Committee. On the whole (largely owing to the billeting of troops), the number of unemployed were no greater in the aggregate than in ordinary years, but exceptions existed in certain occupations, in particular in the dressmaking and millinery trades and among painters.

Mr. C. F. Botley, as Chairman of the Industries Sub-Committee, moved the acceptance of the report. There was any amount of energy with regard to the gardens, and though the weather had been against them they would be able soon to have produce. They had had great help with regard to the workroom in the Cricket Ground, not only by money, but from material. If any lady or gentleman would help them in that it would be welcomed. The distress was chiefly amongst young women who had never been in distress before. They were communicating with Headquarters in the hope of a grant. If the soldiers were withdrawn and they lost the billeting, there would be great need. The Sub-Committee provided 1,696 hours of employment and expended £40 14s 4d. of the £75 voted to them. They had sufficient cash and material for three weeks' labour, and their Secretary had £26 in hand.

Mr. Guest (representing the Central Committee in London) explained that there being at that time very little unemployment among women, they did not make a grant from headquarters. If there was a need for it now he would be glad to give assistance if he could. (Hear, hear.)

Miss Sheehan said she now had about the same registering as at any normal time. She had now nearly 100 applications. A large number of girls in millinery, dressmaking and tailoring were on very short time, and their wages were low.

Councillor F. W. Morgan said that they had not much to complain of if when the need became pressing they could have assistance from headquarters.

Mr. Guest indicated that this was so.

Mr. Botley, in replying to questions, said the amount realised from the toys was practically £30.

Councillor H. Groome raised the point as to relative cost of the toys and the amount from the sale.

Mr. Botley said they had a very able organiser. They got as much as they could from the sale.

Mrs. F. Strickland wrote reporting on the War Refugees' Sub-Committee that the number of refugees was

They were more or less responsible for 159, and the cost of their work was about £74 a week. The result of the house to house collection was most gratifying. The Mayoress kindly handed over £30 from the Children's Dance. A good many Belgians had grants to return to their own country after consultation with the Belgian Legation.

Mrs. Harkness resigning from the Assistance Sub-Committee (owing to work on another Committee), Lady Mabelle Egerton was appointed in her place.

VERY LITTLE UNEMPLOYMENT.

"There is no indication throughout London of any distress caused by unemployment amongst men of the industrial class," reports the Central Unemployed Body for London, on the work of the year ending June 30.

"Amongst women the position is also good."

The total registrations from men, in all 9,223, are lower than in any previous year. In 1908-9, a "distress year," 47,731 applications were registered.

In the case of women, the total of 14,411 registrations is very much in advance of the previous highest total, 1,805; but about 80 per cent. of the registrations were made in the first half of the year.

EMERGENCY WORKROOM FOR DUNDEE UNEMPLOYED WOMEN.

The Dundee Advisory Board of the Scottish Council for Women's Employment are taking account of some unemployment existing in Dundee which is not reached by applicants applying for charity, and acting on the experience of Glasgow are opening a workroom for women and girls in search of work. Application was made to the Corporation for the use of premises for an experimental period of three months, and it was reported at a meeting of the Board yesterday, over which Mr James Thomson, solicitor, presided, that suitable premises had been granted at 73 Castle Street, where names would be received and suitable work provided.

The work will be of a temporary nature, and will not conflict with any industry or business. The Board hope for the co-operation and personal assistance of ladies in this work, and in gifts which may help it on. A feeling has been growing that, while all possible effort should be made for general purposes, it were a disgrace if any were to be in want through those temporary dislocations caused by the war.

M. WORTH TO CLOSE HIS ENGLISH BRANCH.

WAR'S EFFECT ON DRESS AND SOCIETY.

There is consternation among the work-girls at Worth's. After 14 years in London the great Paris dressmaker is to close the English branch of the famous house in two weeks' time.

"Perhaps we shall be able to open again in six months," said Mons. Poncet, the manager, to a "Daily Chronicle" representative yesterday. "Who knows? At present it is not worth while to go on. Our clients? Yes, they have been splendid. But this craze for economy in clothes—it means that we shall have to suspend business till after the war—or until matters improve."

The head of one of the departments told our representative that the news of the closing of the house has come to all the employees as a huge surprise.

"It is very serious for us all," she said, sorrowfully. "We are so happy here. We get the best food possible, two new dresses every year, and excellent wages. I have been here nine years. And the clients have been so good. That is why I cannot understand the closing of the house. Ladies who in the ordinary course expect two years' credit have paid up like angels. And as soon as it became known that we could not carry on, duchesses and countesses have called in their cars to know if they could help.

"It will be indeed serious for the work-girls. I fear they will be unable to get posts elsewhere. All the London houses are telling applicants that they will have to wait a long time for a vacancy. And who knows how long the war will last?

"There are no race gowns, no Court gowns, no elaborate evening gowns, and all this means a difference to the big houses. But to think of Worth closing! It is impossible!"

BOOM IN WOMEN'S WORK.

ARMY BILLETS GIVE PLENTY TO DO.

DEARTH OF CHARWOMEN.

The general state of employment amongst women has altered but little during the last month, but what changes have occurred have all been towards improved conditions, says the "Board of Trade Labour Gazette."

In spite of the abnormal condition of industry as a whole the normal seasonable changes are being felt in certain trades.

Thus dressmakers are benefiting by the beginning of the spring trade and the introduction of new fashions.

Dressmaking still remains, however, amongst the trades most seriously affected by the war.

Many dressmakers are finding employment on Army clothing, shirts, etc.

The millinery trade in London is reported to have recovered to a great extent from the effects of the war.

SHORTAGE OF NEEDLES.

As an instance of isolated cases of unemployment in industries working at high pressure it has been reported that a certain large hosiery factory which has been working on Government contracts is putting off a number of women at present owing to the difficulty of obtaining machine needles, which were made in Germany.

Another case occurred of a firm of football boot manufacturers who have received a contract for Army boots, but owing to the fact that there is less work in an Army boot than in a football boot a certain number of women have been dismissed.

The pressure in the trades supplying the needs of the Army and Navy shows no signs of lessening.

HELPED BY MEN'S WAGES.

In districts where large detachments of soldiers are billeted the number of women desiring work has materially declined.

Women who went out either for industrial or domestic work now find occupation at home.

In many cases they even needed additional help, and the two influences combined have in some districts resulted in the unusual state of affairs that the supply of charwomen is insufficient to meet the demand.

The high wages earned by men have also to some extent reacted on the supply of women's labour.

Liverpool Post 12.2.15

The Evening Mail 12/2/15

Dislocation of trade resulting from the war has adversely affected women's work, notably dressmaking, millinery, high-class ladies' tailoring—many of the large shops having dismissed from thirty to forty hands—upholstery, and sugar confectionery. There are also a number of café waitresses on half time (writes a correspondent). One class of women and girls have, however, been hard hit by the war—namely, those employed in season hotels and boarding-houses. With a season cut short, which also affected their tips, they have had a hard winter. To a great many, without homes, who naturally drift into Liverpool, as the great exchange for this class of work, the time has been fraught with much anxiety and privation, if not temptation, and I have been much struck with the courageous and independent spirit in which they have encountered the trials. Unfortunately, it is a difficult matter to deal with this class under the existing agencies, but let us hope the approach of spring will ease the anxious hearts of many of these girls.

GIRL WORKERS AND THE MILITARY BAND.

It was a kind thought that prompted Major Benson to send the band of the 8th Irish to play outside the Liverpool Women's War Service Bureau yesterday morning (writes Miss Bevan). The band were very warmly welcomed by the workers, who spent a most enjoyable morning listening to the varied selection of music, Irish airs, patriotic songs, &c., played for their benefit. The girls employed in the toy rooms at No. 6 were set free from their work for a short time and congregated in the drive, appreciating to the full the respite from work and the cheerful and inspiring strains of the band, and joining with great zest in the chorus of "Tipperary." Nor were they and the bureau workers the only participators in the enjoyment. Judging from the knots of people who gathered on several doorsteps in the drive their pleasure was shared by many. It is an old saying that "all work and no play makes Jack a dull boy." The workers of the bureau, with the exception of a week's holiday at Christmas, have laboured steadily since August 4 at their work of collecting, altering, packing, and despatching the 135,000 articles which up to the present have been distributed among his Majesty's Forces and the hospitals. So they were grateful for the short relaxation, and returned to their work cheered and encouraged by the efforts of the musicians and by the extremely kind thought of Major Benson.

GERMAN TOY TRADE.

Northumberland Effort to Capture Industry.

(To the Editor of the "Evening Mail.")

Sir,—The Northumberland County Women's Employment Committee opened last November a workshop in North Shields in order to provide work for unemployed women, and also to teach them a new trade, the making of wooden toys, by which they would be able to earn good wages, both now and after the war.

Premises have been lent at 27, Northumberland Square, and the services of an instructor given. The undertaking has been extremely successful, and the girls are rapidly becoming skilled workers.

Exhibitions of their work were held at Christmas in North Shields and Newcastle, and all the completed toys were sold. They are exhibiting at a Trades Exhibition in London in March, which has been organised with a view to capturing the German and Austrian trade. There they hope to get a sufficient number of orders from the toy dealers to enable them to become self-supporting.

To make it possible to start, a small fund was raised, but this money is practically exhausted, and the committee appeals most earnestly for donations to enable the workrooms to pay their way during the next two months, and to get a good stock made for the March exhibition.

The cost of plant and material is so small that almost all the money which is given is spent in wages to these women, who would otherwise be destitute. Donations should be sent either to the Viscountess Howick, Howick Grange, Lesbury, Northumberland, the Viscountess Allendale, Bywell Hall, Stocksfield, or Miss C. M. Gordon, 3, Osborne Terrace, Newcastle.—Yours, etc.,

DISTRESS IN GLASGOW

Glasgow Evening News. 9.3.15

Women Workers Idle.

Reports submitted at the meeting to-day of the Glasgow Burgh Distress Committee showed that 1087 women had applied for work since September, and that 153 had been passed for employment. Some had not appeared when summoned before the committee, while others did not fulfil the requirements of the Act which the committee administer.

Mr John Stewart asked if any information could be given as to what became of the women who applied for work and were refused. He understood that women who were out of employment in were not eligible for work under the committee, and that only women who were temporarily unemployed as a result of normal conditions could be dealt with. What became of all the women who were idle owing to the war?

Bailie Maclure, who presided, said that they could not go beyond the power given them by the Act.

Mr Alston said that a large proportion of the applications which had come before him and had had to be refused were from women who were seeking work because their of employment. These women had not previously been at work outside their own households, and they could not be described as temporarily unemployed from normal causes.

Mr Stewart—And do you refuse a woman work because her husband has gone to the war?

Mr Alston—I did not say that. I said because their husbands were out of work.

Bailie Nicol pointed out that in such a case the husband could apply for work.

In reply to Mr Early, the Clerk stated that it took ten days to dispose of an application from the time it was received. Mr Early expressed the opinion that that was too long to when in all probability she was very near a state of destitution before she approached the committee.

Miss Irwin said that the Scottish Council for Women's Trades endeavoured to mitigate the position of these women in the interval, and Mr Ross suggested that temporary relief might be granted in those cases.

The committee agreed to remit to a sub-committee to consider and report regarding the question raised by Mr Stewart.

UNEMPLOYED WOMEN.

EMIGRATION AS A PARTIAL SOLUTION.

THE "TEMPORARY" WORKER.

The war created industrial hardships for women which, though now much decreased, are still widely felt. Families reduced their staffs of female servants, and in houses where only one had been employed, she was in some cases dispensed with altogether. In the City the number of women clerks was cut down, and in various other trades and occupations there was a good deal of unemployment. Matters, however, have gradually begun to right themselves.

In business offices the situations left vacant by men have been given in many cases to women, sometimes at a lower wage and sometimes without change. It was suggested yesterday that at the end of the war, when the men come to reclaim the situations kept vacant for them, a very difficult problem will have to be faced—namely, what is to become of the temporary woman clerk? The men must return to their engagements, and so far as can now be seen there will be a greater surplus than ever of unemployed single women.

The British Women's Emigration Society (Imperial Institute) is continuing to organize parties for the Colonies in spite of wars and threatened blockades. The society is helped by the Government of Australia, which gives special facilities to the emigrants. These young women who go to Australia are destined for domestic service only; they must be between the ages of 18 and 25, and if they have up to the time of leaving this country received no training it will be provided for them in the Colonies to which they go. Last week a party of 100 sailed, and two more parties have already been arranged for to leave in March.

In many factories work hitherto done by men is now being performed by women, and in the professions, especially medicine, as has already been mentioned in The Times, the woman practitioner is now enjoying the benefits of reduced competition. The problem of the surplus woman, however, still remains difficult of solution, and it is abundantly evident that the number of single women seeking work is in excess of the number of vacant situations. The purely temporary employment obtained by many as a result of the absence of men does not compensate for the number of berths which have been closed, and every unmarried woman has not the inclination to emigrate, though many have already done so.

Unemployment has brought with it a good deal of sickness. The books of many friendly societies with women members have lately shown a large increase in demands for sick pay, and investigation has shown that in the great majority of cases the ailment has been of a nervous kind, the result of worry through unemployment.

The War and Trade Dislocation.

By no means the least of the evils which have been brought upon our country by this terrible war, is the serious dislocation of several branches of industry, with the misery and distress which it brings to many poor families. I do not wish to suggest that the evils of a depressed trade are in any way comparable to the other great evils which follow in the wake of war. Indeed I am inclined to think that distress here in England as a result of this conflict, might have a wholesome and salutary effect if it brought home to us something of the horror of the course we have adopted. But unfortunately the burden of civil distress does not fall upon those who glory most in war.

Before the war broke out there was no subject upon which public opinion was so vague as to what its effects upon industry would be. It was obvious that trade with the nations against which the Allies were fighting would cease entirely. Trade with neutral nations would suffer loss and hindrance through increased risks of shipping and through the general depression of credit. Trade with allied nations would suffer much dislocation, being increased in some directions and curtailed in others. Against these disadvantages there could be set the greatly increased demand for labour at home upon the huge Government contracts, and also the absorption of much displaced labour in the ranks of the new Kitchener Army. The financial confusion, which has been considerable, has not really seriously affected industry as a whole, except through the oppressive rise in prices consequent upon the shortage of labour.

From the table of figures given at the foot of this page it will be seen that trade has recovered very remarkably since its acute depression in August, and if the effect of war upon industry is to be used as an attack upon militarism, it is necessary to know and understand what has taken place. At the moment it seems as though the war has actually increased the total demand for labour, especially of a casual nature, whether at the docks or in the carrying and kindred trades, because the men who usually undertake this work had been drafted off into the army.

The Board of Trade obtained its figures after a careful investigation covering 66 per cent. of the employees in large firms, and 10 per cent. of those in small firms, including non-union as well as union labour. The table only includes industrial concerns and does not touch railways, docks, shipping, carrying trade, agriculture, clerks or shop assistants, but these, with the exception of the last two groups, are known from other sources to be almost normal. It will be seen that of every 100 men who were at work in July, 10 in September, and 10.7 in October had lost their work through the war. For November no figures were obtained, but by December although the contraction figures slightly decreased to 10.6 per cent., the figures for enlistment still increased, reaching a percentage of 13.3 of the men displaced from industry. This means that the war has really provided employment, whether in industry or in the army, for 2.7 per cent. more men than were employed in July last year (indicated in the bottom line but one of the fifth column of the table). In women's industries the displacement in September was 8.4 of every 100 women employees who were at work in July. This figure was reduced to 6.2 in October, and by December it reached the very low percentage of 3.2. The actual displacement of women workers does not appear to have been so serious as it has been for men; yet the distress amongst women has been more acute, because they have not the alternative of enlisting which is open to men who are out of work. Women engaged in high grade tailoring, jewelry and all luxury trades, have been most seriously affected, but those who were thus thrown out of work in the early stages of the war have since partially been absorbed in the numerous workrooms for women which have been established by the Distress Committees and also by the Women's Employment Committee. However it should be remembered that typists, actors and actresses and nearly all professional classes have suffered very much, and many remain without prospect of obtaining work even in the near future. Short time is a serious problem, but distress here like that caused by total unemployment is rapidly decreasing.

The January figures following upon the December figures which included the busy Christmas season may possibly show some slight increase in unemployment, but the situation in the industrial sphere is not likely to become acute during the continuation of the war.

WOMEN IN THE FIELD.

The employment of female labour in work ordinarily undertaken by men has been subject of frequent consideration since the outbreak of war, and in not a few instances a serious problem has been solved by the utilisation of the services of women.

Generally speaking, women exhibit great adaptability, and there seems no reason why they should not be given an opportunity to show that they can discharge many of the duties ordinarily performed by men quite satisfactorily.

That they can do so is apparently the opinion of the military authorities, who are about to avail themselves of the services of a large party of British Suffragettes in France. These women, it is stated, are to take up the work of telephonists, telegraphists, chauffeurs, and such like, and thereby set free a corresponding number of men for the discharge of the more arduous duties of the field.

That they will perform their functions efficiently no one need have any doubt. In their political campaign they showed a capacity for sticking to their point which compelled a measure of admiration even from those most resolutely opposed to their claims. That in itself is an indication that they will not readily grow weary of the new duties they may undertake.

Then their patriotism is beyond question, for no body or section in the country has more completely put aside for the moment its particular programme than have the women who claim equal electoral rights with men. In what they are now doing the women Suffragists are giving evidence of their capacity and their practical commonsense.

WOMEN AND THE WAR.

At a time when the question of employing the services of women, temporarily at all events, in positions usually filled by men is being much discussed, it is interesting to inquire into the effects of the war upon the ordinary sources of feminine employment, and the necessary information is supplied by the Board of Trade returns. Happily in this as in other directions there has been an improvement during the past three or four months, largely in consequence of the demand for women's labour in connection with the equipment of the new Armies that are now being organised and trained, especially as regards tailoring, shirts, boots, and leather work. On the other hand, it has to be admitted that certain trades remain slack. Many dressmakers and milliners are without work, and there has been a falling off in the mantle, costume, and underclothing trades, while in the lace trade employment is described as bad and in the silk and linen trades moderate. In Yorkshire women's employment is good, owing to the activity in the textile industries, and in Lancashire the improved conditions in the cotton trade have had the effect of bringing back many of the women who had gone into Yorkshire to find work in the woollen mills. It is a significant fact that the number of women on the register of the Labour Exchanges on the 15th January last was about 88 per cent. above the figure for the corresponding date in 1914. The returns of the Women's Employment Bureaux, which are not connected with the Labour Exchanges, show that the number of applications registered in January, 1915, represented an increase of 12 per cent. compared with January, 1914, and the number of situations offered decreased by 16 per cent. Something has been done in various districts to ease the general situation by establishing workrooms where women and girls are not only employed but in many cases also taught new trades.

WAR EFFECTS ON WAGES AND CONDITIONS.

THE INDUSTRIAL SITUATION REVIEWED.

(From a Labour Correspondent.)

There is a popular impression that the war has had the effect of raising industrial wages to an unprecedented level. The plain truth is that wages remain much as they were before the war. The movement for increased wages is yet at the beginning, and only in a few instances have any actual benefits reached the working classes. It is necessary frankly to dismiss the idea of "business as usual." Industries directly affected by the demand for war material are, of course, abnormally busy, but those not employed upon war material are more or less stagnant. The concentration of the nation's industrial energies upon military and naval munitions and equipment has produced some curious results, but in no case yet has it led to any considerable rise in standard wages. A careful investigation of the conditions shows that wherever the workers are making larger earnings the excess over the normal or pre-war conditions is almost entirely due to longer hours of overtime and to excessive workshop pressure.

Machines and Metals Industry.

The huge group of trades in the machines and metals industry which employ considerably over a million and a half persons in the United Kingdom have been taxed to their utmost capacity since last October. Broadly speaking, all the workers in these industries are still working upon the rates and conditions in force before the war. What has actually happened is that all union restrictions upon overtime have been suspended and that the men in most localities are working excessive hours.

To understand this apparent anomaly it is necessary to bear in mind the general method of adjusting wages. Such a thing as a national alteration of wage rates is unknown; every locality makes its own arrangements as to wages and workshop conditions. Of late years the tendency has been to make wage rates secure for a period of years. Thus, the rates for Manchester engineers are fixed until January, 1916, while those for Newcastle are fixed for nearly twelve months longer. The Glasgow and Clyde agreement has lapsed this month, and, war or no war, a rectification of standard rates would have taken place.

There have been some rises in smaller districts, but they do not materially affect the general conditions. Many of these districts have long been under wages conditions much below the average for the country, and advantage has been taken of the war boom and the consequent sharp demand for labour to force these districts roughly into line with the rest of the trade. Though the method varies very much locally and sectionally, there is now a general definite movement for increased wages. But the demands for advances are practically the first made since the war began.

The Rising Labour Market.

Wages, then, have not risen, but are about to rise. As far as the engineering group is concerned standard wage rates are not likely to be much altered for some time to come. Three important cases will illustrate the probable results, as well as the diversity of procedure. In Manchester, which is the largest centre of machine production in the kingdom, the claim is for a bonus to be paid upon existing standard wage rates during the continuation of the war. This will leave the agreement conditions unaltered. The claims will very likely be conceded, and the percentage will probably be in proportion to the rise in the rate in those places where the recognised standard has been raised, as at Glasgow. [illegible] contracts is almost as rapid, too. In [illegible]th industries it is always vehemently opposed by a considerable, though not a predominating, section of the men, who regard it as a sinister device of the employers to take some unfair advantage. Nevertheless, it is generally recognised as a good arrangement if for no other reason than that it gives a certain security and fixity to wages and does much to minimise the danger of disputes and strikes.

The war has had rather an adverse effect upon building. At the beginning of the war the building trades surrendered to the London employers and closed the lock-out. Since then there have been no trade developments to justify a demand for higher wages. With the possible exceptions of joiners employed in the shipbuilding yards and house joiners engaged in making huts for the new armies, no members of the building trade organisations have gained any industrial advantage from the war boom. These exceptions are not sufficiently important to influence the rest of the labour occupied in the building industry, with regard to which it may confidently be said that there is neither a disposition to demand higher wages nor a state of trade which would justify it.

The Clothing Trades.

The popular idea that the clothing trades have been made extremely active through the war is curiously mistaken. Factory machinists engaged upon military uniforms and makers of one particular type of boots have had more work than they could cope with. But there are nearly 2,000,000 persons of both sexes occupied in the industry, and the vast majority have been heavily hit by the war. The vast army of dressmakers, milliners, tailors, and hatters are worse off than usual at this season.

The mass of the factory workers are still upon the pre-war lists and conditions, and no advance in rates is either demanded or in contemplation at present. With regard to bootmakers, whatever higher wages may be obtainable are emergency rates applicable to individuals or, at best, to localities. The rest of the industry is as much depressed by the war as the few exceptions are inflated by it.

The Transport Industry.

The railwaymen appear to be the only large section of the workers whose wages have been, or are to be, generally advanced. It is interesting to note that the advance offered by the companies is, roughly, the same as that offered by other trade employers—viz., 10 per cent on existing rates. In the shipping trade some sections of the workers have obtained higher wages, but chiefly as war bonuses and not as the result of any preconcerted or organised demand. In the case of the railwaymen the movement for higher wages began before the war, but was suspended for patriotic reasons. The dockers are only now joining what is likely to be a general movement by the whole of the workers directly affected by the urgency of military supply and distribution.

The Textile Industry.

Only one comparatively small division of the textile industry, the woollen trade, has been quickened by the war boom. The largest section, cotton, and most of the less-important branches have been adversely affected. Here, as in other industries, wages are settled for terms of years, but even where this is not the case there is no state of trade which promises any hope of success for a demand for an advance. This will leave the agreement conditions unaltered The claims will very likely be conceded, and the percentage will probably be in proportion to the rise in the rate in those places where the recognised standard has been raised, as at Glasgow. There the lapse of the time limit has automatically brought the wage question under survey. The men, who asked for 9s. per week, have been offered an immediate 2s. and a further 1s. in three months. The union officials have recommended the acceptance of this offer, but the men at present refuse to accept it. In Newcastle, where the time limit is still unexpired, the same offer has been made, but with the proviso on the part of the employers that the increase shall be paid as a war bonus and not as a formal advance upon the standard. In Manchester the demand has been for a bonus and not for a standard advance. None of these cases is yet settled, but it may be taken for granted that this improvement expresses terms which will virtually govern the trade as a whole. It is true, too, in a general way that it constitutes the first advances of wages in those trades during the war. It will be seen that the advance, whether it involves a raising of the standard or the grant of a bonus, amounts to 2s. in the pound, or roughly 10 per cent.

The Building Trades.

There have been no advances, other than small local or sectional advances, in any branch of the building industry. Much the same methods of adjustment are customary amongst the building trades employers and workers as among the iron trades. The growth of the time-limit arrangement in wage gaged in making huts for the new armies, no members of the building trade organisations have gained any industrial advantage from the war boom. These exceptions are not sufficiently important to influence the rest of the labour occupied in the building industry, with regard to which it may confidently be said that there is neither a disposition to demand higher wages nor a state of trade which would justify it.

The West Riding woollen workers, who are most in demand just now, are, as a rule, working on the lists recognised before the war broke out. The cotton workers are among the people whose calling has been heavily depressed. It should be noted that the recent demands of the woollen weavers are for small advances, and those are limited to unimportant centres.

The Miners.

Except in cases where the usual periodical review of rates and conditions has taken place and has resulted in readjustments of wage agreements, there have been no advances in the coal-mining industry. The recent arrangement in the Yorkshire coalfield was not, strictly, an advance; it was merely a mutual understanding as to the interpretation of a wage agreement already in existence. The point involved was equivalent to something less than 3s. per week. It is probable that the miners themselves would resent the suggestion that they had even asked for an advance of wages, or that the owners' concession of the point in dispute amounted to an advance. The Minimum Wage Act and the Eight Hours (Mines) Act remain undisturbed, and to the extent that they govern wages and conditions in normal times they still govern in war time. The important fact is that there has been no general wage advance attributable to the war boom in the mining industry.

EMPLOYMENT OF GIRLS IN WAR TIME.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE POST AND MERCURY.

Sir,—As many of your readers are doubtless aware, the Liverpool Women's War Service Bureau established toy workrooms last October in order to provide work for girls thrown out of employment by the war. The funds originally subscribed are now exhausted, and unless further help is immediately forthcoming the useful and educational work initiated in these rooms will have to be abandoned.

Under this scheme twenty girls have been trained in the making of stuffed toys. Six of these have now become so expert that they have been taken into the employment of a local toy manufacturer, leaving vacancies for six others. Since the experiment is a new one, the rooms have inevitably been run at a loss, although the toys made have been sold to wholesale dealers. A working capital is essential if the rooms are to be continued. The committee feel that this scheme must make its own appeal to the public, since it not only aims at safeguarding a certain class of the population from the disastrous effects of the war, but also is bidding fair to open up a new channel of employment for the surplus of girl labour always existent in Liverpool.

All donations, however small, will be most gratefully received, and should be sent to the hon. treasurer, W. N. Sherlock, Esq., c/o Messrs. W. H. Walker and Co., 42, Castle-street, Liverpool.—Yours, &c.,

WINIFRED RATHBONE, Chairman;
ROSA HOCH, Hon. Treasurer;
JESSIE J. BEAVAN, Hon. Secretary;

Work for All.

The report issued to-day by the Board of Trade on the state of employment shows that as a result of the war we have reached, temporarily it may be, the ideal economic and social condition in which there is work for all. Down to October the labour market was seriously affected, although not to the extent that had been anticipated. Thenceforward there has been a steady revival, to which several causes have contributed. The efficient work of the Navy in keeping the trade routes open restored confidence among manufacturers, and the remarkable recovery of the cotton trade eliminated one of the chief sources of unemployment. Meanwhile large numbers of men were joining the colours, and before the end of the year there was a dearth of workers in many trades. The army of casuals, a quarter of a million strong, was absorbed in the industrial system, but, even so, by February the shortage of labour has become almost universal. Up to that time more than 15 per cent. of male workers had enlisted, and in the metal, engineering, and shipbuilding trades there were all evidences of increased pressure—less short time, more overtime, and a considerable increase in the numbers actually employed. Farmers have been able to replace one in five of the labourers who have joined the Army. The shortage is in many cases being made good by the employment of female labour. In offices and in shops women have already taken the place of men, and the proportion of female school teachers has been largely increased since the beginning of the war. The urgent call for women is now in the factory, the workshop, and the field, where they can find employment in practically unlimited numbers.

THE TAILORING TRADE.

To meet the large amount of unemployment existing among the tailors and tailoresses, the London Management Committee of the Amalgamated Society have held a number of Conferences with the Association of London Master Tailors. An Emergency Committee, which was formed, has prepared a scheme for making soldiers' uniforms in good sanitary workshops, worked on Democratic lines, to be opened in the West-end. Mr. M. Daly, the secretary, explains that the working conditions, distribution of profits, and general management, will be controlled by a Committee representing the London Master Tailors and the Amalgamated Society of Tailors and Tailoresses.

ASSISTING UNEMPLOYED DRESSMAKERS.

The drapery, millinery, dressmaking, and such like trades have suffered probably more than any others from the effects of the war, with consequent bad results for employés. Very successful endeavours have been made by the Church League for Women's Suffrage, Ireland, to assist women and girls who have lost their employment in these trades, and at present nearly fifty women and girls are working at No. 24 Kildare street, under the auspices of the League, while with outworkers employed in making shirts, the number provided with work by the League reaches nearly a hundred. The premises have been fitted with electric light, and the rooms arranged for work, storage, and meals. In respect of some of those employed, the League receives grants from the Mansion House Fund, but some of the workers are ineligible, as their need of work is only due indirectly to the war. Even with the Mansion House grants, there is surplus expenditure to be covered. The work is chiefly obtained from private sources, and includes dressmaking, tailoring, millinery, embroidery, knitting, shirt making, mending, alterations, and so on. Among the equipment are electric irons and a knitting machine. The women, most of whom were previously employed in the Grafton street shops, work from 9 a.m. to 6 p.m. on five days of the week. Care has been taken not to compete with the trade or private dressmakers, and this point is borne in mind in fixing the rates of wages. Earnings are from 7s. 6d. to 10s. per week. Unless this useful effort is to be curtailed more money is required, and with the object of obtaining funds the League have arranged a concert to be held at the Abbey Theatre on Monday next.

Daily Graphic

All over the country voluntary associations have been formed for good work in connection with the war. One of their chief needs is for trained, efficient secretaries and clerks. Such work is done admirably by women of the right standard of education. Unfortunately many of the associations cannot afford to pay adequate salaries. Yet it remains true that while voluntary help is necessary for direction, the carrying out of the details should be in the hands of the trained and efficient. Realising this, there stepped into the breach Mrs. Constance Hoster, whose Queen Anne's typewriting, shorthand and translating offices at St. Stephen's Chambers, Telegraph Street, E.C., with its staff of twenty and its sixty or seventy pupils has for many years been a beacon of hope to the educated girl trying to make her way in London business and professional life. Mrs. Hoster took on, as a labour of love, in addition to the cares of a great business, the work on the one hand of scheduling and classifying women workers, and on the other of offering this trained assistance to the voluntary associations. Over thirty women have been placed, and several of the associations have written of their work in terms of high praise. Meantime, while the two sides are being brought together, the women have to live, and Mrs. Hoster is paying out £25 a week for this and allied purposes. It is a work which will appeal to all women and to most men, and such well-known people as the Dowager Countess of Desart, Viscountess St. Cyres, Mr. Leopold de Rothschild, Messrs. Dawes and Sons, the eminent solicitors, and Mr. C. E. Town, of the London Chamber of Commerce staff, are helping it, and are willing as references to vouch for its absolute genuineness. The fullest inquiry into it will be welcomed by Mrs. Hoster at the address given, and the work is hereby warmly recommended for help.

WOMEN'S WORK.

GAINS AND LOSSES FROM THE WAR.

The state of employment among women in the Manchester district, so far as the knowledge of those who are engaged in the industrial organisation of women goes, would seem to be only partly reflected in the report, which was published in the "Manchester Guardian" on Monday, of an inquiry into the employment of girls and young women recently conducted by the Girls' Club Union.

The figures quoted, which showed that of 1,727 members of girls' clubs only 176 were working short time and 12 out of work, though they may apply to the case of the younger women and correspond to certain classes of workers in the better organised trades, show too favourable a condition for women's work as a whole. The great improvement in employment generally which has been brought about, on the side of demand, by brisk trade in the wide filed of industry affected by Government contracts, and, on the side of supply, by the withdrawal of so many men for military service, has not been shared in by women. In a few cases their labour has been substituted for that of men, and there has been a specialised demand for women's work in connection with Government supplies, but these two things together have scarcely been sufficient to restore a shrunken demand for women's labour to something like its normal level.

The Unorganised.

There are many classes of women's work in connection with which Labour Exchange experience affords a very poor guide, but among the unorganised and comparatively unskilled workers, who are beginning to make more use of the Exchanges, work is still hard to find. Office cleaners, for example, and other classes of the more elderly labouring women, with regard to whom it is difficult at any time to obtain exact statistical information, have been seriously affected, and if the percentage of unemployment or "short time" among them could be properly estimated it would make a big difference to any general statement as to the state of the women's labour market.

On the other hand, there are certain definite kinds of skill which are now at a premium and for exactly the same reasons as have favourably affected the market for men. The chief effect of the Government contracts as they touch women has been on the demand for machinists, and at the present time it may be said that no woman who can use a machine (particularly a power machine) need be out of work. Tailoresses, too, so far as factory work is concerned, are doing very well, but here the tendency of the market rather discounts special skill, and women who have been used not to factory work but to "private order work" in big tailors' shops are suffering. So far as the departure of men for military service goes, typists seem to be the only women workers who have greatly benefited, and they have no difficulty in finding work.

The Skilled Trades.

In the skilled trades generally there is room for improvement. Weavers, winders, and ring-spinners in the cotton industry have shared the general benefit as their trade has adjusted itself to the new conditions. In the bookbinding trade, a women's society with between 700 and 800 members has only about 12 out of work, but the majority of the others are on short time, which varies from working 40 instead of 55 hours a week to working alternate weeks only. Many of the smaller trades have been badly hit, and, for an example, there are the "clay-pipe finishers"—some 60 or 70 women who can normally earn anything up to 10s. or 12s. a week, but are now reduced to a few shillings.

HELP FOR A THOUSAND "HARD CASES."

GROWING DISTRESS AMONG PROFESSIONAL PEOPLE.

RELIEF COUNCIL'S WORK.

Every week the number of hard cases of professional people whom the war has robbed wholly or partially of employment, and who are being driven into tighter and tighter corners, increases. Probably most of these cases are never heard of. But the beneficent action of the Professional Classes War Relief Council, which never turns any deserving case away without seeing if something cannot be done for it, brings a good many of them to light. One might say that the thirty or forty cases that the council helps every week have been compelled by necessity to bring their troubles into the light of day. More than a thousand "hard cases" have been met. Every one of them is characterised by two indispensable attributes. The first is that the applicant's necessity has been caused solely by the war. The second is that the applicant belongs really to the professional classes, and therefore has no other way of getting help.

The one thing the council does not give is money. It gives help, and it tries to find employment.

For example, a governess, untrained, who had an invalid sister to support, and who all along had found her want of training a serious handicap, lost her post owing to the war. It was decided to give her a training in domestic economy to enable her to qualify for a post as matron. While she is being trained, a member of the council gives her hospitality.

FIRST-CLASS TRAINING SUPPLIED.

An artist was anxious to enlist if hospitality could be provided for his wife and two little children. Through the help of two friends of the council, they have been placed as boarders in the house of another "hard case"—a professional man whose yearly income of £600 to £700 has entirely come to an end through the war. Thus two cases were benefited.

A similar instance of co-operation in help was that of a lady whose house, now empty, was till the war always filled with boarders from abroad. The council has placed with her several ladies who, having returned from the Continent or having lost their employment, were temporarily without homes or means.

Artists who have lost all their commissions, professional men without employment but with sons at school, music teachers, composers—have been helped with the education of their children, have been found work in other vocations, or in some cases are being trained for other jobs. Anyone who will help this good work should write to the Secretaries, Professional Classes War Relief Council, 13 and 14, Prince's Gate, S.W.

FEW OUT OF WORK.

CLOSING UNEMPLOYMENT REGISTERS.

Owing to the satisfactory condition of men's employment in London, the Central (Unemployed) Body is closing the registers to all male applicants.

Now that women are doing work hitherto performed by men, the same organisation finds that all the women's work-rooms are no longer necessary, and they will be gradually closed. Reports indicate that work is being found for women in many occupations hitherto reserved for men. At Deptford Market, now controlled by the War Office, women and girls are employed in packing rations, though it is mentioned in this connection that at the moment some 200 or 300 have been temporarily dismissed owing to lack of material. This week two instances are recorded of firms (acetylene apparatus makers and drapers) where women are employed to take the place of men who have joined the forces.

FILLIP TO TRADE AND EMPLOYMENT.

Upward Leap in Manchester.

OFFICIAL FIGURES.

'Depression Passing Away All Round.'

WORKERS ON OVERTIME.

32 Per Cent Increase in Cost of Food and Coal.

The salient features of the very thorough monthly review of the conditions of trade and employment in Manchester and district, prepared by Profesor S. J. Chapman and Mr. Thomas Hudson, Town Clerk, for the Manchester Relief Committee, are

A considerable improvement in the cotton trade.

A more favourable outlook in employment of all kinds.

An increase in the cost of food and coal of 32 per cent., and Fluctuating trade among shopkeepers in working-class districts.

A spirit of self-sacrifice seems to prevail amongst the workers. In consequence of the higher price of commodities, they have found it necessary to economise. The consumption of beer has consequently been reduced. Off-licence beersellers report "a considerable decrease in trade, which in many cases reaches 50 per cent.," whilst the trade in tobacco and cigarettes "is 25 per cent. beneath normal."

Confectioners are feeling the effects of the war, because the public are purchasing more bread and fewer fancies where they have not begun to bake at home. In grocers' shops the buying in small quantities is marked, whilst a reduced demand is experienced for such articles as boiled ham, butter, and bacon. Relief ticket shops are not doing badly. The cycle trade is bad, sweet shops say their takings show a gradual decrease, whilst some pawnbrokers are refusing to accept further pledges.

It is also affirmed that the cost of food and coal, as compared with July, 1914, has risen by 32 per cent. This figure is arrived at by taking the four budgets given in the last report and adding coal to the list of commodities bought. Last month the increase was estimated at 28 per cent., the increase during January being 4 per cent.

It is mentioned that flour has advanced again by a substantial percentage, but it was to be hoped that some subsidence of price would be experienced as new harvests came forward. Meat has risen, but not to the same extent. Coal also has gone up recently. The cause in this case was said to be shortage in the means of delivery, which had produced local scarcity. It had to be remembered in connection with the difficulty of getting coal to consumers that the recovery of industry in Lancashire put a pressure on the coal trade that to some was unexpected.

Exports Increasing.

The reporters say that the Exports of piece goods for January were more than 25 per cent. better in quantities than those for December.

"Recovery is due in part to the fulfilment of large orders for our Allies. But it is due in the main to the improvement of demand in overseas markets, where in addition by now some replacement of German goods by English substitutes may be taking place.

"Of an increase in exports of 76.5 million yards, France took only 4.5 million yards, which meant, however, 110 per cent. advance on December, when the takings of France were already abnormally high. Increase was biggest in bulk in the supply of the Indian, China and Australian markets. India took 34.5 million yards or 29 per cent. more in January than in December; China 12.8 million yards or 59 per cent. more; British South and West Africa 6.7 million yards or 56 per cent. more; and Australia 3.2 million yards or 27 per cent. more.

"It is also notable that the Egyptian market, which had been gravely affected, accounted for 3.7 million yards of the increase, meaning an advance of 45 per cent. as compared with December; and that Greece accounted for 3.5 million yards, raising her buying over December by 219 per cent.

"Clearly depression is passing away all round. In yarn exports there was an advance of nearly 40 per cent. in January as compared with June. The total increase was nearly 4,000,000lb. and of this France took a little less and India a little more than 1,200,000lb."

Employment Prospects.

The position of employment is now considerably better than a month ago, and the prospects are recognised as favourable. Practically the whole of the members of the societies reviewed in the report are in employment, though some are still on short time. The opinion was expressed that a shortage of labour, owing to enlistments, was not improbable in the near future, provided that the recovery of trade continues. It was generally stated that the bulk of the work was, as yet, confined to grey-cloths, the dyed section remaining very quiet.

The returns show that a large proportion of the workers are engaged on Government work, and in many instances this has necessitated overtime. The following may be enumerated as being on overtime: Saddlers and general leather workers, boot and shoe operatives, flint glass cutters, pattern makers, and paper makers.

Taking the men's unions, it is reported that 90 per cent are on full-time, 6 per cent. on short time, and 4 per cent. unemployed. As regards mixed unions, the percentage on full time exceeds 99, and the "conditions could not be better."

Position of Out-workers.

Since the last report the Corporation Inspectors have visited 366 outworkers, and report only two cases of distress. No case of distress amongst these women has been reported during the last three weeks.

"The most notable development in the work of the women's work-rooms is the training of machinists to take up work with firms engaged on Government contracts. Already several women have passed out of the Sackville-street room after about three weeks' training to take outside work. Twenty more machines will be started in the Heyrod-street work-room this week. It is not, however, intended to admit more women at present, but to give a chance to the more skilled. Toy-making work is proving of value, and it will be continued in St. Matthew's School."

The report says that the Labour Exchange figures showing increased unemployment among women are not conclusive, and they propose to issue a supplementary report on this situation in the course of a few days. The women's trade unions report only 1 per cent. of unemployment and 14 per cent. of short time.

FOURTEEN THOUSAND CASES.

THE CALLS ON THE RELIEF COMMITTEE.

The meeting of the Manchester Relief Committee was held at the Town Hall yesterday afternoon. The Lord Mayor presided.

Sir Thomas Shann, who presented the minutes of the Unemployment Relief Sub-committee, said that up to the end of last week 21,000 applications for relief had been dealt with. Out of this number 14,000 had been granted at a cost of £37,306. At the end of October, 1914, they were paying out relief at the rate of nearly £2,000 per week. At the end of December this amount had been reduced to about £1,500 per week, whilst during last week the amount had been still further reduced to £785. The meals supplied to nursing mothers numbered 48,000 and to children 46,000. The cost had been £1,287. The number of school children receiving free dinners from the Education Committee had fallen from 8,000 in October last to 5,000 at present. The Sunday feeding of children kindly undertaken at certain Manchester cafés was still going on, and over 18,000 meals had been already supplied.

Under-Statements of Income.

Information had been prepared and placed before the Sub-committee dealing with relief cases in respect of wages, occupation, and other matters. He was sorry to say that a considerable number of applicants still tried to obtain relief by false statements concerning income. Careful inquiries were made, and the result of experience showed that the only effective way of obtaining the real income was to make inquiry from the employer.

The Committee continued to give relief to cases in which distress had not been brought about by the war. It was difficult to see how the Committee could do otherwise than help some of these cases. It had been suggested that the amount of relief might be increased in a number of cases. He would be only too pleased to consider any individual cases of hardship if such cases were brought to his notice. A report from the manager of the Labour Exchange indicated that conditions with regard to the types of employment dealt with by the Exchange were improving. The manager included amongst his figures those women who were employed in the workrooms conducted by the Relief Committee. He stated that a number of women appeared to have made application at the Exchange for the sole purpose of obtaining employment in the work-rooms, which work was in some cases preferred to the work offered by the Labour Exchange.

The minutes of the Voluntary Workers' Sub-committee, which were confirmed, included a recommendation that in view of the increased cost of living the Government should instruct pension officers to increase the allowances to dependents of soldiers, other than wives, by a sum equal to 25 per cent of the amount of the allowance.

Grants to Landladies.

There was some discussion, initiated by Dr. Goodfellow, upon the desirability of making grants in money to landladies who are in distress as a result of the war.

The Lord Mayor said he was painfully aware of the distress which existed, but he did not see what the Committee could do in the matter. This was a question of rent and rates, and the Committee were not supposed to pay landlords. The weekly sum the Committee now got was hardly sufficient to supply food for the people, without making grants of money. If they once opened the door to this sort of thing there would be no end to it. He suggested that the matter was one for a few charitable people to deal with in a quiet way in the districts which were concerned.

Councillor Margaret Ashton, speaking on the work of the Women's Employment Sub-committee, said that 8,921 garments had been made by 485 women during the period the work had been carried on. The average number of women employed had been 300. This work did not include any of the manufactures of the toy workroom, or of the machine training room at Sackville Street.

EDUCATION AND UNEMPLOYMENT OF WOMEN.

From time to time in these pages reference has been made to both unemployment and dearth of labour, but these have referred almost entirely to the relation of men and boys to the labour market. This has not occurred from any desire to overlook the conditions among women and girls, but from the greater difficulty of obtaining adequate data. It appears that during September and October of last year, when the amount of unemployment among men was very largely reduced owing to the large number specially engaged for municipal and other work at the instance of the Government, the number of unemployed women and girls was three times as great as the normal. It is estimated that there are nearly five million women and girls employed in earning money in this country, of which about 80,000 are working employers, about 313,000 "individual producers" working on their own account, the remainder working for salaries or wages. Thus more than half the entire female population between 15 and 25 is at work for hire.

This figure only becomes important when the question of wages is considered. Among 8·7 million adult males, the average weekly earning comes out at £1 5s. 9d., and of 1·9 million boys at 10s., while among 3·1 million adult women, the average earnings are 10s. 10½d., and among 1·5 million girls, 7s. 6d. per week.

It is usually assumed that this enormous difference in the payment of adult men and women is justified by the necessity of the support of dependants on the man's part and not on the woman's. It is very questionable whether the statisticians normal family of man (working), wife (not working) and three dependant children is not rather the exception than the rule and indeed, in some recent careful statistics only occurs in about five per cent of the cases. What is true on the other hand is that a very large number of the women working for gain, are responsible for the maintenance wholly or in part of others besides themselves. It is probable that the number approaches 50 per cent, so that the problem is indeed one which affects a large proportion of the population.

With an economic problem of this character to be faced it is probable that Englishwomen are at a disadvantage as compared with the women of almost any other of the advanced nations. In the first place the natural relation of women to agriculture has been almost entirely lost, especially in the southern parts of England. A hundred years ago the women of the country would have naturally taken up the work thrown open owing to the enlistment of the men and would have been able to carry on agriculture in the same way as French and Russians, and no doubt also German and Austrian, women have actually done, without any fuss or trouble on an appeal from their Governments. If this were true only of agriculture, but in industry women were able to show that they really entered largely into the spirit and direction of affairs, the condition would be deplorable to the economist, but not so much to the educationist. But the facts show that in industry also, Englishwomen do not take any share in the management except in very isolated cases. The two greatest industries for women are domestic labour, which showed 1,260,673 for England and Wales in 1911 and cotton manufacture with 372,834, whereas agriculture only showed 94,841. Domestic service is the most unorganised and chaotic of industries and in that of cotton where they again exceed the males employed they have hardly any share in its direction. Unfortunately these strictures do not only refer to the six or so million women who are gainfully employed, but with more force even to those whose occupation is controlling a household. We have from time to time called attention to this subject under Domestic Economics and in this column. In spite of the fact that three million married women belong to the co-operative movement, personally or as wives of shareholders, they have very little voice in its control, though happily there is a slow movement to put women on the management committees of some of the largest societies. In many ways the Englishwoman is economically as free as is possible, she has absolute command over her property and earnings, and yet, she seems to have lost touch with the industrial life of the country and only appears as a voiceless wage slave with rare exceptions. How can this condition be altered and women be brought back to form an integral part of the activities of the nation? First the notion of gentility which regards paid work for women as a miserable necessity for the poor and unfortunate must go, and secondly, there should be a great increase of the facilities for technical training of women. tion of London the provision by local authorities is very inadequate. At Manchester and Plymouth schools for dress-making, at Reading for domestic economy, at Birmingham for training children's nurses and at Brighton one will be started for laundry work, exhaust the list for the working classes.

In the training in evening schools or by vocational classes in secondary schools, the instruction tends to be confined to housecraft and needlework or dress-making, or on the other side to clerical work. This is only a small fraction of profitable occupations open to women and there should be increased facilities in training for the remainder. At the same time a necessary co-ordination will be wanted to bring girls and women who have been trained more easily into touch with openings for employment.

It has been pointed out very frequently that to employ the unemployed to produce the usual commodities does not really get rid of the difficulty, it merely shifts it on to other shoulders. Many mistakes were made at the beginning of the war by philanthropic but misguided people who only considered the particular cases under their immediate observation. For some obscure reason the Local Government Board made the same mistake in connexion with the Central Unemployed Body for London when dealing with women in its earlier days, but since last October the conditions have been much improved.

Clearly what is wanted here, as in other branches of national industry, is the creation and fostering of new trades and the training of the workers to take part in them. There are it is true many difficulties against anything of this kind, but if the energy, the money and the initiative spent in nationally unproductive directions were diverted into the right channels there would be a real increase of national prosperity and decrease of unemployment.

We are treading on old ground when we revert to rural industries. Kropotkin's "Fields, Factories and Workshops," and other works, including one of the most recent* show how much can be done by simple tools in the home or in small factories if the selling and distributing ends are properly looked after by people who understand them. There is rather too much tendency in some of these industries to make articles which are merely ornamental and not useful, and hence which require a market to be created for them at great trouble and expense. But there are many which can produce really useful articles or produce which are either usually imported or which come on the market in a somewhat different form.

Some experience for this country may be gained from Ireland, which had a Development Grant Act six years earlier, and where very good work has been done under extremely difficult conditions.

Of course all increased educational facilities and improved organisation mean money, and at the moment expenditure is being curtailed in every possible direction. But if the country can find millions a day for war to preserve its independence and status in the world, is it too much to hope that in the great re-organisation which must follow peace, something adequate may be devoted to directions so urgent and useful as those above mentioned?

UNEMPLOYMENT AMONG WOMEN.

[See also articles on dressmaking and other women's trades on pp. 58, and 53 to 56.]

In the November Gazette some information was given as to the effect of the war upon employment for women, and it is satisfactory to note that during the past four months there has been a gradual improvement, owing to the demand for women's labour in connection with the equipment of the new Army, especially as regards tailoring, shirts, boots, and leather work. The demand for women in certain trades, such as dressmaking, however, remains slack; but the situation has to some extent been relieved by the establishment of workrooms where women and girls are not only employed but are in many cases taught new trades.

The following notes are mainly based on information supplied through the Labour Exchanges:—

London.—In London the two headings which account for the largest figures on the live register of the Labour Exchanges are dressmakers and daily servants. During the month there was an improvement in employment among the latter class; the number of daily servants on the live registers fell between December 11th and January 15th by nearly 100 (from 1,751 to 1,661), and the vacancies notified increased by nearly 600 (from 919 to 1,500). Amongst dressmakers unemployment further increased during the month. The number of vacancies notified showed no increase, and there was an increase of 200 in the number of dressmakers on the registers (from 1,356 to 1,563).

Employment in the men's clothing, canvas, and leather trades and in other Army work still continues busy. In the ready-made costume, blouse, mantle making, etc., trades there is very little short time, as many firms are engaged on Government contracts. There were still a large number of women clerks unemployed, but the number on the registers decreased from 2·3 per cent. to 2·1 per cent. of the total in London during the month. A number of these are being trained in their own subjects and in domestic subjects in relief workrooms; the names of those being trained remain on the registers.

South-Eastern.—In the South-Eastern Division there is little unemployment—a fact largely due to the number of soldiers billeted in the division—women and girls who previously went out to work now having to stay at home. It is only amongst the net-menders of the East Coast fishing towns that employment is seriously affected. The straw hat trade at Luton, which for a time was seriously affected, has now started on its usual spring season, though it is not so busy as under normal conditions at this time of year.

South-Western.—In the South-Western Division dressmakers, daily servants, and lodging-house keepers have been to some extent affected by the war. The lace trade also was slack. In Bath and in Portsmouth the corset factory workers who were thrown out of work at the beginning of the war are now employed on making knapsacks for the Army.

West Midlands.—In the West Midlands there is still exceptional activity in many branches of the metal trades. There is much unemployment, however, amongst women employed in certain branches of the tackle-making trade in Redditch, especially rod finishers and fly dressers. The girls from the hook departments are likely to be absorbed by the local development in the manufacture of hosiery machine needles. The chainmakers at Cradley Heath are also suffering from unemployment. At Worcester the operatives in the glovemaking industry are working short time. There is still much short time in the pottery trades, especially amongst the decorators and the women employed in making the more expensive class of goods. In Walsall a considerable number of dressmakers and other unemployed women have been taken on in the lighter and less skilled branches of the leather industry.

East Midlands.—In the East Midlands unemployment in the lace industry is still serious. During the month ending January 15th only seven vacancies were notified to the Nottingham Labour Exchange, as against 51 last year. In Basford an endeavour was made to draft the lace menders into the hosiery trade, but they were not found to be suitable for the work. In Long Eaton it is probable that a new industry will be started for the manufacture of tapes, braids, etc., which will absorb an appreciable number of lace workers, who are well adapted to this class of work.

Yorkshire.—In Yorkshire women's employment is good. In the textile districts the burlers and menders remained unemployed for some time after the trade as a whole had recovered, as Army cloth is heavily milled, and consequently does not need to be mended. Now, however, they are fully employed or being rapidly absorbed. In Sheffield the women employed in the high-class silver and cutlery trades have been badly affected by the war.

North-Western.—The most important change in the North-Western industries has been the improvement in the cotton trade. This has diminished the movement of Lancashire cotton operatives into the woollen mills. Over 200 women went either into Yorkshire or into the Rochdale woollen mills. But with the recent improvement in the cotton industry a large proportion of these workers have returned, and it seems improbable that anything more can now be done in the way of transferring workers from the one trade to the other. The Macclesfield silk industry and fustian cutting were still on short time in January.

Northern.—In the Northern Division employment on the whole is good, excepting in Sunderland, where there is unemployment amongst dressmakers, clerks, and shop assistants. Ammunition works have absorbed large numbers of workpeople from other factories.

Scotland.—The fishing industry—and consequently netmaking—in the coast towns still remains severely affected. In Kilbirnie, however, the netmakers have gone into the textile mills employed on Government work. At Dunfermline and Cowdenbeath the linen industry is on short time. The cotton industry in Perth is busy. The woollen mills are very busy, though the burlers and darners are on short time in certain districts. Of the smaller trades, golf-ball making has been slack since the beginning of the war, and shows no signs of improvement. In Glasgow there is still unemployment amongst dressmakers and clerks.

Ireland.—The linen factories in Belfast are working short time, and the handkerchief trade, which improved before Christmas, is again depressed, hem-stitchers and embroiderers being the most seriously affected. Depression in the box-making trade follows as a necessary result from the slackness in the handkerchief trade. The collar trade is also slack, and this is only partly compensated for by activity in Army shirt making, the two trades being frequently carried on by the same manufacturers. The spring trade in blouse and mantle making promises to be normal. Dublin is in the same position as many other large towns; there is a shortage of power machinists, but unemployment amongst dressmakers.

UNEMPLOYED TYPISTS.

NEARLY 400 SITUATIONS FOUND FOR WOMEN AND GIRLS.

Owing to the closing of the Stock Exchange, and the fact that the war caused the complete stoppage of business for a large number of foreign agents, etc., in the City, a great many typists and women clerks were suddenly thrown out of employment last August, and many sad cases came under notice.

A register was opened by the National Patriotic Association at 32, St. Paul's-churchyard, in September, and through the kind offices of the chairman, Sir George Pragnell temporary work was found for those who had to house and clothe themselves. For instance, 35,000 flannel belts were made by 183 girls, the wages paid under this heading, at 3d. each, amounting to £437 10s. Sir George also started a new industry for the unemployed by turning old socks into mittens. Over 16,000 pairs have been given to the Fleet and the troops, the refugees, and wounded. More than £100 was paid to typists for the simple task of cutting off the old feet and sewing the remaining part so as to form a mitten.

Mr. Howard Williams also found work in the shape of shirt-making for a good number of girls. In all, 411 typists were registered, and the committee found suitable situations for 386 of them by the middle of February.

The business of making mittens out of old socks has now been taken over by the Queen's Unemployed Committee, with a large stock, and an initial order for 1000 pairs, whilst Sir George Pragnell continues to send (free of charge) a sample pair and particulars to those who wish to start making them amongst their own circle. The old feet can be sold at a good price, or sent to the troops to clean their guns with. Only thick socks are suitable for mittens, and these may be sent in any quantity (clean and carriage paid) to the manager, Contract Department, Queen's Central Committee, 138, Piccadilly, W.

MORE EMPLOYMENT FOR WOMEN.

320,000 FOUND WORK SINCE WAR BROKE OUT.

Mr. Donald Maclean, M.P., speaking at a conference on women's work, held in connection with the autumnal conference of the Congregational Union at Leeds yesterday, said the coming need for the services of women in munition factories, when provision could be made for their supervision and direction, could scarcely be too strongly emphasised.

The best course for women to take who wished to do munition work was to register at the nearest Labour Exchange. The advantages of this course in the national interests, as opposed to indiscriminate application to employers, were numerous. Most of all it assisted in enabling the Government to control and organise the total labour supply.

The Labour Exchanges already did a large amount of work in placing women in employment. From the outbreak of the war to the middle of September 1915 they had placed 320,000 women in employment from the ordinary register, and in addition nearly 6,000 were placed from the special register for offers of war service from women, which was opened last March.

In the morning the assembly discussed "The notes of the Evangel calling for emphasis in view of the special circumstances of the time."

Dr. J. Cman, of Cambridge, said they had to ask themselves whether their principles had not degenerated into mere prejudice. Their ecclesiastical rivalries seemed futile and un-Christian in face of that call to sacrifice in the spirit of comradeship which overleapt the barriers of creed and caste. After the war there would be the task of material succour. Much had been taken over by the State, but both at home and abroad there would be deep needs which the State could not touch.

TRAINING OF YOUNG GIRLS OUT OF EMPLOYMENT.

We have received the following letter from the Town Clerk of Hammersmith:—Town Hall, Hammersmith, W., 2nd February, 1915.—Sir,—The Women's Employment Sub-Committee of the Hammersmith Local Representative Committee have under consideration the desirability of promoting a scheme for dealing with young girls out of employment, by way of training and maintenance, as far as necessary, in dressmaking, blousemaking, millinery, cookery, laundry-work, mending clothes, household management, etc. The scheme will have a definitely educational purpose.

Before proceeding further with such a scheme, the Sub-Committee are desirous of ascertaining the number of girls of sixteen years of age and under residing in the borough who would be prepared to accept employment under the Sub-Committee if a special scheme of instruction was promoted for their benefit. In the case of wage-earning girls who were formerly supporting themselves or partly supporting the families to which they belong, who are unemployed through the war, a maintenance allowance of 4s. per week, with meals, would, in all probability, be made.

I am accordingly directed to request girls under 16 prepared to receive instruction of the kind indicated above, to register themselves forthwith at the Ward Committee Room of the ward in which they reside. For the information of intending applicants, I append a list of the Ward Committee Rooms, and a statement of the hours the same are open, viz.:—College Park, St. Peter's Church Room, Ponsard Road, N.W., no fixed hours; Wormholt, 286, Uxbridge Road, W., 12 noon to 1 p.m. and 7 to 9 p.m.; Latimer, 31, Bramley Road, W.; 5.30 to 6.30 p.m.; St. Stephen's, Public Baths (Scott's Road entrance), Lime Grove, W.; 11 to 12.30 daily and Wednesdays 6.30 to 9 p.m.; Starch Green, Victoria Hall, Becklow Road, Monday, Wednesday and Friday 9.30 to 11.30 a.m. and Thursday 7 to 9 p.m.; Ravenscourt, 292, King Street, W., 10 to 11 a.m. and 3 to 4 p.m. (except Saturday afternoons); Grove, Gladstone Club, Goldhawk Road, W., 7 to 9 p.m. and at certain hours during the day; Brook Green and St. Matthew's, St. Matthew's Parish Hall, Blythe Road, W., 11 a.m. to 1 p.m.; St. Paul's, 15, Queen Street, W., 10 a.m. to 12 noon; St. Peter's, Hampshire House Club, Hog Lane, King Street, W., no fixed hours.—Yours faithfully, Leslie Gordon (Town Clerk), Hon. Secretary.

WORKING GIRLS' FOLLY.

At a meeting of the Charity Organisation Society held this week to discuss unemployment among women, it was shown that there is very little serious unemployment now, and the real trouble may come after the war is over. It was interesting to hear that women are being largely employed by armament firms in shell-making, and that these women are mainly from the Potteries, where work is slack. The new secretary of the Society, Mr J. C. Pringle, incidentally referred to the visit he made to Leeds last Friday. He said he had seen a number of social workers in Leeds, who all agreed that the question of women's unemployment had hardly arisen. But he found girls in Leeds, in view of the joint earnings of the families, rather indifferent on the question of wages so long as they could enjoy themselves. The result was that they did not feel any incentive to make themselves skilled, and they changed their places and occupation very frequently.

Weekly Telegraph 17. 3. 15

Women's Work.

The account given by the Board of Trade of unemployment amongst women shows that it is now limited to comparatively a few occupations, and even in these the percentage is declining. The cotton industry was most seriously affected at the beginning of the war, but its condition has greatly improved. There are considerable numbers of cardroom workers still signing the vacant books for unemployment benefit under the emergency grant, especially in Bolton, but the number of signatures is declining, and this is true also of the other Lancashire cotton districts. The spells of stoppage of work have frequently been brief; what has passed for unemployment has often been a form of short time, firms working their people alternate weeks. Dressmakers, we are told, are benefiting by the spring trade, and the introduction of new fashions. Printing, book-binding, and the silk and collar trades are, however, to some extent feeling the war. In some areas billeting of soldiers has made an increased demand for service in domestic duties, while the high wages earned by men in busy parts of the country, such as the colliery districts, has made women in those areas unwilling to learn new technical trades.

READY-MADE DRESSES.

COUNTY COUNCIL SCHEME TO TRAIN WOMEN.

An interesting scheme has been prepared by the London County Council Education Committee to train unemployed dressmakers for the wholesale trade.

Inquiries made in trade circles indicate an expansion in the wholesale ready-made trade.

Already there are signs that definite action is being taken to secure foreign markets and capture some of the trade previously supplied from Germany and Austria.

In a report upon proposed classes, the Education Committee states that there seems to be a real possibility of deflecting a number of unemployed workers who were previously in the bespoke trade to the wholesale trade.

The experiment is suggested of a course of training in wholesale methods on factory lines.

A Unique Workroom

AN ORIGINAL METHOD OF TRAINING WOMEN.

By AMY B. BARNARD.

Among the numbers of workrooms started during the war to relieve unemployed women, Mrs. Spender Clay's is interesting for its original methods of organisation and for the suggestion it makes of a reasonable solution to the problem of the untrained woman.

Unlike other philanthropists, Mrs. Clay, who is the daughter of Mr. W. Waldorf Astor, and wife of Captain Spender Clay now at the Front, sought the advice and help of the woman manager of one of the big City Labour Exchanges.

In this way she obtained exact information as to the character of unemployment in the district, with the result that the very next morning destitute dressmakers, clerks, waitresses, and others were at work, all engaged through the Labour Exchange.

Some were skilled needlewomen; others, however, had to be taught to make the garments for which Mrs. Clay obtained orders. It was found desirable to classify the women into (1) beginners at 3d. an hour for hand-sewing and machine-learning, (2) improvers, 10s. a week, piece-workers at an average of 15s. to 16s. a week.

Returned to the Exchange.

These last are returned to the Labour Exchange directly they are able to enter the open market and compete with skilled machinists at trade rates.

Thus, though philanthropic in the beginning, the scheme is carried out on business lines. The scheme meets the long-felt need of training, the lack of which has made it impossible for the grown woman to enter a factory; in the briefest time possible she has learned an occupation which, so long as her fingers can work, will secure her a livelihood. If, on the other hand, while in the beginners' room she fails to pass the test of making a shirt, she is returned to the Labour Exchange and found unskilled work. Within a few days of opening the workroom more spacious premises had to be engaged, and the work has gone forward with uninterrupted success.

An Idea Discovered.

It is contended that in this experiment there has been discovered the idea of training not only for industrial work, but for business and professional occupations, in co-operation with the Board of Trade Labour Exchanges, which can gauge exactly the demand and supply for every occupation throughout the country. But this national, free, and convenient agency for employer and employee has not so far been appreciated as it should have been, nor utilised by the general public.

But it would be a mistake to suppose the scope of its work is confined to industrial

CHANGES IN RATES OF WAGES.—The month of February was marked by a strong upward movement in wages, due mainly to the concession of war bonuses and similar increases. The net effect of all the changes was an increase of nearly £18,000 per week in the wages of 154,000 workpeople, excluding increases to railway servants, Government employees, &c. The most important bodies of workpeople included in this total were 20,000 ironworkers in the Midlands, 12,350 blast-furnacemen, and iron and steel workers in West Scotland, 35,000 linen and jute workers at Dundee, and 50,100 dock labourers at Hull, Liverpool, Bristol, Glasgow and Leith.

TRADE DISPUTES.—The number of disputes beginning in February was 47, of which the most important was that involving nearly 8,000 engineers in the Clyde district. The total number of workpeople involved in all disputes in progress during the month was 31,060, as compared with 5,889 in January, 1915, and 62,943 in February, 1914. The estimated number of working days lost by disputes during the month was 208,600, as compared with 55,900 in January, 1915, and 827,300 in February, 1914.

CONCILIATION AND ARBITRATION.—Cases dealt with during February included the following:—Engineers, Clyde district; gas producermen, &c., in steel works, West of Scotland; woollen weavers, Huddersfield district; carters, Liverpool; plumbers, London; sheet metal workers, Bolton; glassworkers, Tutbury, Burton-on-Trent; and boot and shoe operatives at Rushden and Kettering.

LABOUR EXCHANGES.—The average weekly number of vacancies notified to all Labour Exchanges for the four weeks ended 12th February, 1915, was 34,006, as compared with 30,589 in the previous five weeks, and with 23,874 in the four weeks ended 13th February, 1914. The average weekly numbers of vacancies filled for the same periods were 24,966, 21,606, and 18,269 respectively.

EMPLOYMENT AMONG WOMEN IN FEBRUARY.

THE general state of employment amongst women has altered but little during the last month, but what changes have occurred have all been towards improved conditions.

In the cotton industry, which at the beginning of the war was one of the most seriously affected of all trades, employment, as will be seen from the article on p. 91, has improved. There are, however, considerable numbers of cardroom workers still signing the vacant books for unemployment benefit under the Emergency Grant, especially in Bolton, but the numbers of signatures are declining, and this is true also of the other Lancashire cotton districts. So considerable has the general improvement been during the last months that it is possible to say that there is at present practically no distress. The extent to which unemployment has caused distress amongst the cotton operatives is doubtless much modified by the fact that the spells of unemployment are frequently very short. It is common for firms to work alternate weeks, so that what passes for unemployment is in reality often a form of short time.

Short time was still very general in the linen industry, and employment in Ireland showed little change compared with a month ago; in Scotland some of the operatives have found work in other districts, and as a result there was rather more work for the remainder.

The pottery trade showed signs of improvement, and there has been a distinct revival during the last month amongst the pottery firms in the Burslem area.

In the lace industry employment was still bad but showed a distinct improvement compared with a month ago in every district.

At Nottingham, the centre of the industry, there was still much unemployment, but, with the exception of the plain net section, employment was better than last month. In the Basford area, also, in the curtain branch, there was some improvement, rather in the direction of more normal hours than less actual unemployment.

In spite of the abnormal condition of industry as a whole the normal seasonal changes are being felt in certain trades. Thus dressmakers are benefiting by the beginning of the spring trade and the introduction of new fashions. The Labour Exchange registrations for the United Kingdom during the four weeks ending February 12th were 2,857 as compared with 3,172 for the previous month, whilst the vacancies notified increased from 304 to 559. A corresponding decrease in the registrations and increase in the vacancies notified appears in the figures for London, which is, of course, the largest centre of the dressmaking trade. In spite of this improvement the demand for labour was still much less than is usual for the time of year, and dressmaking still remains amongst the trades most seriously affected by the war. Many dressmakers are finding employment on Army clothing, shirts, &c. The millinery trade in London is reported to have recovered to a great extent from the effects of the war.

Apart from the trades referred to above in which unemployment amongst women is a serious factor, unemployment or short time exists, although to a less serious extent, in many other industries, such as printing and bookbinding, silk, the collar trade, certain of the metal trades, and, with outworkers not engaged on Army clothing, in certain branches of the tailoring trade.

Even the trades which as a whole are working at a high pressure are not wholly exempt, and isolated examples of unemployment are to be found, which, however, in view of the general demand for labour, are presumably only temporary. Thus it has been reported that a certain large hosiery factory, which has been working on Government contracts, is putting off a number of women at present, owing to the difficulty of obtaining machine needles, which were made in Germany. Another case occurred of a firm of football boot manufacturers who have received a contract for Army boots, but owing to the fact that there is less work in an Army boot than in a football boot, a certain number of women have been dismissed. Such isolated cases cannot, of course, affect the general state of employment in the trades concerned; but they are of some interest as illustrating the variety of conditions and influences obtaining even in trades most immediately and deeply affected by the war. In spite of occurrences of this nature the pressure in the trades supplying the needs of the Army and Navy shows no signs of lessening

It is not, however, only the demand for labour that has altered, but there has also been in certain directions an independent change in the supply of labour. In districts where large detachments of soldiers are billeted the number of women desiring work has materially declined, as women who went out either for industrial or domestic work now find occupation at home; in many cases they even need additional help, and the two influences combined have in some districts resulted in the unusual state of affairs that the supply of charwomen is insufficient to meet the demand.

The high wages earned by men have also to some extent reacted on the supply of women's labour. The women who were thrown out of work at the beginning of the war in certain colliery districts, for example, are comparatively indifferent whether they obtain fresh employment or not, as the men's contribution to the family income has compensated for their own lack of wages. Under such circumstances it is obviously difficult to induce the women to learn any new trade or to move to districts where their labour would be really needed.

As regards the month of January, the Reichsarbeitsblatt states that "the improved conditions with regard to employment which were reported in previous months have, on the whole, been maintained in January. Some small changes for the worse were compensated for by partial improvements in employment in other branches.

"According to reports from individual undertakings d associations of employers in the various coal mining tricts, there was in January, as in the previous month, ery brisk demand for coal, in some degree even exceeding that of December. The production of pig iron ther increased. Various branches of the engineering des showed a still further improvement, principally ing to orders placed by the military authorities. On other hand, employment in the textile trades showed ne decline. In the building trades employment was out the same as in the previous month; building was actically at a standstill."

Returns from 309 industrial concerns showed a total of 3,278 workpeople (including 28,807 females) employed the last day of January, as compared with 334,906 ployed by the same firms on the corresponding day of nuary, 1914, a decrease of 81,628, or 24·4 per cent. is decline was almost entirely confined to males, and s principally due to men being called up for military vice. The decline in the number of persons employed s greatest in the glass and porcelain industry (37 per t.), chemical industry (36 per cent.), paper and nting (30 per cent.), mining, &c. (29 per cent.), wood l clothing industries (27 per cent.), the engineering, tal and electrical industries (21 per cent.).

GERMAN WAR MEASURES

OR CONSERVING SUPPLIES OF FOOD AND RAW MATERIALS.

TWEEN the date of the commencement of the war and end of last year the German Federal Council ed some thirty decrees in pursuance of powers ferred upon it by three laws enacted on the 4th gust, authorising (1) the fixing of maximum prices, the remission of import duties, and (3) the adoption economic measures generally.

Under the first of these laws maximum prices had, by end of the year, been fixed for wheat, barley, oats, beans, potatoes and potato spirit; for copper, nickel, minium, antimony and tin (with their alloys) ther crude or manufactured; for sulphate of monia; and for wool and woollen goods.

READY-MADE DRESSES.

COUNTY COUNCIL SCHEME TO TRAIN WOMEN.

An interesting scheme has been prepared by the London County Council Education Committee to train unemployed dressmakers for the wholesale trade.

Inquiries made in trade circles indicate an expansion in the wholesale ready-made trade.

Already there are signs that definite action is being taken to secure foreign markets and capture some of the trade previously supplied from Germany and Austria.

In a report upon proposed classes, the Education Committee states that there seems to be a real possibility of deflecting a number of unemployed workers who were previously in the bespoke trade to the wholesale trade.

The experiment is suggested of a course of training in wholesale methods on factory lines.

A Unique Workroom

AN ORIGINAL METHOD OF TRAINING WOMEN.

By AMY B. BARNARD.

Among the numbers of workrooms started during the war to relieve unemployed women, Mrs. Spender Clay's is interesting for its original methods of organisation and for the suggestion it makes of a reasonable solution to the problem of the untrained woman.

Unlike other philanthropists, Mrs. Clay, who is the daughter of Mr. W. Waldorf Astor, and wife of Captain Spender Clay now at the Front, sought the advice and help of the woman manager of one of the big City Labour Exchanges.

In this way she obtained exact information as to the character of unemployment in the district, with the result that the very next morning destitute dressmakers, clerks, waitresses, and others were at work, all engaged through the Labour Exchange.

Some were skilled needlewomen; others, however, had to be taught to make the garments for which Mrs. Clay obtained orders. It was found desirable to classify the women into (1) beginners at 3d. an hour for hand-sewing and machine-learning, (2) improvers, 10s. a week, piece-workers at an average of 15s. to 16s. a week.

Returned to the Exchange.

These last are returned to the Labour Exchange directly they are able to enter the open market and compete with skilled machinists at trade rates.

Thus, though philanthropic in the beginning, the scheme is carried out on business lines. The scheme meets the long-felt need of training, the lack of which has made it impossible for the grown woman to enter a factory; in the briefest time possible she has learned an occupation which, so long as her fingers can work, will secure her a livelihood. If, on the other hand, while in the beginners' room she fails to pass the test of making a shirt, she is returned to the Labour Exchange and found unskilled work. Within a few days of opening the workroom more spacious premises had to be engaged, and the work has gone forward with uninterrupted success.

An Idea Discovered.

It is contended that in this experiment there has been discovered the idea of training not only for industrial work, but for business and professional occupations, in co-operation with the Board of Trade Labour Exchanges, which can gauge exactly the demand and supply for every occupation throughout the country. But this national, free, and convenient agency for employer and employee has not so far been appreciated as it should have been, nor utilised by the general public.

But it would be a mistake to suppose the scope of its work is confined to industrial labour.

CHANGES IN RATES OF WAGES.—The month of February was marked by a strong upward movement in wages, due mainly to the concession of war bonuses and similar increases. The net effect of all the changes was an increase of nearly £18,000 per week in the wages of 154,000 workpeople, excluding increases to railway servants, Government employees, &c. The most important bodies of workpeople included in this total were 20,000 ironworkers in the Midlands, 12,350 blast-furnacemen, and iron and steel workers in West Scotland, 35,000 linen and jute workers at Dundee, and 50,100 dock labourers at Hull, Liverpool, Bristol, Glasgow and Leith.

TRADE DISPUTES.—The number of disputes beginning in February was 47, of which the most important was that involving nearly 8,000 engineers in the Clyde district. The total number of workpeople involved in all disputes in progress during the month was 31,060, as compared with 5,889 in January, 1915, and 62,943 in February, 1914. The estimated number of working days lost by disputes during the month was 208,600, as compared with 55,900 in January, 1915, and 827,300 in February, 1914.

CONCILIATION AND ARBITRATION.—Cases dealt with during February included the following:—Engineers, Clyde district; gas producermen, &c., in steel works, West of Scotland; woollen weavers, Huddersfield district; carters, Liverpool; plumbers, London; sheet metal workers, Bolton; glassworkers, Tutbury, Burton-on-Trent; and boot and shoe operatives at Rushden and Kettering.

LABOUR EXCHANGES.—The average weekly number of vacancies notified to all Labour Exchanges for the four weeks ended 12th February, 1915, was 34,006, as compared with 30,589 in the previous five weeks, and with 23,874 in the four weeks ended 13th February, 1914. The average weekly numbers of vacancies filled for the same periods were 24,966, 21,606, and 18,269 respectively.

EMPLOYMENT AMONG WOMEN IN FEBRUARY.

THE general state of employment amongst women has altered but little during the last month, but what changes have occurred have all been towards improved conditions.

In the cotton industry, which at the beginning of the war was one of the most seriously affected of all trades, employment, as will be seen from the article on p. 91, has improved. There are, however, considerable numbers of cardroom workers still signing the vacant books for unemployment benefit under the Emergency Grant, especially in Bolton, but the numbers of signatures are declining, and this is true also of the other Lancashire cotton districts. So considerable has the general improvement been during the last months that it is possible to say that there is at present practically no distress. The extent to which unemployment has caused distress amongst the cotton operatives is doubtless much modified by the fact that the spells of unemployment are frequently very short. It is common for firms to work alternate weeks, so that what passes for unemployment is in reality often a form of short time.

Short time was still very general in the linen industry, and employment in Ireland showed little change compared with a month ago; in Scotland some of the operatives have found work in other districts, and as a result there was rather more work for the remainder.

The pottery trade showed signs of improvement, and there has been a distinct revival during the last month amongst the pottery firms in the Burslem area.

In the lace industry employment was still bad but showed a distinct improvement compared with a month ago in every district.

654I/45

At Nottingham, the centre of the industry, there was still much unemployment, but, with the exception of the plain net section, employment was better than last month. In the Basford area, also, in the curtain branch, there was some improvement, rather in the direction of more normal hours than less actual unemployment.

In spite of the abnormal condition of industry as a whole the normal seasonal changes are being felt in certain trades. Thus dressmakers are benefiting by the beginning of the spring trade and the introduction of new fashions. The Labour Exchange registrations for the United Kingdom during the four weeks ending February 12th were 2,857 as compared with 3,172 for the previous month, whilst the vacancies notified increased from 304 to 559. A corresponding decrease in the registrations and increase in the vacancies notified appears in the figures for London, which is, of course, the largest centre of the dressmaking trade. In spite of this improvement the demand for labour was still much less than is usual for the time of year, and dressmaking still remains amongst the trades most seriously affected by the war. Many dressmakers are finding employment on Army clothing, shirts, &c. The millinery trade in London is reported to have recovered to a great extent from the effects of the war.

Apart from the trades referred to above in which unemployment amongst women is a serious factor, unemployment or short time exists, although to a less serious extent, in many other industries, such as printing and bookbinding, silk, the collar trade, certain of the metal trades, and, with outworkers not engaged on Army clothing, in certain branches of the tailoring trade.

Even the trades which as a whole are working at a high pressure are not wholly exempt, and isolated examples of unemployment are to be found, which, however, in view of the general demand for labour, are presumably only temporary. Thus it has been reported that a certain large hosiery factory, which has been working on Government contracts, is putting off a number of women at present, owing to the difficulty of obtaining machine needles, which were made in Germany. Another case occurred of a firm of football boot manufacturers who have received a contract for Army boots, but owing to the fact that there is less work in an Army boot than in a football boot, a certain number of women have been dismissed. Such isolated cases cannot, of course, affect the general state of employment in the trades concerned; but they are of some interest as illustrating the variety of conditions and influences obtaining even in trades most immediately and deeply affected by the war. In spite of occurrences of this nature the pressure in the trades supplying the needs of the Army and Navy shows no signs of lessening

It is not, however, only the demand for labour that has altered, but there has also been in certain directions an independent change in the supply of labour. In districts where large detachments of soldiers are billeted the number of women desiring work has materially declined, as women who went out either for industrial or domestic work now find occupation at home; in many cases they even need additional help, and the two influences combined have in some districts resulted in the unusual state of affairs that the supply of charwomen is insufficient to meet the demand.

The high wages earned by men have also to some extent reacted on the supply of women's labour. The women who were thrown out of work at the beginning of the war in certain colliery districts, for example, are comparatively indifferent whether they obtain fresh employment or not, as the men's contribution to the family income has compensated for their own lack of wages. Under such circumstances it is obviously difficult to induce the women to learn any new trade or to move to districts where their labour would be really needed.

WAR AND EMPLOYMENT.

On the whole the report of the Board of Trade on unemployment in the United Kingdom in February is not unsatisfactory. The report is based mainly on returns received from 24,000 industrial firms employing over 4,000,000 workpeople, or about 46 per cent. of the persons employed in private industrial concerns. It also deals with the state of employment in agricultural, commercial, and other occupations. While in September and October the contraction of the numbers employed among males exceeded the number known to have joined the forces, in December the position was reversed, and the numbers known to have joined the forces exceeded the contraction of the numbers employed. Thus by December, in lieu of a displacement of men previously employed, there was a replacement in employment of men or boys previously unemployed or unoccupied. By February the percentage joining the forces had risen to 15.4 per cent., while the reduction in the number of male workpeople had risen only to 11.8 per cent. The percentage of absorption into industry of unemployed or unoccupied men had thus increased to 3.6 per cent. This process of replacement does not imply that no employers have had to dismiss their workpeople; but that, after allowing for enlistment, the number of cases in which employes have been taken on is considerably in excess of the dismissals.

When account is taken of employment by the War Office and Admiralty it would appear that the number of persons who have found employment in industrial occupations in these and other ways who were not so occupied before the war, is about 250,000. The contraction in the number of women and girls employed is less than in December, but the fall is entirely due to the improvement in Lancashire, as the figures for the rest of the country show practically no change since December. As compared with July the reduction in the numbers employed was 1.5 per cent. in February, as against 3.2 per cent. in December, a result due to a marked improvement in the cotton industry. The statistics of short time for both sexes continues to show improvement. In many of the trades which are still on short time, as, for example, linen and pottery, the curtailment of hours is serious. In offices and shops there has been an increasing tendency to engage women to fill vacancies. The demand for domestic servants is in excess of the supply, a condition which, according to the report, shows that the tendency to economise in expenditure has not been carried so far as was anticipated in the early months of the war. In our view, the conclusion to be drawn from the shortage of domestic servants is that in other occupations the demand for female labour has increased. In the linen industry in Ulster short time reaches serious dimensions, and is certainly as bad as in December. The deficiency in the supply of flax and of flax seed, which has been accentuated by the freezing up of the port of Archangel, is responsible. The prospects of the trade in the immediate future are regarded by employes with some anxiety.

So far as agriculture is concerned, generally speaking farmers were managing to carry on with their reduced staff except that where labour of special skill was required it was impossible to fill the places of men who had joined the forces. Unless the farms are to be worked shorthanded, or means can be found to economise labour, some 80,000 additional permanent male labourers and 90,000 casuals will be required in the summer. In English counties which rely on the annual migration of Irish labour farmers are apprehensive that the ordinary influx will not occur this year in as large a volume as usual. The number of Irish migratory labourers has been rapidly dwindling in recent years, and this year there will be many alternative openings for labourers who normally go to England, and even a shortage in Ireland itself, for it is estimated that over 30,000 men have been called up or have enlisted from those employed in agriculture in Ireland. Taking the returns obtained from industrial concerns, they indicate that the percentage of employes known to have joined the forces up to and including February was 15.4 for the United Kingdom. In Ireland the percentage was 12.9, the only district providing a smaller percentage being Yorkshire, with 12.6. The highest percentage, 18.4, has been obtained from Scotland, while Wales has supplied 15.6. Over 56,000 of the railway employes of the United Kingdom have joined the forces.

UNEMPLOYMENT AMONG WOMEN.

To-day's issue of the "Board of Trade Labour Gazette" confirms the indications from various quarters that the tendency in regard to employment is still upward. A shortage of male labour is still reported in some industries, and "war trades" are, of course, booming. An increased scarcity of agricultural labour is reported. As far as wages are concerned, it is shown that. in addition to Government employees and railway servants, 154,000 workpeople have secured an advance of £18,000 per week. It is pleasing to see that the many efforts to deal with women's unemployment are steadily making themselves felt. The Charity Organisation Society has taken this matter in hand, and I am told that when some of the preliminary work incidental to transfer from one occupation to another is completed, excellent results will be shown. The Women's Horticultural Union has sent out a large number of women to act as head and assistant gardeners in the place of men who have gone to the war. At the Athenæum Club parlourmaids have been promoted to places vacated by menservants, and it is said that the experiment will soon be extended.

FEMALE LABOUR.

SHORTAGE AT DUNDEE MILLS.

The proposal that fisher girls and other workers whose occupation has been affected by the war might be found useful employment in the mills of Dundee has not yet taken definite form, although in many quarters the project is regarded as an excellent one.

Inquiry into the subject reveals the interesting fact that several hundred girls could be provided with work at the different mills. The shortage of female labour is due to a variety of causes, one being the stoppage of work by soldiers' wives since the institution of the separation allowances. Those women now find themselves comfortably provided for, and are no longer under the necessity of working for their living. The difficulty of the situation is also increased by the large volume of work which is at present pouring in upon the manufacturers, who would welcome an accession to the ranks of their operatives.

18.5.15

A good deal of attention is naturally being paid to the effect of war on women's work. As a matter of fact, whatever might have been expected, the effect so far appears to have produced an improvement in its general conditions. This is not at all surprising, considering the enormous numbers of men whom the war has called away from their employment. One particular case has attracted perhaps more attention than it strictly deserved, we mean that of the Athenæum Club, one of the most exclusive resorts of London clergy of the higher ranks and savants of all kinds. These eminent persons, having been deserted by almost their entire male waiting staff, who, being of military age, rightly considered that they might at last serve their country in a better way if they ceased to "only stand and wait," are now attended to by neat-handed waitresses, hitherto employed only to minister to lady visitors as parlourmaids. Thus it has happened that the Athenæum, of all men's clubs, has been the first to employ women servants, and according to one member at least the innovation has not been unpopular. The spring trade has produced a recovery in dressmaking and millinery, whilst for women clerks, who at first suffered severely, employment is now being found in many banks and other large concerns. A great deal of work has been found for women also in the districts where troops are billeted, so that not only have women ceased to go out to work, but they have needed assistance in their homes. In Nottingham a good deal of money must at present be earned in this way, and it might well pay women with initiative and a little cash to take some of the houses now empty for the extension of their hospitality. As the supply of male labour must be restricted long after the war, many tasks hitherto performed by men, but which women are as capable of fulfilling, will no doubt be allotted to them.

OTHER CLOTHING TRADES.

DRESSMAKING AND MILLINERY.

Returns from retail firms in London, chiefly in the West End, employing 1,899 dressmakers in the week ended 20th February, 1915, showed a decrease of 6·0 per cent. in the number employed compared with a month ago, and of 23·1 per cent. compared with a year ago: 52 per cent. of the workpeople averaged three-quarter time or less during the month, as compared with 53 per cent. during January.

Court and private dressmakers, employing 1,016 workpeople in the week ended 20th February, showed an increase of 11·6 per cent. in the number employed compared with a month ago, and a decrease of 34·3 per cent. compared with a year ago; about 53 per cent. of the workpeople were on three-quarter time or less during the month, as compared with 60 per cent. during January. In a considerable number of firms the workers were engaged on Army work.

With milliners in the West End employment showed a seasonal improvement, and was said to have recovered to some extent from the effects of the war; it was, however, somewhat worse than a year ago; 5 per cent. of the workpeople worked reduced hours during the month, as compared with 28 per cent. during January.

MANTLE, COSTUME, BLOUSE, ETC., TRADES.

In the wholesale mantle, costume, blouse, underclothing and millinery trades, firms in London employing 6,060 workpeople on their premises (in addition to outworkers) in the week ended 20th February showed an increase of 8·8 per cent. in the number employed compared with a month ago, and a decrease of 6·2 per cent. compared with a year ago. The improvement shown was common to all the branches in this section. In the costume and mantle branches employment was hampered by lack of materials. Several firms reported a scarcity of labour.

At Manchester firms employing 4,936 workpeople in the week ended 20th February in the costume, skirt, blouse, mantle, etc., trades showed an increase of 2·8 per cent. in the number employed compared with a month ago, and of 6·3 per cent. compared with a year ago. Employment was on the whole good. Many of the workers were engaged on Army contracts, and there was an improvement in the ordinary trade during the month. A scarcity of women and girls was reported by several firms. About 27 per cent. of the workpeople were on overtime during February, as compared with 22 per cent. a month ago.

At Glasgow employment in the mantle, costume, and underclothing trades continued fair and was better than a month ago, though not so good as a year ago. Returns from firms employing 1,600 workpeople in the week ended 20th February showed an increase of 4·4 per cent. in the number employed compared with a month ago, and a decrease of 5·0 per cent. compared with a year ago. About 6 per cent. of the workpeople were on short time during the month, as compared with 7 per cent. a month ago, while 11 per cent. were on overtime during February.

CORSET TRADE.

Returns from corset manufacturers, mainly in England, employing 5,703 workpeople in their factories (in addition to outworkers) in the week ended February 20th, showed an increase of 1·8 per cent. in the number employed compared with a month ago, and a decrease of 7·1 per cent. compared with a year ago. Employment was good, and about 12 per cent. of the workpeople covered by the returns worked overtime during the month. The delay of goods at docks and on railways was said to be causing some inconvenience.

SHIRT AND COLLAR TRADE.

Returns from shirt and collar manufacturers in England, Scotland and Ireland, employing 3,923 workpeople in their factories (in addition to outworkers) and paying £2,730 in wages to indoor and outdoor workers, showed an increase of 5·2 per cent. in the amount of wages paid compared with a month ago, and a decrease of 6·8 per cent. compared with a year ago. About 19 per cent. of the workpeople were on short time during the month, as compared with 16 per cent. a month ago. Employment was good with firms employed on Army shirts, but bad with collar workers, and only moderate in the white shirt branch.

Charwomen and the Poor.

There is now little unemployment among working women, but a lasting result of the scarcity of work at the beginning of the war is the development of the Home Helps scheme, initiated by the Queen's Women's Employment Fund, to train women workers for emergency work in poor homes. For months a large number of women served an apprenticeship either in motherless homes or where the mother was temporarily incapacitated, and the result was so satisfactory that a suitable society has taken the whole scheme in hand. It is now trying to raise a £1,000 fund to subsidise various local centres which will promote the scheme. Manchester already has a similar scheme, and can probably match the numerous instances quoted by the London Committee of Home Helps who have proved angels in the house. We are told of women who would have been in extremity had not the kindly help swooped down upon the scene, brought order out of chaos, charmed the unruly children into good behaviour, cooked meals for the harassed husband, and set the mother's feverish mind at rest.

EFFECT ON PURCHASES.

REPORTS FROM THE FIRMS.

The opinions of the heads of many leading firms were taken yesterday on the state of the dress trade, the kind of costumes and gowns that are being bought, and the need for keeping on workers who could not possibly do other work. It was said everywhere that the majority had been buying, not extravagantly, but in keeping with the restrained spirit of the times; but that no one had been purchasing last year's gowns or asking for last year's styles. Tailor-mades, afternoon gowns, and three-piece frocks in quiet forms of the new models are selling well, but few evening gowns are being bought.

"Boom" in Tailor-mades.

The managing director of a very well known and high-class drapery firm, who asked to be anonymous, declared that the new fashions had arisen because the spirit of the times was more modest than that which had inspired the slashed and tight skirt. Women who did not care to buy new gowns were taking their tight skirts to dressmakers to have them enlarged. Business was "booming" in tailor-mades, and the ready-made, copied from French models, has come to stay. There was actually at the moment a deficiency of tailors: the dressmakers, on the contrary, were very hard hit. Other opinions recorded were as follows:—

Lucile.—So far from any outcry being raised at the new fashions their moderation and reticence is commended. Of the popular models the short skirt to the top of the boots is the one most frequently chosen. In regard to the workers, the question of adapting them to national service was considered when the crisis was most acute, but it was decided that it was not feasible to transfer women whose fingers were accustomed to the finest work to the making of body-belts: and as many as possible were kept on at work suited to their skill. Their future is largely in the hands of women who must have new clothes.

Doucillet.—Our clients are ordering very well and so far from having to face the difficulties of previous changes of fashion, when women thought a good deal before choosing, the new styles, shown in simple models, are meeting with instant favour. Those who do not like the short skirts have them long. Low shoes to match gowns will be worn in the summer. The full skirts are being carried out in crêpe de chine or soft taffeta, which subsides into unobtrusive folds and does not suggest great width.

No Sudden Change.

Paquin.—So far from the new fashions being in any way extreme, Mme. Paquin has for the past 18 months been widening skirts and leading up to the present change. The accusation that the change is a sudden one to make women buy new clothes can be disproved from the models which arrived a few hours ago from Paris. We have as far as possible kept the workers on, at great loss to the firm, but find it impossible to put them to any contract work, as if they once lost their fine touch they could never recover it.

Marshall and Snelgrove.—As to the accusation of the correspondent of The Times who accused the drapery houses of changing the fashions to suit themselves, we are the servants of the public, and give them what they want. The change happened last autumn, only no one noticed it. So far from there being any reluctance or any criticism of the wider and shorter skirt, we find our tailor-made department busier than last year on these new styles. As to the lady who cried out that people should be patriotic and dress in tweeds and friezes, she failed to remember that every bit of wool should go to the making of khaki. We kept on all our workers during the war.

Peter Robinson.—The letters in The Times have been written from the point of view that the majority of women are habitually extravagant. There are a few women who buy dresses galore, and a reduction of their expenditure would do them no harm, but the majority never buy more than they need. The very women who are now complaining about the width of skirts and the beauty of the passing "hobble," cried out, and with some justice, at the immodesty of the tight skirt. We find that women are pleased with the new width. There is no need for extremes.

Debay and Toms.—We find our dress business not so good as before the war, and from our point of view it is a great pity that the change of fashion should have come just now. A lot of ready-made stock has been rendered practically valueless, as all our customers who are purchasing dresses wish them to be after the new mode. The main demand is for tailor-mades. There is difficulty in obtaining the material, particularly blue serges and covert coatings, owing to the factories being so largely occupied with Government orders. We have done our best to keep all our workpeople going and that has chiefly been in connexion with Government work.

Hanover.—The livelihood of an army of expert workwomen who are unskilled for [illegible] them to be after the new mode. The main demand is for tailor-mades. There is difficulty in obtaining the material, particularly blue serges and covert coatings, owing to the factories being so largely occupied with Government orders. We have done our best to keep all our workpeople going and that has chiefly been in connexion with Government work.

HARRODS.—The livelihood of an army of expert needlewomen who are unsuited for rougher work must be seriously affected should a wave of drastic economy in dress be encouraged to spread. The tendency towards the wider skirt is an unmixed blessing for all. It gives the wearer greater freedom and must tend towards better physical health. To the manufacturer it provides the opportunity for creating and selling normal quantities of material, while it revives the erstwhile ruined business of petticoat making.

TRADE NOW NEARLY NORMAL.

JOHN BARKER AND CO. (LIMITED).—Our customers all ask for the new mode, which if modified to suit the taste of a well-dressed English woman is exceedingly beautiful. The autumn trade was very poor in the costume departments, but it is now nearly normal. The new fashion will largely help the petticoat trade and underclothing business generally.

DICKINS AND JONES.—The change of fashion has come at the right time. After six months of humdrum style many ladies are only too happy to have a reasonable excuse for buying new gowns. We find that the new fashion is being well received. Thanks to the change, our costume trade is brisk, in fact busier than it was this time last year. Our workpeople are fully occupied, and we are finding it necessary to employ additional hands. People, however, are not going in for quite such luxurious garments as in previous seasons.

FENWICK (LIMITED).—Our dressmaking business at the present time is normal, and we consider that the improvement is due to the extreme change in the fashion. Our regular clientèle, which had been loth to spend money during the early stages of the war, are now ordering freely, and practically all show a marked preference for the new mode. During the autumn we were compelled to put a number of hands on short time, but we are now able to employ them all for full time.

SELFRIDGE AND CO. (LIMITED).—We find that business is particularly active in our costume department, and this we attribute very largely to the very sensible fashion change which has marked the style of skirts for this present season. Although we are selling quite a number of the extremely wide style, yet the great bulk of business is being done on those of more moderate cut.

J. SHOOLBRED AND CO. (LIMITED).—We have more people in our factories making articles of dress than we had at the outbreak of the war. This state of things, however, we attribute mainly to work which has been put into our hands by various institutions. Business for private orders shows a falling-off, mostly in evening gowns. There has, however, been no reduction of the staff in the department affected. The coming change in fashions is considered important as a help to the revival of business.

HARVEY NICHOLS AND CO. (LIMITED).—We are very busy in our costume departments, both for gowns and tailor-mades. People are certainly ordering more carefully and rather less individually, but the returns for this year are normal. We have made up to the present no change in our staff, and all are here except the young men who have gone to the front.

F. GORRINGE (LIMITED).—We have kept our full staff in employment since the outbreak of the war. On the whole we consider that business has not been unsatisfactory.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE TIMES.

Sir,—Those who criticize the new fashion, and for some reason or other would like us to believe that it is a dressmaker's conspiracy, must, indeed, be thoroughly ignorant of what might be called the psychology of clothes. Indeed, at the root of every new fashion reasons are always to be found—reasonable reasons. It has been printed over and over again since the war began that a new France has appeared—a strong, moral, and serious France. Do you think that the ladies of that new France could or would wear the dresses of the women of the frivolous France of a year ago? The new dresses are modest, sober—they reflect in every fold the new serious spirit; they were needed, that is why they exist. Perhaps some light persons regret the naked lines of the defunct fashion, but no real lady does. And those who know never complain of the money spent, for they are well aware that through many channels the gold they put in circulation reaches the wives and daughters of the men who are fighting for the sacred cause of the Allies, and these working girls and wives, doing in their humble way the most they can to keep up the economical life of their country, put into every stitch and into every garment of this new fashion many serious thoughts that may never have entered the mind of our light-headed critics.

Yours faithfully, E. NICOLLE.

'AR'S EFFECT ON INDUSTRY.

MORE WOMEN & GIRLS WANTED.

RECORDS OF ENLISTMENTS IN TRADES AND PROFESSIONS.

"We can't get enough women," seems to be the cry of employers in many industries. This demand for the labour of women and girls began in December and has continued throughout January and February, according to Sir H. Llewellyn Smith.

The Board of Trade's permanent secretary supplies the introductory statement to a report of the Board on employment during February. This report is based mainly on returns received from 24,000 firms employing over four million workers —about 45 per cent. of the total employed in private industrial concerns.

Last December the number of employed persons in the United Kingdom was 3.2 per cent. lower than in the month before the war (July). In February it was only 1.5 per cent. lower. This improvement is due to the better condition of the cotton trade. Short time—19.4 per cent. worse in December than in July—was only 12.6 worse in February; while overtime had increased a fraction—from 10.8 to 10.9.

MORE MEN "ABSORBED."

Another interesting fact revealed in Sir H. Llewellyn Smith's survey is the reduction in the number of male workers since last July, and the percentage joining the forces.

There was a fall of 11.8 per cent. in February, compared with last July's figures for male employment; but the percentage joining the forces was 15.4. That shows a disparity of 3.6, which means that to that extent men and boys unemployed in July have now found work or "have been absorbed" in industrial occupations perhaps previously crowded.

As Sir H. Llewellyn Smith points out, the percentages given as "joining the Forces" do not by any means represent the number of recruits enlisted. They relate solely to men known by their employers to have left industrial employment for the purpose of joining the forces. They do not include recruits who enlisted while unemployed, or whose occupation was not industrial. On the other hand, they include reservists besides new recruits.

The report contains figures of employment in various trades in December and February compared with before the war, and also the percentages of men in those trades known to have joined the forces.

Among the trades showing the highest rises in percentage of men joining the colours, from December to February, are the following:—

Coal and other mines, 13.7 to 17.2.
Building, 12.2 to 14.7.
Hosiery, 7.5 to 12.3.
Iron and steel, 13.9 to 16.1.
Food, 13.4 to 16.1.
Cycle, motor, carriage and wagon building, 14.3 to 16.9.
Tinplate, 8.3 to 11.0.

CONCERT SINGERS SUFFER.

In the professions, music and art are among the most seriously affected by the war. Orchestral players at theatres and actors and actresses are almost normally employed; but concert singers, depending on irregular engagements, and music teachers have had their earnings considerably reduced.

Enlistment in the forces has accentuated the difficulty felt for some year of obtaining an adequate supply of elementary school teachers. Up to the end of December 13.5 per cent. of the male teachers in schools under public authorities had joined the forces.

In London the proportion has risen in February to 14.8 per cent., while an additional 3.3 per cent. had obtained permission to join. But for every male teacher of the country there are already three women teachers employed, and the difficulty is naturally being met in the main by an increase in the number of women.

The situation in higher education and the legal profession has been mitigated by the exceptionally large numbers who have joined the forces, while the medical profession has been depleted for Army service.

CLERKS AND SHOP ASSISTANTS.

In commercial occupations the proportion who have enlisted is still well in excess of the average in the country as a whole. Employment is still slack among Stock Exchange clerks, in spite of the enlistment of 35 per cent. of those employed in July.

In the case of banks and insurance companies in London, the proportion is between 30 and 35 per cent., while other commercial employees show about 20 per cent. in the forces. Employers are filling places, to some extent, by taking on men

The enlistment figure among shop assistants exceeds 16 per cent. The demand for domestic servants still appears to be in excess of the supply, a condition which shows that the tendency to economise in expenditure has not been carried so far as was anticipated in the early months of the war.

LADY CABDRIVER.

Sunday Outings for Wounded Soldiers.

Miss Hay, whose photograph appeared in "The Daily News" yesterday, has demonstrated one way in which women can undertake men's work during the present crisis. She had the happy idea of approaching the National Motor Cab Company for the loan of a cab which could be used for giving some of our wounded soldiers a drive. The company willingly agreed, and paid the running expenses. Miss Hay told a "Daily News" representative yesterday that her experiences were very interesting. She has only driven on Sunday, and has been out twice.

In response to an inquiry as to the attitude of the average male driver towards her venture, Miss Hay said: "No; they were very good. They did not exercise their usual wit at my expense, while the policemen were all smiles and never found the least fault with my pace.

"On the first Sunday I felt just a trifle strange. I had three wounded soldiers from Charing Cross Hospital with me, and they seemed to be enjoying the air in Richmond Park immensely, when my engine failed through being overheated. A passing taxi-driver was the Good Samaritan, however. He pulled up, put the matter right, and refused anything for his trouble."

Miss Hay thinks there are many other lady drivers who could do as she has done, and she suggests that some of the other companies might lend a cab for the same purpose.

EMPLOYMENT IN WAR TIME.

250,000 Absorbed in Industrial Pursuits.

REMARKABLE RECOVERY IN FEBRUARY.

A Board of Trade return on the state of unemployment last month in the United Kingdom shows a remarkable improvement since the early days of the war.

The main features of the report, which is based chiefly on returns received from 24,000 industrial firms employing over 4,000,000 workpeople (about 46 per cent. of the persons employed), are the recovery of the cotton trade to an almost normal extent, and the increasing shortage of labour in trades where there was already an unsatisfied demand.

Taking the numbers employed in July, 1914, as 100, the state of employment since the outbreak of the war is shown in the following percentages in respect to workers still on full time:

	Males.	Females.
July	100	100
September	60.2	53.5
October	66.9	61.9
December	65.8	75.0

The workers on overtime have increased from 3.6 in September to 13.8 in February in the case of males, and from 2.1 to 10.9 in the case of females.

To supply the shortage caused by enlistment it is estimated in the report that about 250,000 people have found employment in industrial pursuits who were not so occupied before the war.

Shortage of Women Workers.

In the case of women and girls there is now in some industries an actual shortage.

In the clothing trades the figures for February are rather better than in December. There is more overtime and less short time than two months ago, and there is clear evidence that, in tailoring, women have been employed in considerable numbers to fill the places of men who have enlisted. In this branch and in shirtmaking a very large proportion of the trade is engaged on Government work. Dressmaking is still very depressed, and is about the same as in December. This trade is now probably the chief source of industrial unemployment among women, though the difficulty has been mitigated to a considerable extent by transference to other clothing trades.

It is interesting to note that the demand for domestic servants still appears to be in excess of the supply, a condition which shows that the tendency to economise in expenditure has not been carried so far as was anticipated in the early months of the war.

Dearth of Farm Labour.

Returns from a number of farmers throughout England and Wales show that the number of male persons in regular employment at the end of January, 1915, was 12.4 per cent. less than in January, 1914. As 15.6 per cent. of the persons employed a year ago have joined the naval or military forces, it is evident that farmers have been able to fill the places of one in five of those who have joined. These men have been replaced from the ranks of casuals or from among those who get fairly continuous work in the summer, but are unemployed, or do other than agricultural work, in the winter.

To bring the labour supply up to normal dimensions will require an addition of a further 4 per cent. of regular farm hands to the 12.4 per cent. required to make good the existing contraction.

"In other words," the report states, "it may be estimated that unless the farms are to work shorthanded, or means can be found to economise labour, some 80,000 additional permanent male labourers and 90,000 casuals will be required in the summer (June). A certain proportion of the latter will, no doubt, be available as usual, but in view of the present state of the labour market farmers are doubtful of their ability to find all this additional male labour. Steps are therefore being taken to meet the difficulties in various ways."

EMPLOYMENT BOOM.

170,000 FARM LABOURERS WILL BE WANTED.

SLUMP IN MUSIC AND ART.

Based mainly on returns received from 24,000 industrial firms employing over 4,000,000 workpeople, the Board of Trade yesterday issued a report dealing with the state of employment during February.

The improvement in the demand for women and girls has continued, and in some industries there is now an actual shortage.

When account is taken of employment by the War Office and Admiralty, it appears that the number of persons who have found employment in industrial occupations who were not so occupied before the war is about 250,000.

The metal, engineering, and shipbuilding trades show in a marked degree all the evidences of increased pressure—less short time, more overtime, and in most cases an increase in the actual numbers employed.

AT CHOCOLATE FACTORIES.

As regards the shipbuilding and engineering trades workpeople have been attracted from various sources, while a considerable transference has taken place from firms with private orders to firms engaged on Government work.

But, in spite of overtime and some increase in the numbers employed, the demand for labour in all parts of the country is still unsatisfied.

Women employed in chocolate factories have been particularly affected by the fact that fancy products which require a good deal of attention in packing have been largely displaced by bulk goods for troops at the front.

The fish-carrying trade is in a worse condition than usual owing to the dislocation of the fishing industry on the East Coast in the autumn.

It may be estimated that unless farms are to work shorthanded, or means can be found to economise labour, some 80,000 additional permanent male labourers and 90,000 casuals will be required in the summer.

ACTING ALMOST NORMAL.

As regards the professions, music and art are among the most seriously affected.

Orchestral players at theatres and actors and actresses are almost normally employed, but concert singers depending on irregular engagements, and music teachers have had their earnings very considerably reduced.

In commercial occupations the proportion who have enlisted is still well in excess of the average in the country as a whole.

Employment is still slack among Stock Exchange clerks in spite of the enlistment of 35 per cent. of those employed in July.

In the case of banks and insurance companies in London, the proportion is between 20 and 25 per cent., while other commercial employees show about 20 per cent. in the forces.

WANTED—DOMESTICS.

Employers are filling places, to some extent, by taking on men, but returns show an increasing tendency to engage women to fill vacancies, a tendency which is also observable, though to a less extent, in the case of shopkeepers.

The enlistment figure among shop assistants exceeds 16 per cent.

The demand for domestic servants still appears to be in excess of the supply, a condition which shows that the tendency to economise in expenditure has not been carried so far as was anticipated in the early months of the war.

STATE OF EMPLOYMENT.

CONTINUED IMPROVEMENT.

ONLY THE BUILDING TRADES NOW DEPRESSED.

The Board of Trade yesterday issued a report on the state of employment in the United Kingdom in February, in continuation of the previous reports, dealing respectively with October and December. The report is based mainly on returns received from 24,000 industrial firms employing over 4,000,000 workpeople, about 46 per cent. of the persons employed in private industrial concerns. It also deals with the state of employment in agricultural, commercial and other occupations. Mr. H. Llewellyn Smith, in an introductory memorandum, points out that the main features of the report are the recovery of the cotton trade to an almost normal condition, and the increasing shortage of labour in trades where previously there was already an unsatisfied demand. In December the reduction in the number of male workpeople in industrial employment, as compared with July, was 10.9 per cent., while the percentage joining the Forces up to that date was 13.3 per cent. There had thus, up to that time, been an absorption into industry of men and boys unemployed or unoccupied in July amounting to 2.4 per cent. By February the percentage joining the Forces had risen to 15.4 per cent., while the reduction in the number of male workpeople had risen only to 11.8 per cent. The percentage of absorption into industry of unemployed or unoccupied men had thus increased to 3.6 per cent. This tendency is emphasised by the figures for short time and overtime. The number of male workpeople on short time has been reduced from 10.5 per cent. in December to 6.0 per cent. in February, while the percentage on overtime has risen from 12.8 per cent. to 13.8 per cent. The improvement in the demand for women and girls, which was noted in December, has continued and in some industries there is now an actual shortage. As compared with July, the reduction in the numbers employed was 1.5 per cent. in February, as against 3.2 per cent. in December, a result due to a marked improvement in the cotton industry. Short time has fallen from 19.4 per cent. to 12.6 per cent., while overtime has increased from 10.8 per cent. to 10.9 per cent. The percentages given above as "joining the Forces" do not by any means represent the number of recruits enlisted. They relate solely to men known by their employers to have left industrial employment for the purpose of joining the Forces. Thus, they do not include any recruits who enlisted while unemployed or whose occupation was not industrial. On the other hand, they include reservists besides new recruits.

ENGINEERING AND HOSIERY.

In industries in which there is a marked shortage of male labour, and in which it has been necessary to attract men from outside—a group which includes most of the trades concerned with the supply of armaments and military equipment—the shortage of labour noted in December has been accentuated. The percentage of replacement ranges from 3.4 in mining to 18.5 in leather goods, and 18.6 in chemicals (including explosives). In nearly all the trades there is a very large amount of overtime, amounting in shipbuilding to 44.5 per cent. In none of them, except saw-milling, is there any considerable amount of short time. The metal, engineering and shipbuilding industries show in a marked degree all the evidences of increased pressure—less short time, more overtime and in most cases an increase in the actual numbers employed. The home and export trades in finished iron and steel products are very brisk. Large contracts for constructional steel have been placed for the allied Governments, while orders are coming formard more freely from neutral countries. As regards the shipbuilding and engineering trades, workpeople have been attracted from various sources, while a considerable transference has taken place from firms with private orders to firms engaged on Government work. But, in spite of overtime and some increase in the numbers employed, the demand for labour in all parts of the country is still unsatisfied. In the hosiery trade the pressure of work is apparently slightly less acute than in December, for the overtime has fallen from about 20 per cent. in December to about 14 per cent. in February. The same is true of the woollen and worsted trades, which have apparently reached their zenith, for the numbers employed and the proportion of overtime are both slightly less than in December. In the woollen trade the situation is almost entirely governed by Army contracts. The hosiery trade is, to a much smaller extent, dependent on Government orders, and its activity has to a considerable degree been caused by briskness in the home or neutral markets consequent upon the stoppage of imports from Germany. In both cases, however, the slight slackening of activity now noticed is attributable to a reduction in the number of fresh Government orders.

TRADES IN A NORMAL STATE.

The trades which show a fairly normal condition as regards male labour are the clothing, linen, hemp and jute, paper and printing, china, pottery and glass, cycle, motor, carriage, wagon building, and cotton trades. In the clothing trades the figures for February are rather better than in December. There is more overtime and less short time than two months ago, and there is [illegible]

Women and Unemployment.

The weekly returns concerning unemployment in the insured and the uninsured trades continue to tell of remarkably satisfactory conditions in the former and quite the reverse in the latter industries. While the insured trades have an unemployment percentage of 1·40 as compared with 1·66 a month ago, the uninsured on the registers of the Labour Exchanges continue to increase. Analysis shows that the position in regard to men in these trades continues to improve a little, but the melancholy story of the unemployed woman shows, apparently, no signs of a brighter chapter. The figures before me show that the week found several thousands more on the registers than was the case a month ago. The problem remains the most obstinate one which, as far as our social economy is concerned, the war has produced.

stoppage of imports from Germany. In both cases, however, the slight slackening of activity now noticed is attributable to a reduction in the number of fresh Government orders.

This trade is now probably the chief source of industrial unemployment among women, though the difficulty has been mitigated to a considerable extent by transference to other clothing trades. The printing trade is about the same as in December, a noteworthy feature being that while an appreciable number of both men and women are on short time, others are working overtime. In the pottery trade there are fewer persons employed than in December, though, on the whole, there is rather less short time. Prosperity in other trades has, in fact, induced workpeople to seek other, and at the moment more remunerative, employment, and latterly, when orders have come to hand, employers have, in certain cases, actually been handicapped by a shortage of certain kinds of skilled labour. Employment in the glass trade is also rather worse than in December. The jute industry has undergone a remarkable revival in the last few months, owing to improved trade with the East, and to an increase in the volume of Government contracts. But, while short time has been entirely eliminated, the lack of both male and female labour has prevented any increase in the numbers employed. The cycle, motor, etc., trades have been affected by the withdrawal of men in large numbers into Government service, both civilian and military. The ordinary private trade declined very heavily immediately after the outbreak of the war, but there has never been any serious unemployment owing to the great demand for men with any kind of mechanical skill. The Government orders which subsequently came to the trade have compelled the factories with whom they were placed to work overtime. The cotton trade has had a remarkable recovery. From many of the cotton towns it is reported that there is a shortage of male labour, particularly of piecers and of various classes of labour in the winding rooms. The general improvement is partly due to a recovery of trade with the East, but is in the main caused by an increase in the number of Government orders placed in Lancashire. These orders have to a very large extent involved the substitution of coarser for finer yarn, a change which has involved some adjustment in wages and working conditions. The recovery has now extended to weaving centres, and though at the time of the investigation there was still a considerable amount of short time, it was anticipated that by the end of the month the industry in the most important weaving towns would be practically normal.

INDUSTRIES STILL DEPRESSED.

The industries in which depression is still pronounced are the building and associated trades. The figures for the building trades show that there were fewer persons employed by private employers in February than in December and that the contraction, as compared with July, amounted to no less than 23 per cent. The early part of the year is always a slack time for the trade, the amount of employment available usually falling some 3 to 4 per cent. below the summer level. The dimensions of the present reduction are, however, abnormal, and the serious condition of the ordinary building industry is shown by the fact that the value of the building plans approved by local authorities during the last quarter of 1914 was 30.7 per cent. less than the value of plans approved in the corresponding quarter of 1913. But these conditions have failed to cause distress, for the unemployment statistics show that the number of men in the building trade in receipt of unemployment benefit was actually less in February than in July, and was only about half the number in receipt of benefit at this time last year.

WOMEN AND THEIR WORK.

Highland Home Industries.

As a result of Scottish Flag Day, Mrs Cairns Maclachlan has been able to arrange for the purchase and distribution of much of the work done in the Western Islands and to alleviate a certain amount of distress, though so great are the needs of the people that Glasgow's help is only a drop in the bucket. The tweed used is the real homespun, and home-dyed, and purchases have been made from Lewis, Harris, North Uist, and South Benbecula, Eriskay, &c.

The Dressmaking Trade.

In the dressmaking trade conditions so far have not been nearly so bad as it was at one time feared that they would be. Even the private dressmakers have managed to keep things going. A committee was formed to deal privately with the smaller businesses and to give them work which would at least make it possible for the employees to continue to earn a minimum wage, and, as will be seen from the above paragraph, a certain amount of emergency work has been placed. The need for it has not, however, been great, and I have actually known of instances in which offers of work outside the usual line of the business were refused, both proprietors and workwomen preferring short time and less pay to a change of employment. For the next month or two there is every prospect that dressmaking houses of all sorts will be kept very busy, and the complete change in styles will help business. Should the war continue, however, there will be a different tale to tell when the winter season comes.

WORK FOR WOMEN.

GOVERNMENT CONTRIBUTION SUSPENDED.

Glasgow Record 10.4.15

At a special meeting of the Glasgow Distress Committee, the situation of unemployed women was discussed in the light of the Local Government Board's inability to make further contribution towards the expenditure of the Distress Committee in the matter of providing work for women under the scheme of workrooms established by the Scottish Council for Women's Trades.

In these circumstances it had been considered expedient by the chairman of the Distress Committee to suspend the women on 3rd inst., and this action was unanimously homologated by the sub-committee, who also recommended that a deputation be sent to the Local Government Board to press the claims of women's work, and failing assistance from the Board that direct appeal be made to the Treasury.

At the meeting yesterday the recommendation of the sub-committee was adopted, with the addition of a proposal by Mr. Nicol to remit the matter to the Executive Committee to report on a policy to be adopted by the Distress Committee in regard to work for women, and also to report on suitable schemes whereby such a policy could be carried out.

In the course of the discussion, Miss Irwin pointed out that 68 women had to be suspended last Saturday. In a number of cases, the circumstances of these women were very urgent. Many had been out of work for a considerable time; some of them were living in lodgings and entirely dependent on their own earnings.

She did not think the Local Government Board had acted with conscious and deliberate harshness in the matter, but were under a serious misapprehension as to the extent of unemployment amongst women at the present time.

WOMEN AND THE PROFESSIONS.

WAR'S EFFECT UPON SOCIAL TRADITION.

The annual meeting of the Governors of the Yorkshire Loan Training Fund was held yesterday afternoon in the Mayor's Reception Room, Dewsbury Town Hall, Mr. M. E. Sadler, Vice-Chancellor of the University of Leeds, presiding over a large attendance. Reference was made to the absence of the hon. secretary, Mr. Bernard Wilson, who has accepted a commission in the army, and the meeting accepted with regret the intimation that Mrs. D'Arcy Wyvill had resigned from the Committee.

The report of the hon. secretary to the Administrative Committee (Mrs. E. M. Scattergood) alluded to the efforts made during the year with regard to defaulters, and stated that the war had hit women coaches at the Universities particularly hard. They seemed to rely principally upon foreign students, and these had not returned to English colleges, while English students, also much reduced in numbers, preferred to be coached by men. Although £800 was the sum allotted for 1914 the Committee had actually made grants amounting to £977. There had been 28 new applicants who asked for fees costing £2,172. Of these nine applications were declined, two were withdrawn, 14 were granted help, and three were waiting for the new supply of money for the present year. Very encouraging accounts continued to come in of many of the adopted children of the Fund.

An interesting review of the work of the Fund was given by Mrs. Frank Gott, who commented upon the immense demand there was at present for skilled women's work, and said that anybody who had to do with medical charities knew the difficulty there was of finding doctors. Everywhere they were applying to women's hospitals for women, but they were not to be had. Other skilled work was also required. So many skilled clerks and book-keepers had gone in Leeds, for instance, that there was a great run on women clerks, who were becoming increasingly scarce.

The Chairman, discussing the future of the fund, said the danger was that the awful calamity of the war might make a breach in one of the most precious social traditions in the world by taking so many lives of those who represented a very fine conception of living. It was a tragic thing that all the great wars in history had resulted in the weakening of the class most influential in the country before the war began. The wars of the Roses swept away the old aristocracy, and the long-continued struggle of the 17th century put an end to the finest side of the merchant tradition in the municipalities for a time, and also gravely injured the class of those responsible for country life. The Napoleonic wars practically meant the end of the older governing classes in England, and one wondered what might be the result of the present struggle. Therefore must the country depend all the more upon the women who belonged to that great social tradition in being able to carry on into the future what was really the finest in principle and purpose. The training fund would be one of the means of helping them to do that, not only in their private life but in the service of the community, in education, and in medicine. It would be a good game to take Jane Austen's novels and guess what profession the various ladies therein would have applied for allowances to train in. He doubted whether there was any case in the whole of those novels of any one deliberately training themselves for a salaried position, and one knew how much tragic sorrow came on many families in consequence. The training fund was a great Yorkshire institution. It enabled one to become competent, and the knowledge that one was competent was a great part of the foundation of self-respect.

It was resolved that the sum of £600 be supplied to the Committee for their use in making loans to applicants during the present year, and the meeting concluded with a vote of thanks to Mr. Sadler for presiding, and to the Mayoress (Miss Walker) for her hospitality.

UNEMPLOYED WOMEN.

Dundee Scheme Vetoed by L.G.B.

NEED FOR EMERGENCY WORK.

Dundee Distress Committee discussed at considerable length yesterday the question of the Emergency Workroom in Castle Street for unemployed women which has been carried on by the local Advisory Board of the Scottish Council for Women's Trades. Some time ago a deputation from the Distress Committee interviewed the Local Government Board for the purpose of securing a grant from the Board to cover the loss that was being incurred, but the Board refused to sanction the scheme. The Board's decision was considered by the Sub-Committee of the Distress Committee, which agreed meantime to acquiesce in the decision of the Local Government Board, but reserved the right to raise the matter again in event of unemployment amongst women becoming more serious.

Mr J. H. Martin, who presided at yesterday's meeting, said they were met to deal with the minute of the Sub-Committee, and a deputation from the Advisory Board of the Scottish Council wished to be heard.

In the course of the discussion as to whether the meeting should dispose of the Sub-Committee's minute before hearing the deputation, Canon Turner said he did not think they should humbly acquiesce in the decision of the Local Government Board seeing they had 65 cases of unemployment amongst women.

The Chairman replied that they had had 70 cases registered, but never more than 30 at a time. Some of the 70 had registered more than once. When the Sub-Committee met there were only 25 on the list, and he ventured to remark that he doubted if more than 12 would be suitable for the Distress Committee. On inquiry they found there were only 11, and 7 of them got situations. They were certainly disappointed at the decision of the Local Government Board, but they had to acquiesce seeing their case was so slender. However, they reserved the right to raise the question again.

Bailie High said there should not be a man or woman out of employment just now.

The Chairman—I would not go so far as that.

It was agreed to hear the deputation.

Mr James Thomson, the Chairman of the Advisory Board, said their belief that there was a good deal of unemployment in the town was amply proved. They had 198 applications of women wholly or partially unemployed. Ten were idle on account of the war, and were sent to the Prince of Wales' Fund Committee; work was got for 70, and 10 were sent to the factories. But a number, owing to physical incapacity or age, were unable to go to the factories. Sixty-nine were cases such as the Distress Committee would deal with, so that the Emergency Workroom was really doing Distress Committee work.

Work for Soldiers and Sailors.

Mrs J. T. Thomson, Secretary of the Advisory Board, said they had been doing work for the soldiers and sailors and the Belgian refugees.

Mr J. Armstrong Barry held that it was not necessary that there should be a large number of unemployed before anything could be done. The machinery of the Act could be put in operation even for one case. If the Distress Committee had no money they should tell the Local Government Board that they must be put in a position to put the Act in force.

Bailie High suggested that the women should go into domestic service, but Mrs Thomson replied that they could not ask a mother to leave her children. She also said it was difficult to get enough charing.

Bailie High—They will get 10s or 12s 6d a week for going messages.

Mrs Thomson—But these are not girls. They are women.

Bailie High—It does not matter. They will get more money.

The Chairman said they all admired the work of the Advisory Board, but they had FISHER GIRLS.

PROPOSAL TO EMPLOY THEM IN DUNDEE.

With the view of providing more operatives for Dundee jute mills and factories steps have been taken to ascertain if it would not be possible to bring to the city several hundreds of fisher girls from the coast towns on the North-East of Scotland. Owing to the practical stoppage of the fishing by the war many of these girls are unable to get employment, and it has been suggested that Dundee might provide for some of them.

In spite of the war bonus the Dundee employers are unable to get all the workers they could employ, and some time ago inquiries were made as to the possibility of getting some of the Belgian refugees to come to the city, but owing to Dundee being a prohibited area this was found to be impracticable.

No such difficulty arises in connection with the fisher girls. A number of the employers are quite ready to accept the girls provided they would undertake to remain for a specific time—probably during the period of the war. The proposal is in its initial stages yet, and it is not known if the girls would care to try mill life, which would be so different from what they are accustomed to, although it is believed that some of them would be willing to do so, especially in view of the fact that their usual work is at present impossible.

EMPLOYMENT OF WOMEN.

Among women in Scotland the industrial conditions have shown so marked an improvement of late that it has been found possible, temporarily at least, to close a number of the workrooms financed by the Queen's "Work for Women" Fund, the women having returned to their former employment, or found openings along new lines.

The Board of Trade reports show that employment in Scotland generally is at present abnormally good, and that amongst women workers there is now no distress arising from the war, except in trades and occupations connected with (1) fisheries, (2) lodging-houses, (3) calico-printing and dyeing, (4) printing. For the women who were employed in these occupations, especially those connected with the fisheries, new openings may be found in the special "War Service for Women," for which the Board of Trade have invited registration. For female labour in agriculture there is likely to be in Scotland a very considerable demand.

BURGH DISTRESS COMMITTEE'S PROVISION.

A meeting of the Burgh of Aberdeen Committee under the Unemployed Workmen Act, 1905, was held in the Town House last night, when Councillor A. B. Young presided.

The Chairman congratulated the members on their attendances throughout the year. They had all attended the meetings very regularly. The secretary had pointed out to him that last year there were printed 50 copies of the financial statement for circulation amongst subscribers, and although there were very few subscribers this year it might be necessary to print 50 copies.

This course was agreed to.

They would require to make application to the Town Council for a further grant. The rate account was something like £6 7s 0½d. He suggested that they should ask £50, and this was also agreed to.

CONTROL OF WASTE PAPER FACTORY.

The report of the meeting of the Works Sub-Committee held on May 19 stated:—With reference to the remit made to the sub-committee to report as to the expediency of the Distress Committee taking over from the Relief Committee the control and management of the waste paper factory, the following report was submitted and adopted:—"In pursuance of a remit made by the Works Sub-Committee at a meeting held in the Town House on April 14, with regard to the expediency of the Distress Committee again assuming control of the waste paper factory, the sub-committee beg to report that they had a meeting on May 12, at which, after various arguments for and against the proposal were made, it was resolved to recommend to the Works Sub-Committee that the Distress Committee should, for the reason hereinafter stated, relieve the Aberdeen Unemployed Relief Committee of the waste paper factory, take it under their control, and conduct it as formerly under their auspices. The reasons urged for the transference of the control of the waste paper factory were:—The work of sorting paper was non-competitive and such as could be undertaken by relief cases from the Distress Committee. IMPROVED CONDITIONS.

SINCE the outbreak of the war, says an official correspondent, much has been said and written as to the unemployment resulting from the abnormal conditions of war time and the best methods of meeting the difficulty. Whilst there has undoubtedly been a considerable dislocation of ordinary industries, certain trades have been largely affected, unemployment arising from the war has, in Scotland at any rate, been less than was anticipated. Such distress as has arisen has chiefly existed among women workers, who are largely employed in those luxury-trades which were the first to suffer under the stress of war-economy, and who have not had the outlet of enlistment which has relieved the pressure of unemployment amongst men.

To combat the distress among women workers in Scotland, valuable work has been done by the Scottish Committee on Women's Employment and the Local Relief Committee in various parts of the country. Workrooms, financed by the Queen's "Work for Women" Fund, and supervised by the Local Committees, have been maintained during the winter months in many of the principal industrial centres, and help has also been given by the organisation of training schemes for younger girls, the provision of knitting for the women of the fishing districts and Outer Islands, and by the placing out of small contracts amongst firms which would otherwise have had to dismiss their workers. Of late, however, there has been a steady improvement in the industrial market throughout Scotland, and so marked has been this improvement in the employment of women, that it has been found possible, temporarily at least, to close a number of the workrooms, the women having returned to their former employment or found openings along new lines.

It is gratifying to learn from the Board of Trade reports that employment in Scotland generally is at present abnormally good, and that amongst women workers there is now no distress arising from the war except in trades and occupations connected with (1) fisheries; (2) lodging-houses; (3) calico printing and dyeing; (4) printing. For the women who were employed in these occupations, especially those connected with the fisheries, new openings may be found in the "Special War Service for Women," for which the Board of Trade have invited registration. For female labour in agriculture there is likely to be in Scotland a very considerable demand. It is therefore evident that applications for war relief from the trades affected by the war, and still more from any other trades, demand particularly careful investigation. Such unemployment as exists in the unaffected trades is often no more than normal, and in no way arises from the war. There are always in every trade a certain number of persons out of employment at any given time, as well as a certain smaller number who are more or less habitually unemployed, whose cases are met in normal times by charity or by distress committees or by Poor Law. These do not belong to that class of average steady worker displaced by the large fluctuations due to the war, for whom the Relief Fund was meant, and for whom it will be needed again at a future date.

Sub-Committee's minute before hearing the deputation, Canon Turner said he did not think they should humbly acquiesce in the decision of the Local Government Board seeing they had 65 cases of unemployment amongst women.

The reasons urged for the transference of the control of the waste paper factory were:—The work of sorting paper was non-competitive and such as could be undertaken by relief cases from the Distress Committee. There was meantime a large number of unemployed women in the city who could with advantage be engaged in this work. The Distress Committee, unlike the Relief Committee, were not so much concerned with making the project a paying one as with finding employment for suitable applicants for relief work, and consequently they could afford to extend the operations of the factory. The present overtime working of those engaged at the factory would be discontinued and a larger number of persons would participate in the wages to be earned. With greater dispatch in the sorting of the paper, it would be possible to extend the operations of the factory, and so give greater employment to the men engaged in collecting the paper. The sub-committee further recommend that the Distress Committee should not limit its sphere of operations to the waste paper factory, but that every effort should be made to find suitable employment for such persons as may meantime be out of work."

Mr M'Intyre moved that the Works Committee be instructed to take over the waste paper factory as from May 15 last, the end of the financial year. He thought the time had come for that action to help the unemployed women.

A voice—And help them off the cars—(laughter).

Mr M'Intyre always thought that something ought to be done in that direction, and he moved accordingly.

Mr J. C. Mitchell, in seconding, said he thought that was very desirable. A great many women required employment.

Mr George asked if it would not be wise to make application to the Local Government Board before taking it back.

The Chairman said that if they thought the committee was of the unanimous opinion that they should take over the waste paper factory he did not think they ought to force the Local Government Board, taking into consideration that there were so many women out of employment.

Mr M'Intyre said it was really heartrending when they could do nothing for a woman that was out of work and who used to get a day's work among the fish. These women could all sort waste paper.

Mr M'Intyre's motion was accordingly agreed to.

ARE WOMEN OUT OF WORK?

The Effect of the War upon the Industrial Employment of Women

It is safe to say that not one in a million anticipated last August that after nine months of a European war there would be a severe shortage of labour, and that far from there being any widespread unemployment or distress, manufacturers would be unable to cope with the orders they had in hand. And yet such is the case. At the present moment manufacturers in all parts of the country are complaining that they are unable to obtain either male or female labour, and that even urgent Government orders are delayed on this account. It has taken some little time to arrive at this state of affairs, and it will be interesting to trace the course of industrial employment, especially in the case of women, since the outbreak of the war.

A Period of Panic

The immediate effect of the outbreak of war on the industry of this country was very disastrous. A period of panic reigned, and employers dismissed their workpeople right and left. In a number of cases, however, employers refused to do this, in the interests of their workers, and when trade recovered and labour became scarce, these manufacturers reaped considerable benefit from their public-spirited action. The employers who took this course were the exception, and a sufficient number of workers lost their employment for August to be a month of acute distress. No figures are available which show the actual extent of the consequent unemployment, but we do know that in London, for example, the number of the children on the school-feeding registers went up by leaps and bounds, and that many families only kept body and soul together by pawning their belongings and using up their small savings. Since that time, however, the situation has progressively improved. We are not at the moment concerned with the effect of the war on male employment, and it will suffice to say that, as far as men are concerned, by the middle of October the amount of unemployment had fallen to the normal pre-war level, and that since that time the demand for male labour has been more and more insistent; in fact, during the past winter the amount of unemployment has been less than during any winter hitherto recorded, and, with few exceptions, all the industries of this country have suffered from a shortage of male labour.

Worse for Women than Men

Turning our attention to the question of female employment, we find, especially during the earlier months of the war, a very different state of affairs from that already described for men. During the whole of the autumn and winter there was a considerable amount of unemployment among women—for two very good reasons. First, and most important, there is no question of enlistment for women, and in their case, therefore, the labour market was not thinned by a large number joining the colours. Secondly, women are much more generally engaged in the subsidiary and "luxury" trades, such as dressmaking (which have been heavily hit by the war), than in the metal trades, which have benefited so much from the presence of enormous Government orders. Thus, out of every 1,000 women who were actually in employment in July, only 916 were still in employment during September, 938 during October, 968 during December; while by February the number had risen to 984. The April figures are not yet available, but, judging by the difficulty which is experienced on all hands in obtaining female labour, especially in industrial districts, it is more than probable that by now the employment of women has reached and passed the normal pre-war level. The magnitude of the problem is probably more easily appreciated if we follow the course of the actual numbers of women who have thus been displaced from industry. During September—for the whole of the United Kingdom—this number amounted to 200,000, during October to about 149,000, during December to about 77,000; and while by February the number had fallen to 36,000.

What is "Unemployment"?

The term "women displaced from industry" has purposely been used instead of "women unemployed," because, during the last two or three months especially, the two terms are not synonymous. For example, a very considerable number of the 36,000 women employed in July, but not employed in February, were not unemployed in the ordinary sense of the word, but had left their industrial work of their own free will. Of these women a large number were engaged in their own homes looking after troops who were billeted upon them, and so were unable and unwilling to go out to work. At Luton, to take only one of many examples, the straw hat manufacturers were unable to obtain anything like their normal supply of female labour from this cause. There has been, and still is, another and more important reason why married women, at any rate, are at present unwilling to work in factories, especially where the wages are poor and the conditions bad. Many married women who in peace time pass a life of incessant toil in order to support, or partially support, their families, are now in receipt of separation allowances, in some cases larger than the ordinary total earnings of themselves and their husbands. The opportunity has at last arisen for these women to do what they have been told to do so often—they are now staying at home and minding the baby—with the result that certain industries are suffering considerably from the lack of their labour. Dundee is a town with a very unenviable reputation. It is noted for the low wages paid to all workers, and for the large percentage of married women working away from their homes. Recruiting in Dundee has been very active, and now hundreds of women, who usually work to support their homes, are in receipt of separation allowances, and are refusing to work any longer in the Dundee jute and linen factories. These two industries have been for the last three months seriously handicapped by the consequent shortage of labour, and are now learning to their cost that only stern necessity forced the women of Dundee in past years to work for the low wages formerly paid. The case of the jute and linen industries of Dundee has been quoted as an example of what is now happening all over the country to industries where wages are low, and which depend for their labour on married women.

Woman's Opportunity Now

We see then that at present, owing to the shortage of male labour, the demand for women's labour is exceptionally good, and that at the same time a number of women, normally engaged in industry, are unwilling to continue with their work unless conditions are made more attractive. Now is the opportunity for women to insist upon a living wage. Instead of the usual surplus, the demand for women's labour is very much in excess of the supply, and this state of affairs is likely to continue, at any rate for the next few months.

It is essential that women should realise that their labour is now in great demand, and that there is not a surplus upon which employers can draw in order to replace any who demand decent conditions. If only they will be firm and work together, they can now negotiate successfully for adequate wages.

EDINBURGH IN WAR TIME.

INDUSTRY AND SHOPPING.

(BY AN OBSERVER.)

The war has brought in its train many social and industrial changes. Edinburgh, however, has been but slightly affected by developments in business. Thousands of men have gone to the front; but in the majority of cases there has been a readjustment of staffs. In a minority of instances women have replaced men. Women have gone in large numbers to the Post Office, and in smaller ratio to banks, insurance companies, grocers' shops, and other lines. A great many women have been placed by the Labour Exchange. It is the experience of Miss Skinner, the lady superintendent there, that in their new spheres in Edinburgh women have transferred themselves from one line to another; it is migration rather than reinforcement from the war register. After some years of what may have been a dull business career, the war has impelled women to try a new adventure. Although situations have only, perhaps, been guaranteed for the period of the war, women have come forward to make the experiment, trusting, doubtless, that there will be considerable readjustments after the war such as a possible shortage of male labour and a better appreciation of the value of women's work. The Edinburgh girl, too, has invaded the boy's sphere, and between 30 and 40 are in training as telegraph messengers.

A New Line.

With the wider demand for women workers there has come increased rates of pay, and the calculated rise is about 20 per cent. There is practically no unemployment for women, and one industry has brightened up, notably the dress trade. Tailoring has improved, the output of officers' uniforms in Edinburgh being very large, and numbers of dressmakers have gone over to tailoring work. Although there is work abroad for women, few Edinburgh girls have gone from home—a different state of affairs from other parts of the country. The war has given Edinburgh a new "industry"—the making of flags, the miniature paper reproductions which net in thousands of pounds for charity. When one buys a flag on the Saturdays he is not only helping France, Belgium, Poland, the Red Cross Society, or the Royal Scots, but also the local girl worker. She is on piece-work in this business, and smart hands may earn close on £1 a week. All the girls in the relief workshops have now found employment, but they will look back to their winter's work with pleasant feelings, for they were well treated.

Busy Men.

As for men, the only industry in Edinburgh which has suffered from under employment for a considerable time has been the printing trade. It is doubtful whether the men, afraid of severing the link with their firms, have shown enough enterprise. Many crafts, particularly painting, have sent large numbers of recruits to the Army, and this has resulted in the men who have remained being well employed. In the past three months at the Labour Exchange perhaps only a couple of painters have signed for unemployment benefit. As for Edinburgh joiners, Mr Matson and his staff have sent them all over the land—from Staffordshire to the Orkneys. Working on Government contracts, they have almost rivalled the engineers in their earnings, and as they have often been located where it was almost impossible to spend money, the joiners' banking account has appreciably increased. Edinburgh watchmakers have probably never been busier. For instance, there has been a tremendous demand for wristlet watches. Watchmakers have also been wanted in torpedo factories. Then, men of quick ideas who could adapt their businesses to some form of "war work"—the scope of which is tremendously wide—have profited materially. Others, again, who have remained in a rut, as it were, have not prospered.

Experience Tells.

A good many professional men and a good type of working man have come forward to register at the Labour Exchange for munition work; but the lack of openings has prevented the acceptance of patriotic offers, and so, too, has the want of skill. The munitions worker cannot be made in a day. Edinburgh has suffered doubtless through not being a great manufacturing area at a time like this, and the situation may be improved if a munitions factory is set up, of which there is a report. In the city, however, there are skilled mechanics, who, if brought together from their various employers, would do valuable work for the State. It may be said that where there has been drafting of labour the worker who told was not the newcomer, but the steady hand. Thus women factory workers in England have proved to be quite dependable in new spheres, quickly becoming accustomed to novel conditions. On the other hand, the chances are that many women taken from the war register would quickly succumb to strain and unusual hours.

Unemployment Nominal

The most gratifying feature of the Labour Exchange, which has steadily increased its value to the country in the war time, is the fact that workers can be so readily placed. Unemployment

THE WAR, WOMEN, AND EMPLOYMENT

Interim Report of the Central Committee on Women's Employment. Cd. 7848. 1915. 4½d.

Report to the Board of Trade on the State of Employment in the United Kingdom in February, 1915. Cd. 7850. 1915. 2½d.

When the war broke out industry was shaken from top to bottom, and the volume of unemployment began to grow alarmingly, especially among women. Soon, however, the situation changed; male workers, broadly speaking, found no difficulty in obtaining work; indeed, as the months passed, what difficulty there was in some large industries was on the side of the employers, who did not know where to turn for men. In the case of women the recovery was much slower and much less complete, so that six months after the outbreak of war female workers were not by any means all fully employed. The different effects of the war on employment among men and women are due to two causes. In the first place, we have no Amazons in the British Army; it is recruited entirely from men. In February, 1915, over 15 per cent. of the males employed in July are known to have enlisted. In the second place, women have been unfortunate enough to choose, or to be driven into, those kinds of employment which have suffered greatly as a consequence of the war. The girls and women engaged in the woollen and worsted trade, in hosiery making, in the manufacture of leather goods, and in the lighter kinds of engineering work are pretty fully employed and often working overtime. But in the paper and printing, linen, jute and hemp, cotton, and china trades the case is different; to say nothing of dressmakers and charwomen and the females employed in small industries, such as the chain-makers of Cradley Heath. Yet, on the whole, employment in industrial occupations has consistently improved. Of the women employed last July in industry, 53·5 per cent. were working full time last September; in February the percentage was given provisionally as 75. In September only 2·1 per cent. were working overtime, whilst in February the proportion had reached 10·9 per cent. Between September and February the proportion on short time had sunk from 36 per cent. to 12·6 per cent., and the net displacement of labour from 8·4 to 1·5 per cent. It should be remembered, however, that since December the improvement which has taken place has been due entirely to the recovery of the Lancashire cotton industry; so that the state of affairs is not so rosy as it appears. Especially is this seen to be the case when we bear in mind that the pressure in some trades has been so great that married women who had withdrawn from wage-earning work have returned to it and obscured the contraction which has taken place in some other industries. The position of many women workers, therefore, in spite of a steady improvement in several directions, remains one of some gravity.

It was to meet the serious state of affairs in the early days of the war that the Central Committee on Women's Employment was appointed last August, and though, of course, there are other important factors, the Committee can take some credit for the real improvement which has taken place. Its business is "to consider, and from time to time report upon, schemes for the provision of work for women and girls unemployed on account of the war." A committee of the ordinary kind might not yet have got beyond a preliminary survey. But this Committee of women appears to have given itself powers to get things done, and it lays down on the opening page of its Interim Report its "main executive functions"! These are considered under two headings, the employment of women under economic conditions and relief work. With regard to the first, the Committee has endeavoured to assist the proper distribution of work available for women in normal industry and to facilitate the provision of alternative employment (not entailing loss of skill) for skilled women workers displaced owing to the war, and also to promote new openings for permanent employment under economic conditions. So far as relief work is concerned, the Committee has laid down lines on which it would approve schemes for providing work for unemployed women, considered and approved schemes, and itself promoted and administered experimental schemes for providing work.

Through its special Contracts Department the Committee endeavoured to increase the number of firms and workers participating in the supply of Government requirements, and has itself gone into business by undertaking orders for certain articles from the Government and other sources: which orders have been carried out by firms adversely affected by the war and in workshops organised by the Committee on a self-supporting basis. For example, in order to carry out an order for 75,000 woollen body-belts, forming part of the "Queen's gift to the troops," it bought wool for firms whose hands were on short time, and for the making of the belts it used the services of workers in other firms similarly situated. The Committee had its attention drawn to the large number of firms which were too small or had too little equipment and experience to tender for War Office orders, especially when the goods were of a kind

EDINBURGH IN WAR TIME.

INDUSTRY AND SHOPPING.

(BY AN OBSERVER.)

The war has brought in its train many social and industrial changes. Edinburgh, however, has been but slightly affected by developments in business. Thousands of men have gone to the front; but in the majority of cases there has been a readjustment of staffs. In a minority of instances women have replaced men. Women have gone in large numbers to the Post Office, and in smaller ratio to banks, insurance companies, grocers' shops, and other lines. A great many women have been placed by the Labour Exchange. It is the experience of Miss Skinner, the lady superintendent there, that in their new spheres in Edinburgh women have transferred themselves from one line to another; it is migration rather than reinforcement from the war register. After some years of what may have been a dull business career, the war has impelled women to try a new adventure. Although situations have only, perhaps, been guaranteed for the period of the war, women have come forward to make the experiment, trusting, doubtless, that there will be considerable readjustments after the war such as a possible shortage of male labour and a better appreciation of the value of women's work. The Edinburgh girl, too, has invaded the boy's sphere, and between 30 and 40 are in training as telegraph messengers.

A New Line.

With the wider demand for women workers there has come increased rates of pay, and the calculated rise is about 20 per cent. There is practically no unemployment for women, and one industry has brightened up, notably the dress trade. Tailoring has improved, the output of officers' uniforms in Edinburgh being very large, and numbers of dressmakers have gone over to tailoring work. Although there is work abroad for women, few Edinburgh girls have gone from home—a different state of affairs from other parts of the country. The war has given Edinburgh a new "industry"—the making of flags, the miniature paper reproductions which net in thousands of pounds for charity. When one buys a flag on the Saturdays he is not only helping France, Belgium, Poland, the Red Cross Society, or the Royal Scots, but also the local girl worker. She is on piece-work in this business, and smart hands may earn close on £1 a week. All the girls in the relief workshops have now found employment, but they will look back to their winter's work with pleasant feelings, for they were well treated.

Busy Men.

As for men, the only industry in Edinburgh which has suffered from under employment for a considerable time has been the printing trade. It is doubtful whether the men, afraid of severing the link with their firms, have shown enough enterprise. Many crafts, particularly painting, have sent large numbers of recruits to the Army, and this has resulted in the men who have remained being well employed. In the past three months at the Labour Exchange perhaps only a couple of painters have signed for unemployment benefit. As for Edinburgh joiners, Mr Matson and his staff have sent them all over the land—from Staffordshire to the Orkneys. Working on Government contracts, they have almost rivalled the engineers in their earnings, and as they have often been located where it was almost impossible to spend money, the joiners' banking account has appreciably increased. Edinburgh watchmakers have probably never been busier. For instance, there has been a tremendous demand for wristlet watches. Watchmakers have also been wanted in torpedo factories. Then, men of quick ideas who could adapt their businesses to some form of "war work"—the scope of which is tremendously wide—have profited materially. Others, again, who have remained in a rut, as it were, have not prospered.

Experience Tells.

A good many professional men and a good type of working man have come forward to register at the Labour Exchange for munition work; but the lack of openings has prevented the acceptance of patriotic offers, and so, too, has the want of skill. The munitions worker cannot be made in a day. Edinburgh has suffered doubtless through not being a great manufacturing area at a time like this, and the situation may be improved if a munitions factory is set up, of which there is a report. In the city, however, there are skilled mechanics, who, if brought together from their various employers, would do valuable work for the State. It may be said that where there has been drafting of labour the worker who told was not the newcomer, but the steady hand. Thus women factory workers in England have proved to be quite dependable in new spheres, quickly becoming accustomed to novel conditions. On the other hand, the chances are that many women taken from the war with which the firms were not familiar. "It was clearly a condition of their obtaining such work," says the Report, "that a central body should act on their behalf with the authority placing contracts, and should further assist them by supplying expert advice, paying promptly for work done, and undertaking such services and such processes of manufacture as the firms were unable economically to perform for themselves." This work was taken up and the Committee obtained the following among other orders: (a) 20,000 cut-out Army grey shirts to be made up. (b) As from October, when the above contract expired, 10,000 similar shirts per week. The Committee in this case became responsible for the cutting as well as the making of the shirts. (c) 105,000 flannel body-belts for the French and British Armies. (d) 2,000,000 pairs of Army grey socks. Work of this kind is only undertaken where the ordinary trade is fully employed, and at trade prices, the work being self-maintaining. The women are paid at the usual rates in women's trades. Although many of the women and girls employed on these orders were unused to the work, they have, with the expert advice and help provided by the Committee, gained considerably in efficiency. "That the Committee in the case of shirt-making has been able to work up to the Army standard is shown by the fact that the rejections have been on the average barely 1 per cent." To execute the order for shirts, the Committee opened a shirt-cutting workroom with skilled cutters obtained through the assistance of the Shirt and Jacket Cutters' Union. As the button-holing of the shirts by hand proved a tedious and slow operation, this process is performed on special button-holing machines at the Central Contract workroom, where also women are being trained so as to be able to find employment in shirt-making and similar factories.

The Committee has given careful consideration to the possibility of establishing new trades, and its policy has been cautious and sound. So far, however, its work has been mainly that of investigation and advice, covering a large variety of trades. Two small schemes, however, have been partly financed on the Committee's recommendation. "The first of these was a fruit-preserving and pulping factory established at Studley College. This scheme was promoted by the Board of Agriculture and aided by the Development Commission, and an advance in respect of wages for an initial period was made. The second is an experiment in the employment of working girls on the land, which has been started at Radlett. Here again the Committee's responsibility consists merely in the payment of wages, and the value of the work done will be repaid. The girls have proved very adaptable, and the experiment seems likely to become permanent."

Relief work has been carried out in conjunction with the Local Representation Committees through workrooms. The employment provided has been of such a character that the product did not compete with ordinary industry, and it was laid down that the work must be of such a nature as to maintain, and, if possible, improve, the efficiency of the women employed. The "workroom" and "training" schemes adopted differ, therefore, merely in degree rather than in kind. The cost of materials for the workrooms is a considerable item, though many of the local committees have obtained gifts of materials. The difficulties and waste often incidental to local buying on a small scale were early recognised by the Central Committee who at the end of October opened a central buying department, with an expert buyer from the Stores Department of the G.P.O. in charge. This is not the only illustration which might be given of the business ability of the Women's Committee.

The rate of remuneration in the workrooms for those over 18 was fixed at 3d. per hour with a maximum of 10s. per week, a sum which, in view of the increased cost of living, has been raised to 11s. 6d. The Committee has really established for women and girls a system of maintenance under training, the training being in the main "technical" or concerned with housewifery. Much assistance has been obtained in this respect from local education authorities. Juvenile training centres have been established in London, that where there has been drafting of labour the worker who told was not the newcomer, but the steady hand. Thus women factory workers in England have proved to be quite dependable in new spheres, quickly becoming accustomed to novel conditions. On the other hand, the chances are that many women taken from the war register would quickly succumb to strain and unusual hours.

Unemployment Nominal.

The most gratifying feature of the Labour Exchange—which has steadily increased its value in the country in this war time—is the fact that workers can be so readily placed. Unemployment in skilled trades is down to about 1 per cent., and it is probably not much more among unskilled men. Unless a man is shiftless and physically unfit he can obtain employment. An experienced official like Mr Matson does not share the gloomy views of the future of industry. He recognises that after the peace there will be a cessation of munitions labour, but that the work of reparation of all sorts will be enormous. The casualties in the field, so terribly heavy, are reducing the number of men workers, while the probability is that indoor employments—into which women are now entering so largely—will be distasteful to many men who served in that capacity and are now in the Army, but who will continue to prefer the life in the open. The post-war possibilities, Mr Matson considers, cannot be safely calculated to-day, but he is sceptical as to the coming of deep depression industrially, though quite anticipating a period of enforced thrift, such as Lord Strathclyde speaks of.

Money Fairly Plentiful.

Turning from industry to a big line in the Scottish capital—shopping—one notes that in the big drapery establishments trade continues remarkably good, though it is, naturally, not quite up to normal. These firms experienced during the winter their slackest time since the beginning of the war. There was a very general limiting of expenditure to goods that were absolutely necessary. That was especially so in the matter of dress. But with the coming of the brighter days and warmer weather customers began to find their way again to the draper and the dressmaker, and the spring and summer season has been good, taking all things into consideration. Whereas in the winter months dressmakers were very slack they are now getting plenty of work. It has accordingly been found unnecessary (as already indicated) to continue in the meantime the expedient of the work-rooms, for giving temporary employment to the women. Money to spend appears to be fairly plentiful in the city and the bigger shopkeepers are not complaining about business. They are experiencing difficulties in another direction, however, and that is in getting supplies of certain classes of goods. The manufacturers had short stocks, and the supply forthcoming was by no means equal to the demand. In many cases the manufacturers had turned their energies to the making of military goods, and the result of the shortage of stocks has been a general enhancement of prices of material.

Where Thrift Comes In.

Among the smaller shopkeepers the effects of the war are being felt in diverse ways In most working-class households in the city the weekly expenditure now requires more careful handling, and in many cases where the men have gone to serve their country the income has suffered. All that means a good deal of economy, and the drapery and outfitting shopkeepers feel the punch. But it has also to be said that there are other households with their "mainstay" in the Army who are actually better off now than probably they have ever been. Many a family that subsisted on £1 a week before is now steadily in receipt of that or even a larger amount, in proportion to the number of children, and there is no man to provide for out of it. The smaller shopkeepers are also experiencing great difficulty in getting the goods they want from the makers, and in this respect the small buyer suffers in competition with the bigger buyer. Thus the prices ascend.

"THE UNWANTED MIDDLE-AGED MAN."

To the Editor of "The Daily News."

Sir,—The statement by "Septuagenarian" that "The Labour Exchange is open to all, and no man able and willing to work need be without suitable employment" is not borne out by my own experience or that of my son. Since Christmas I have only done ten days work, and at the last interview I had with the manager of the local Labour Exchange I was informed that it was most difficult to find "suitable employment" for men "able and willing to work," except for skilled or semi-skilled mechanics, and these, under present circumstances, scarcely need the intervention of the Exchange. I was also informed that I could obtain munition work, but upon nothing lighter than the making of 6-inch shell; all work below that being reserved for women. This, for reasons it would be too long to state, was unsuitable.

My son, after seven attempts to enlist, has been trying, without success, to obtain employment as a motor driver. In the majority of cases the reason assigned for employing female labour is that girls or women will do the work for half the wages of a man. "The blessedness of self-supporting labour" of women and girls is doubtful, if it is to be at the expense of middle-aged males endeavouring to keep house and home together; or of younger men, the potential home providers of the future.

I have been as effectually ruined by the war, so far as the future is concerned, as any Belgian, Serb, or Frenchman; but while efforts are made to find these work or relief, those in like case with myself may console themselves with the thought expressed in your columns by Mr. Arnold Bennett, that "Somebody must suffer," and there the matter ends.

WAR WORK FOR WOMEN.

EXTENSION OF THE CORNISH SCHEME.

MR. HAWK'S ADDRESS.

URBAN MOVEMENT STARTED AT SALTASH.

"Bend your backs, maidens, for the glory of old England!"

This appeal, made in days gone by by Ann Glanville, the famous Saltash oarswoman, in her memorable international struggle, was the text selected by Mr. William Hawk, J.P., vice-chairman of the Cornwall County Council, in explaining at a meeting convened by the Mayor of Saltash last evening that body's scheme for the organisation of women's work.

Mr. Hawk reminded his auditors that he had addressed meetings at Saltash for the last thirty-five years, but added that he had never before come with a message so solemn, or one which he presented with greater earnestness. The battle ebbed and flowed, but they could not get away from the fact that at present the enemy was the victor. Why was it that this country was in danger? They had had the reason from the highest authority—Mr. Lloyd George—who had told them that they were the worst organised nation in Europe, so badly organised that they could not continue much longer on such lines even in times of peace. Whatever they might feel, however proud they might be of English women, they had to admit that French and German women, for the moment, were doing better in this great struggle than English women.

THE FINEST WOMEN IN THE WORLD.

"If you ask me whether I think they are more capable I say 'Certainly not.' The English women are the finest women in the world, and if that is so there's no possible reason why French and German women should be doing better."

What they wanted was to try and ascertain what the women of Cornwall and of England could do in the great emergency. It had been said with perfect truth that women could replace men in a great many instances. There were numerous subjects which women could take up, and the county authority hoped to assist them in instructing themselves and fitting themselves to release men who might be of service to their country. What they must do if they were to achieve success was to inculcate a different spirit among the women of England. There was a different spirit altogether in Germany from that in England. Germany was a nation in arms, but the people of England collectively were not working together. Mr. Lloyd George had told them that half the power of this nation was as yet unorganised.

If that was so, and the nation was in grievous peril, he was sure they would agree that we should set about organising, and organising promptly. The County Council had taken what were believed, not only in Cornwall, but by those who knew—the Board of Trade, the Board of Agriculture, and other bodies—to be some useful steps. What they had done hitherto had related wholly to rural subjects. A scheme had been started by which they were endeavouring with some success to give instruction in dairy work. They were trying also to start classes in light farm work, and so far as it had gone that scheme had been satisfactory.

INSTRUCTION IN URBAN AREAS.

As soon as those steps had been taken there was a movement in the urban areas, such as Saltash, for an extension of the scheme to these districts. The demand appeared to be exceedingly reasonable, and the county authority as recently as last week decided that the scheme which had been formulated for rural areas should be applied, so far as finance was concerned, to urban areas, and that such classes as were most desirable should be started. There were a very large number of subjects which could be taught in urban centres, and there were funds available for carrying out the instruction. The County Authority had been in the habit of spending from £7 to £10 per class in evening continuation classes throughout the county. The scheme, so far as the rural areas were concerned, had been placed by the Board of Agriculture in an exceedingly favourable position. The Board had come forward and supplemented a grant of £7 by another £14. What exactly would happen with regard to urban centres he could not say, but he knew that that day a circular had been received from the Board of Education (who knew quite well what they were doing on the rural side) stating that that Department would be prepared to consider urban schemes if they were formulated, and to make grants upon such lines as might be suggested. Therefore, although they did not know precisely what grants would be received they would undoubtedly receive substantial assistance.

WHAT TO LEARN.

With regard to the subjects to be taught, certain suggestions had been made by they were doing on the rural side) stating that that Department would be prepared to consider urban schemes if they were formulated, and to make grants upon such lines as might be suggested. Therefore, although they did not know precisely what grants would be received they would undoubtedly receive substantial assistance.

WHAT TO LEARN.

With regard to the subjects to be taught, certain suggestions had been made by the Board of Trade. Among them were:—

Horse shoeing.
Leather stitching.
Machining in connection with armaments.
Cloth machining.
Basket-making.
Fruit-bottling, and the drying and preserving of vegetables.
Poultry-keeping.
Gardening in connection with medicinal plants.
Economical cookery.

Horse-shoeing could advantageously be taught at Saltash. It was not a subject for ladies, but in connection with the classes men might be included as well as women. He had put horse-shoeing in the forefront because the military authorities had applied to them to know what they were doing in the county with regard to it. They had to admit they were doing nothing. In a place like Saltash it would be the easiest conceivable thing to get a shoeing-smith to instruct half-a-score of men. The instructor would be paid fairly, and it was the duty of the gentlemen of Saltash to say if such a class were needed, and to bring the question before the District Education Committee.

WHAT GERMAN WOMEN ARE DOING.

With regard to leather-stitching, it might surprise them to hear that 15 per cent. of the harness, saddles, bridles, and other articles in leather used by the German Army were made by women. In Germany 50 per cent. of those who made tents, haversacks, etc., were women, and he did not think for a moment that a German woman was more capable of making such things than an Englishwoman. It might appear that basket-making was a rather remote subject, but it was exceedingly practical. This country had been in the habit of getting wood for making baskets through the Baltic. Nothing could be procured now, and they were obliged to make the baskets of poplar. In consequence of the state of things arising from the war women in the Cheddar Valley were earning 16s a week at this work.

FRUIT-BOTTLING AND POULTRY KEEPING.

Fruit-bottling and the preservation of vegetables were most simple processes. At first sight it might appear that in Saltash they could not do much in the way of poultry keeping but they would be contributing enormously to the national wealth if they took it up. The waste from the garden and the house could be turned to account if poultry were kept, and even if they had no garden it should be quite an easy matter in a crisis like this for people to let their neighbours who did keep poultry have their waste. So long as there was so much waste people were not putting their backs into this business as they should.

GATHERING MEDICINAL PLANTS.

It so happened that practically the whole of the plants which produced the drugs necessary in this country were grown in Austria. The supply was now absolutely cut off, the consequence being that many drugs which were formerly sold at fairly remunerative prices had gone up enormously in value. Belladonna, which used to be sold at 45s. per cwt., now cost £7 10s. per cwt. He was speaking with the authority of Lord Selborne when he said that there would be such a demand for belladonna that those who would take the trouble to gather the plant during August and September would find a capital market for the seed. Dandelion was a most valuable commodity just now. A short time ago it was sold for 40s. per cwt.; now the price was £6 5s. per cwt. If ladies would grow a bed of foxglove they would also be contributing to the nation's wealth. Poppy heads were being sold at 15s. per thousand, and it did not take a large piece of ground to grow that quantity.

ECONOMICAL COOKERY.

With regard to cookery, it had become absolutely necessary in the nation's interest to have an entirely different system of teaching from that now in existence. At Newquay a Belgian cook had been providing people with excellent dinners at a remarkably low price. The County Authority would employ that cook to give demonstrations. If it were desired there would be little difficulty in having some demonstrations in Saltash. The object of the County Authority was to meet the requirements of localities, but it must be understood that there would be none other than war classes: that was, that the direct needs resulting from the war must be met. If the scheme were to be a success there must be no mistake how they were going to work.

"The girl who can swing a hockey club should handle a pike or hoe, and I say this: that the one who refuses to do so, if she can, is an enemy to her country. There must be no mistake in this matter. The person who is in this country and refuses to do anything except eat the food which is produced by the labour of others is an enemy to the country, and must be treated as such."

WOMEN'S WAGES.

Mrs. Smith, in reply to questions, said that the wages paid to girls in the toy-making industry were considerably more than is paid to girls in Germany, where toy-making is chiefly home and sweated work.

"Most of the girls we employ had been thrown out of work owing to the war. At present our scheme is in the nature of an experiment, but if it is a profitable one it will be developed into a permanent industry. If we in England can produce as good a toy as the foreigner there is no reason why we should not be able to keep the trade. I don't think English people have shown the interest in this question that its importance demands."

In addition to this scheme the committee have a large workroom in Sackville-street, where women and girls are taught power machinist work. "We train about twelve each month," said Mrs. Smith, "after which they are given employment by manufacturers who are doing Government contract work. During their period of training with us we make them a maintenance grant of 7s. per week, but some of them are able to make that into 12s."

There are also three rooms in the city where the committee employ 300 girls and women in ordinary sewing work.

Toy-making schemes are also in operation in Liverpool, Birmingham, and other large centres.

Daily Express, 8.10.15.

The amount of unemployment in London is so small that the central unemployed body is not opening its usual autumn register for men. The registrations for the whole year from July 1st, 1914, were only 9,300, and the difficulty at present is to get labour. The register for women is still open, but its work is largely formal. The number of occupations previously filled by men and boys, in which women and girls now figure, continues to grow almost daily, and so far as the public is concerned every one seems satisfied. The Stock Exchange, it is said, declines to permit girl clerks within its sacred precincts, and has alopted the course of lowering its age standard for boy clerks. Whether the Exchange Committee could not trust girls as clerks or could not trust its own members to attend to business properly with feminine distractions about it not explained. The general impression is that it is a mixture of both reasons, the latter predominating. The majority of the girls now occupied on such work as messengers and light labouring generally appear to have come from the servant class. These employed in charge of lists in offices and the big stores appear to have been recruited from the typist and shorthand classes. They all seem to like the new jobs for the variety and novelty which they impart into life. The only grievance appears to be in relation to uniform, probably caused by the fact that the designers had boys or men in view and were insufficiently acquainted with the mysteries of the feminine fashions.

ABERDEEN'S UNEMPLOYED WOMEN.

DISTRESS COMMITTEE TO TAKE ACTION.

A meeting of the Aberdeen Distress Committee was held last night in the Town House—Councillor Young presiding.

The following letter was read from the clerk of the Glasgow Distress Committee regarding unemployment among women:—

My committee, at a meeting held on June 8 last, resolved that a conference of representatives of the Distress Committees of Scotland be convened in the autumn to consider and devise a national policy in regard to making provision for unemployed women, and to arrange for collective action being taken for carrying out same. The opinion has frequently been expressed that Distress Committees in the past have not given any serious consideration to the claims of women who should unfortunately find themselves out of employment. At the present moment it might be held the claims of women in this respect do not call for any immediate action. While this aspect of the case may be admitted, it is nevertheless a fact that at the conclusion of hostilities, a large number of women, presently absorbed for the purpose of filling the places of men during the war, will suddenly find themselves out of employment, and as has been found in such circumstances in the past, a crisis will arise which it appears to be the duty of the Distress Committees to avert. Quite apart from this, there must always be a certain amount of unemployment amongst women in every large industrial centre all the year round, and in order to cope with this there ought to be permanent arrangements whereby women can obtain relief. The wage earned by many women workers is so small as to preclude any margin for saving, and a week or a fortnight's unemployment, especially to many young girls living in lodgings, brings them to the brink of destitution. This latter consideration might be enlarged further, but the point is perfectly obvious. It is of the utmost importance that help for such women, if it is to be of practical use, should be immediate. It is proposed to hold a conference in the City Chambers, Glasgow, on October 28, at 2 o'clock afternoon, and I am directed to ascertain if your committee will be willing to send representatives to the conference. In reply, I shall be glad if you will kindly state the number of representatives from your committee.

The Chairman stated that the Aberdeen Distress Committee had already drawn up a scheme, but it had not met with the approval of the Local Government Board. Since the last meeting of the committee, however, the Works Committee had taken over the waste paper collecting depot from the Relief Committee, and they had already given employment to a number of women there.

Mr David Milne said it was time that something should be done in Aberdeen for unemployed women. They did not have to wait until the war was over to tackle the question. From what he knew there was every reason that action be taken immediately.

Mr M'Intyre said they had at least 200 unemployed women in Aberdeen, including a number of girls who had been paid off at preserving works. Many of them had no way of getting a livelihood. He thought it was time that something was done for these women. It was finally agreed that the chairman and Mr R. M. Gordon, the clerk, should attend the meeting in Glasgow.

UNEMPLOYED WOMEN.

CONFERENCE OF DISTRESS COMMITTEES.

An adjourned conference was held in the City Chambers, Glasgow, yesterday, of the principal Distress Committees throughout Scotland, to consider further and devise a national policy in regard to making provision for unemployed women after the war. Bailie Maclure, Glasgow, presided, and representatives were present from Edinburgh, Leith, Dundee, Aberdeen, and Greenock.

Ex-Bailie Malcolm Campbell suggested that the Local Government Board were sympathetic, and had the whole matter pfetty much at their finger-ends.

Miss Irwin said the experience of the Glasgow Committee with the Local Government Board had not been such as to inspire them with confidence as to its prescience, wisdom, or activity. Those in the districts who were wearing the shoes knew much better where the shoes pinched than did the central body in Edinburgh; and they were better able, therefore, to give a lead to the central body than the central body were to give a lead to them. (Hear, hear.) She did not think that the central body realised the gravity of the problem with which the local bodies were faced.

Ultimately a resolution was unanimously adopted in favour of Distress Committees undertaking the training of unemployed women and subsidising them while in training for new professions; and also the establishment of workrooms which would be open all the year round.

It was also decided to appeal to the Local Government Board to amend the regulations so as to permit of the Distress Committees doing for women what they were now able to do for men, and the following Executive Committee were appointed to give effect to the decisions:—Bailie Maclure, as chairman of the conference; Miss Irwin and Bailie Nicol, Glasgow; Miss Lees, Edinburgh; Bailie Edgar, Leith; Mrs George Adam Smith, Aberdeen; Miss Husband, Dundee; and Bailie Russell, Greenock, with the clerks to the Distress Committees represented at the conference.

INDUSTRIAL SCOTLAND AND THE WAR.

A REASSURING POSITION.

After six months of war the condition of industry in Scotland is stated by those well able to give an opinion to be very reassuring. No able-bodied man need want work if he is willing to transport himself to districts where labour is urgently needed; and while certain employments, in which women are chiefly engaged, have been hardly hit, any distress occasioned thereby has, we believe, been kept well in hand by Local Committees. There is no scarcity of money, though, as in times of peace, it may not be so evenly distributed as some would like. In connection with the wives and dependants of men mobilised or in the Army and Navy, where any pinch is beginning to be felt is in the continued rise in the price of provisions, which necessarily restricts the spending value of their allowances. But even this so far has not reached any acute stage.

PLENTY OF WORK FOR MEN.

Generally speaking, there is at the present moment more work for men than men to do it. The difficulty experienced is to get men to come to the place where work is waiting them. Despite all modern railway facilities, men, as Adam Smith said, are the most difficult form of luggage to transport. This, it has been shown, is going to have a considerable bearing on the administration of the National Relief Funds. There is a danger that while Local Committees administer relief men out of work may continue to hang about their own districts in the hope of something turning up, instead of cutting themselves loose and going to places where work is waiting them. At Rosyth, for example a great many more men can be employed, and the wages are good and sure. It is not unlikely that Local Committees will have their attention directed to the necessity of stricter measures with cases of able-bodied men receiving relief, who by moving from their own district they could at once find work, and relieve the Fund. Unless in very exceptional circumstances relief in such cases as are referred to seems not to be justifiable. Some men, of course, will not push about with any energy and look for work outside their own neighbourhood as long as they can be relieved at home. But in any case the general condition of things is very satisfactory when it can be reported that labour has shown a remarkable power of adjusting itself to altered conditions, and that instances of distress among male labourers is comparatively rare.

NATIONAL RELIEF AND UNEMPLOYED WOMEN PRINTERS.—The Edinburgh Committee under the National Relief Fund have had under consideration a letter from the Edinburgh Branch of the Printing and Kindred Trades Federation requesting that a sub-committee be appointed to confer with representatives of the Federation in regard to the cases of persons thrown out of employment by the withdrawal of a large printing works from the city, recently announced. It was pointed out that the problem was not yet acute. The employees were being discharged systematically, and the question would mainly turn on the women workers. A proportion of them had already got engagements in the Post Office and also in other callings. With regard to the others it was felt that in existing conditions they might not have much difficulty in getting work of some kind in the city, but the Scottish Advisory Committee, in a letter, indicated that there might be exceptional cases where difficulty in finding employment presented itself and where temporary assistance might be required The Edinburgh Committee agreed to keep this in view, and a small sub-committee was also appointed, the chief object being to secure an adjustment with the minimum amount of unemployment for the large numbers affected by this change.

MERSEY SHIPPING TRADE BRISK.

Work Generally Plentiful.

LIVERPOOL, Wednesday.

The fact of its having been decided that for the time being the consideration of public relief works for male workers in Liverpool is unnecessary represents a state of affairs which no doubt many other cities in the country will envy. To sum up the Mersey port's position, distress is little more than normal, and what is better still, if the measures to relieve financial strain are successful in restoring imports and exports on something like customary lines, Liverpool will continue to enjoy a comparative prosperity.

It is her geographical position, combined with her standing as a port, which is so greatly to Liverpool's advantage at the moment. Besides being one of the Government's transport bases—in itself a valuable asset in the matter of employment—her own shipping activity has been supplemented by much that in peace times belongs to other ports. Consequently her docks have been kept busy, and the dock labourers are earning good money. Substantial additions have been made to the registered lists of dock workers under the "tally" system that is operating so well, and although there have been also large defections on account of enlistments, the army of workers remains fully up to, probably a little more than, the normal, and on the first two days of this week it was reported that there was actually a shortage of men for the work that required to be done. Incidentally it may be mentioned that all the new registrations have been of men ineligible for military service, and the middle-aged labourer is now coming into his own.

It is not only among dock labourers that employment is being maintained. The building trade certainly is affected to some extent, but has by no means experienced the slump that is complained of in other towns. Carters are meeting with a welcome revival of work owing to the replacement of horses taken for military requirements, and employment for motor drivers is also improving. The wholesale fruit trade, which finds employment for a large number, has not felt the necessity of discharging any of its workmen, and is hopeful that improved financial and trading relations with Near Eastern growing countries will altogether avert such a necessity. Sugar factories are reported fairly busy, but firms engaged in the making of sweets are doing poorly, and on the point of closing down. They apparently are suffering from the fate of other "luxury" producers. A novel reason is given for shortage of work at a fountain pen factory, which has reduced its hands and put others on short time owing to the difficulty of securing gold for the pen nibs.

In engineering trade and some departments of ship repairing trade is not good, and earnings are consequently diminished. There are many clerical workers who have been placed on half-time, but this does not apply to the better class of employers, who, with excellent spirit, have retained their staffs. The heavy enlistment of clerks last week in the new City battalions found room for some temporary clerks.

Female workers have not fared quite so well, for while at least two clothing factories are working overtime on Government orders, others have very little to do, and unless Government work can be kept up the prospect is but poor. It is estimated also that about 25 per cent. of the dressmakers of the city are on the unemployed list. In cafes and catering estab-

[illegible] in any case the general condition of things is very satisfactory when it can be reported that labour has shown a remarkable power of adjusting itself to altered conditions, and that instances of distress among male labourers is comparatively rare.

THE FISHING INDUSTRY.

A remarkable instance of this is to be found in the present condition of the men who were at the outbreak of the war engaged in the East Coast fishing industry. These men in August last were badly hit. There was a general collapse in East Coast fishing. Danger from enemies and enemy's mines and Admiralty regulations gave a severe blow to the fishing industry from which, of course, it has not yet recovered. But all the able-bodied men who were engaged in it, who found themselves out of their regular work, have all been employed elsewhere—in the Naval Reserve, in the Navy, on mine-sweeping trawlers, and not a few of them quite recently took the places of all alien sailors who were employed in the Welsh colliers supplying the fleet with coal. In this survey, of course, the older men have to be exempted, and local committees are looking after such cases.

BO'NESS AND GRANGEMOUTH.

The same adaptability of labour has been shown at Grangemouth and Bo'ness, which were for a time severely affected by the Admiralty regulations closing to navigation the upper reaches of the Forth. The dockers and other men adversely affected by these regulations have all found employment elsewhere, and it is stated that at both these Forth towns there are practically no men now unemployed. The Labour Exchanges may have helped them to some extent, but the general idea is that they found work for themselves in other ports where labour was needed.

The mining industry, it is known, is active, and in works of all kinds which have Government contracts the employees are working overtime.

WOMEN'S WORK.

Women workers are still suffering from the effects of the war. There are obvious reasons for this. No alternative employments have been open to them. They could not enlist, or in any other way diminish the number of workers that the stoppage of work on account of the war threw out of employment. Those who have suffered most are possibly women connected with tailoring, dressmaking, and millinery establishments, who have found that all orders for luxurious forms of garments have practically ceased. Ball dresses and dinner robes have not been in demand this winter. It is on such things that well-to-do people have been economising. Even where this has not led to absolute unemployment, it has meant lessened employment—three days per week instead of five or six, and at the rate women are paid it means that the worker cannot earn a living wage. Local Committees have, however, applied themselves energetically to meeting this difficulty. One method employed has been to open women's workrooms, at which those out of employment or only receiving partial employment at their old establishments are given work. There are four or five such workrooms in Edinburgh under the auspices of the Scottish Advisory Committee, and similar places have been opened in Glasgow, Aberdeen, Inverness, Perth, and other large centres. Sewing work of various kinds is provided at the workrooms. Some are working for the Red Cross and for hospitals, care being taken that they do not in any way compete with the existing establishments.

The case of women employed in the printing and allied trades has required the attention of Local Committees, and is being practically considered. No complaints, however, would seem to have been made concerning the lot of the many women and girls engaged in the stationery trade, which seems at present to be even busier than it is generally at this time of the year.

The case of women and girls who were connected with the fishing industry and its subsidiary trades is one that called for serious attention. The herring fishing this year on the East Coast was practically nil. Netmakers were affected, and the little army of women who make big wages for a month or two in the autumn in the curing of the fish had nothing to do. In the Lewes the partial failure of the potato crop aggravated the case of the fishing population there; and it seems that the war has all but killed the Harris tweed industry, despite the efforts which have been made for so many years by Highland Committees to endeavour to stimulate it. There were large stocks on hand on the outbreak of the war, and at present there is no demand for this class of goods. In the case of the fisherwomen, who are for the most part excellent knitters, work has been found for many of them in the execution of contracts for the Navy for knitted articles—socks, belts, mittens, and so forth; and as there is no scarcity of wool, though the price of it augments, distress among them has in the way described been largely diminished.

LODGING-HOUSEKEEPERS.

The case of women lodging-housekeepers in the larger towns is one that the Local Committees are experiencing considerable difficulty in dealing with. In Edinburgh, for example, half the lodging-houses are empty on account of so many students and young men in all professions and trades having enlisted. Many of these women are saddled with considerable rents, which, in the absence of lodgers, they have no means of making. The question which has posed itself for consideration is how best they can be helped. It has been urged that the Local Committees should assist them in the payment of their rents; on the other hand some men

The distress among women and girl workers is such as to cause anxiety, and steps towards alleviation are being taken by a Mayoress's committee appointed for the purpose. Employment for boys is reported about the average.

This is the worst season the lodging-housekeepers have ever had. In Glasgow lodging-housekeepers have been helped by the billeting of Belgian refugees; in some smaller towns Territorials have been billeted in private houses. In Edinburgh there are no Belgian refugees allowed; and the men mobilised have been quartered in public institutions and not private houses.

"QUITE GOOD NEWS."

LITTLE UNEMPLOYMENT.

BY PROF. W. SMART.

When a man who, by reason of years, cannot go to the front hears of anything cheerful in regard to the prospects of this war, it seems to me that the least he can do is to share it with his fellows. The particular bit of good news which I have come across, and which seems to have escaped much notice, is that the official figure of unemployment, which rose suddenly from 2.8 per cent. for the month of July, and fell to 5.9 for September, was no more for October than 4.4 per cent. That is to say, at the present moment among the 900,000 members of trade unions making returns to the Board of Trade, there is less unemployment than in the majority of ordinary years—less, for instance, than the mean of the last ten years, 1904-1913. And we are told that the improvement is not only in numbers employed but in the amount of short time reported.

To me the figure was so unexpected—and so welcome—that I turned with some eagerness to the details of employment furnished by the several trades. There I found that, in coal mining, employment continued fairly good, but "not so good as a year ago"; in iron mining there was "a slight decline on a year ago"; shale mining was good, "though not quite so good as a year ago"; lead mining "continued good." In iron and steel works there was some improvement, but employment was "not so good as a year ago"; in engineering trades there was, "compared with a year ago, a slight decline on the whole"; shipbuilding was "not quite so good as a year ago"; miscellaneous metal trades were "fairly good, but not so good as a year ago"; worsted trades much better than a month ago, although not so good as a year ago.

The above shows a pretty wide range of great industries, of which the worst said is that employment is not so good, or not quite so good, as in 1913. If it be remembered that 1913 was not an ordinary year, but one of the very best years in our history as a nation—that the "boom" in employment reached its zenith about the middle of that year—this is about as much as to say, "in the above trades in October, 1914, employment was normal."

Of six great trades, however, even better can be said. In the pig iron industry, employment was "better than before the war." In the woollen trade it was "better than a year ago . . . more than a quarter of the workpeople covered by the returns were working overtime during the month, and there was very little short time in any of the districts." The hosiery trade, the boot and shoe trade, the leather trades, the ready-made clothing trade, were all "better than a year ago."

TRADES AFFECTED.

The only trades which—so far as I read the statistics—cannot be favourably compared with last year are slate quarrying, tinplates, cotton, linen, jute, silk, lace, bleaching, printing, and dyeing; carpets, bespoke tailoring, hats, dress making and millinery, printing, binding, and paper; furnishings and woodwork, glass, brick and cement, potteries, jewellery. But all of them show an improvement over last month. And in all these trades wherever there is a department or district which enjoys "Government contracts" overtime is the rule. The position of the cotton trade causes most concern. In October, although there was a slight improvement compared with September, it was "still bad," the trade as a whole working about 32 hours per week instead of the normal 55½ hours. But on November 7 the Manchester correspondent of the "Economist" noticed that a sudden change had taken place in the cotton market of Lancashire during the past week or ten days, buyers giving out large orders, and the turnover described as "tremendous." And my colleague, Professor Chapman, speaking on November 10, and estimating that, while £17,000,000 of exports to Germany, Austria, Belgium, Turkey, Russia, and France were for the time wiped out, £10,000,000 of trade in the shape of imports from Germany, Belgium, Austria, and France would fall almost entirely to England, concluded that "he did not see why the industry should not be working normally within a few weeks' time."

When thus analysed the low percentage of unemployment is seen to reflect the fact that abnormal activity in some trades is more or less balanced by abnormal depression in others, while a great many—and these very important—are little affected one way or another.

UNDERNEATH THE SURFACE.

The details just given will guide us in answering the question which I now propose to put—How is it that, in the third month of the greatest war in history, a war in which we are interested not only as spectators and lenders, but as principals, so many trades are only "not so good" as in a boom year and that the general percentage of unemployment is so low? What does it indicate as regards the living of the nation and as regards its ability to carry on the war to the "doom assigned"?

Before answering, let us be sure that we are using our premises not only carefully but impartially. There are two things to be remembered in interpreting these statistics. One is that large numbers of men, who would usually appear in the industrial returns as employed or unemployed, are employed in the war; to the extent then—but only to the extent—that industry is maintained at the old peace amount of former years there would naturally be more demand for the labour of those left. In other words, the unemployment percentage may have fallen because there are fewer male workers to employ. The other is that only organised labour is represented by the above figures—that is, the great trade unions. As regards the unorganised classes in general, it is gratifying to notice that the percentage of workpeople in the "insured trades" (numbering over 2¼ millions) has fallen from 5.4 per cent. in the end of September to 4.2 in the end of October—not very much over what it was in the corresponding month of 1913. But as regards ordinary women workers—who are generally unorganised—the information is defective. Dressmakers in the most highly skilled branches, domestic servants, clerks and typists, and, speaking generally, those engaged in the making of luxuries are heavily hit. If we hear little of factories entirely shut down, it is certain that many are on short time. But with all this what can be said definitely by the Board of Trade is that "during October employment among women, which had been seriously affected at the beginning of the war, showed considerable improvement."

These are two circumstances them which must be allowed for in drawing any conclusion from the statistical figures. But, making full allowance for them, it seems to me that we need have no hesitation in accepting the low figure as so welcome, so hopeful and, withal, so unexpected as to call for an explanation—not so much for itself as to allow us to judge whether it is likely to last. For certainly if we escape the largest and deepest dislocation that our industry has ever experienced at a cost of no more than 4.4 per cent. of unemployment, I should say that, always assuming that we can provide Lord Kitchener with all the men he calls for, we need have no fear as to the issue of the war. But what my explanation is I must reserve for another article.

The Co-operative
10-9-14

A VERY useful pamphlet has just been published by the executive of the Workers' National Committee for dealing with War Emergency, giving suggestions to Labour members on local distress committees. The essence of the pamphlet is summed up in the words contained in the headlines given above; but for the use of those co-operators who have been appointed on these committees, and for the interest of our readers generally, we make the following extracts from the pamphlet*:—

The one effective remedy for the dislocation of trade caused through the war is "employment," and wherever such a course is possible, the committee maintain—under the Statute 43 Elizabeth, 1601—that much the best way to maintain the people is to find them regular wage-earning employment in their own trades, not necessarily for "profit," but for public utility, such as repairing, painting, cleaning, and improving; provision of houses, schools, hospitals, &c. The Government has itself asked local authorities to do this, and every member of every distress committee is urged to press this, warning committees that until local authorities have done their duty in this respect, national funds will not be granted for relief.

Where work for wages cannot be found, maintenance—apart from the Poor Law—must be found for those whose distress is caused through the war. The money for this will be sent to local committees, subject to the instructions of the Cabinet Emergency Committee.

The most interesting part of the pamphlet is that dealing with

Work for Women.

Owing to the relief to the labour market given by the withdrawal of nearly a million men on Government pay for the war, the greatest pressure of unemployment will fall on the four millions of wage-earning women. As the new public works to be everywhere started by local authorities will do little for women and girls, a Government "Central Committee on Women's Employment" has been formed, to provide the funds for approved schemes of work for women. Any local committee may submit a "Scheme of Employment for Unemployed Women," for which, when approved, funds will be supplied. If women are in need in your district, the money is waiting for your local committee to draw. The scheme will have to be managed locally by a separate subcommittee, which must include "a strong representation of women from working-class industrial organisations," such as Women's Trade Unions, or the local branches of the Women's Co-operative Guild, or Women's Labour League, or Railway Women's Guild. You may explain that no scheme will be approved by the Government Central Committee until such representation is allowed; and that councillors' wives, or those of ministers of religion, or representatives of the Charity Organisation Society, or the Soldiers and Sailors' Families' Association, or other societies not being strictly "working-class industrial organisations," will not be accepted as sufficient. The women will be employed under skilled (salaried) instructresses, in work of the nature of useful training, either for industries in which there is a proved deficiency of skilled women's labour (such as hand ironing and machining), or in new industries (fruit-pulping, doll-making, and toy-making have already been started in some places), or in domestic dressmaking, domestic economy, &c.; being paid at the rate of 10s. per week of forty hours. You should at once get your local committee to submit its "scheme for the employment of women," in accordance with these regulations, and to make application for the funds required to take on all eligible women and girls who apply. This provision ought to be made available for all women who have now to be self-supporting, whether single, married, or widowed.

These Still Unemployed.

For those men or women whom the additional public enterprises of the local authorities and the women's training centres still leave unprovided for, it is the duty of the local committee to do their utmost to find situations at wages. The fullest possible use should be made, not only of trade union agencies, but also of the Labour Exchange, in order that openings in other parts of the kingdom, or in new industries, may be made available. See that railway fares are advanced (the Labour Exchange can do this if pressed), and other necessary expenses of removal of family, tools, outfit, &c., provided (the local committee may do this out of any relief funds it can get hold of). A country job is better than none. It is often better to get a young man a situation as an "improver" in a new or expanding industry, than to make him linger on, without work and without hope, in an overstocked or a dying trade. The Labour Exchange will communicate with other towns with regard to particular cases if pressed to do so.

Relief.

Those men and women unemployed through the war, for whom the local authorities fail to provide employment of any kind, have, of course, the same right to honourable maintenance as those for whom work has been found. It is not their fault if the local authority fails to meet the national emergency in the best way, and in the way that the Government prescribes. The Prime Minister has made clear the policy of the Government that, whatever happens, no

DO THE MAJORITY RULE?

The Central Board and the Grant to the Women's Guild.

DEAR MADAM,—It is with deep regret I read that the Central Board have decided not to alter their decision, given at the Dublin Congress, re the grant to the English Women's Guild. The Guild Congress decided we could not accept the conditions laid down. I have always been given to understand that the majority rule, but I fail to see that a resolution from such a small section of the movement can be a majority. We are asked to be loyal to co-operative committees and productions. Who are more loyal than educated guildswomen? They are the ones who know more what is needed for the bulk of our members than a mere handful. Guild members study not only co-operative, but national questions, and they have decided that it would be good for the women of the nation to have the divorce laws amended.

We are constantly being told the rank-and-file need more education. To me it is the so-called heads of the rank-and-file who need educating, and I have yet to learn that we are a sectarian movement. Surely the Central Board do not wish us to become so. When did the Central Board become all-powerful? If there is a rule to that effect, why, instead of calling conferences together to discuss different problems, do they not settle all problems themselves?

Is the Women's Guild moving too fast for them that they are anxious to hamper them in their work by stopping the grant? Who finds the profits from which the grant is made to the Co-operative Union for their work? The purchasers over the counter, viz., the women who have supported the Union in any scheme they have brought forward on educational matters. And very often some of these schemes we knew could only benefit a very few of our members, the educated guildswomen.

We are co-operators first, and I for one do not think, if the matter had been discussed in the Congress Hall, the stipulation decided on by the Central Board would have been agreed to. The educated members present must have felt it would be a slight on their wives and friends to say to those who find the wherewithal, "Your share shall be taken away from you unless you agree to minority ruling." We are told women and men have equal opportunities in the co-operative movement, but I fail to see the truth of this statement. We are equal so far as the membership and vote are concerned, but what about positions women could fill much more ably than some of the men? We honour the men, and we realise the great and good work they are doing and have done; but we want to share that work with them in deeds as well as words. Surely the Central Board know the opposition co-operators have to face outside our ranks without it coming from within. Such decisions as they have come to will not tend to close up our ranks or bring about what we are all hoping and looking for—increased unity in all our work. Will they push back the wheels of time by their action? No; we shall not let them, for we shall gird on our armour anew, and do our best to keep our work going as usual. A guildswoman always finds a way out of a difficulty.

In conclusion, just a word to my fellow-guildswomen. Read the "Co-operative News" regularly; find out by this means for yourselves what is happening in the movement to which we belong. Be loyal to co-operative productions; increase your Guild membership; let us try to make all the women members of our great movement guildswomen.—Yours sincerely,

A. REDGATE,
President of the Derby District Committee.

SCOTCH TAILORING TRADE.

APPEAL TO THE GOVERNMENT.

At a largely-attended meeting of delegates of the Scottish Operative Tailors and Tailoresses' Association, from all parts of Scotland, held in Glasgow the other day, the serious condition of the trade, due to unemployment arising out of the effects of the war, was considered. The reports submitted showed that the tailoring industry had suffered most severely in many towns, the men having been almost entirely without work since the outbreak of the war, and prospects are not at all reassuring, as the enormous number of men serving in the various forces will withdraw custom from the trade until such time as the war is over. It was, however, gratifying to learn that in some instances public authorities had placed orders for clothing at prices which enabled the employers in these districts to undertake the contract, thus helping to tide over distress in their area. The following resolution was unanimously passed, viz.:—"That this meeting, representative of the tailors of Scotland, view with anxiety the present deplorable condition of our trade throughout the country, and calls to the attention of the Government and local authorities the fact that the employees in many of the factories are compelled to work overtime in order to produce clothing for the military, naval, and Territorial forces, while our members have been practically unemployed for the past three months. This state of affairs, we claim, is a great injustice to our section of the trade, while at the same time thousands of men under training are in want of clothing as the demands cannot be met within reasonable time. This meeting, therefore, calls upon the responsible authorities to augment the price paid to enable a share of this work to go amongst the shops that employ our members. By doing so they would get a superior garment able to resist the rigours of winter, provide much needed employment, and thereby save the local authorities from relieving distress in a more expensive and less desirable way."

Yorkshire Post, 18-9-14.

While the transport workers in the East End are naturally pleased with the official recognition of their work during mobilisation, they are more pleased with the present state of things in the docks. Seldom have they been so busy at this time of the year. The present importation of foodstuffs gives absolutely no cause for anxiety. That the largest port in the kingdom should be so busy while those of the enemy on the other side of the North Sea are completely idle, is an object-lesson in sea power which will always be remembered by our people. The happy state of things at the docks is preventing acute distress in the very area which is usually the first to feel unemployment in London. It is among the more skilled workers, such as tailors, that the stress of the war is being felt, and more by women workers than by men. Of the tradespeople who complain, drapers seem to have suffered most, because of the general economising among their customers. Generally speaking, it is not the working-classes so much as some others that have suffered most up to the present.

WOMEN WAGE-EARNERS.

Yorkshire Observer. 17-9-14.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE YORKSHIRE OBSERVER.

SIR,—Having read the letter of "G. C." on the protection of women workers, I am pleased that someone has had the courage to speak out. I am at present working for one of the best of masters; only he cannot afford to keep his staff on full time, not being rich, and I am sorry to say that two of my fellow-workgirls are coming out with a very small pittance per week, and one is, like myself a widow mother and has a home to keep going. I notice the landlords don't have short rent (I pay 5s. 2d. for rent, without gas). The house itself is only worth 4s. I am not asking for charity for myself, but for my fellow-workgirls who are in a worse position than I am in.

There will be many a widow mother who will be kept awake all night wondering how to pay her way with her daughter's few shillings. There are many brave daughters who are proud of their mothers and who do not require a war to break out to show their bravery.—I am, &c.,

EMERGENCY WORKROOM (HULL).

A MUCH-NEEDED EFFORT.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE "DAILY MAIL."

SIR,—At the beginning of the War we were able, through the kindness of Messrs Cussons, who lent us an empty shop, to open an Emergency Workroom to provide employment for women and girls out of work on account of the War.

We were lent sewing machines, shop furniture, etc., by the firms of Messrs Singer, Davis, Hammond, and Bladon. A grant from the Voluntary Aid to buy material; wool for knitting, material and donations from friends, have enabled us to carry on this work for the past two months. We are now employing, in various ways, about 56 women and girls, and would like to continue this scheme. Our idea is to tide these women and girls over this difficult period, and the hours are short to enable them to try and find work of a permanent kind This has been successful in many cases, but the need is still pressing.

Messrs Cussons requiring their shop for the soldiers, the premises we now occupy, 74, Prospect-street, have been given us by Mr Wells entirely free of charge; the scheme cannot be carried on much longer without more money, all the women, of course, being paid for their work. May we ask through your columns for a little financial support? Any donations, no matter how small, will be gratefully acknowledged by the undersigned,

Mr. JAMES BOYTON, M.P.'s Philanthropic Scheme

How Marylebone's Dressmakers Assistants are being helped

A Complete Success.

The generous and far reaching scheme, originated and supported by Mr. James Boyton the popular M.P. for East Marylebone, whereby those dressmakers and milliners' assistants resident in Marylebone who are on shortened wages or who are entirely without employment, may be given work in their employers workrooms at the expense of the generous promoter, has achieved complete success

This association, entitled the St. Marylebone Association for assisting workwomen and workgirls employed in dressmaking in the Borough has been in progress for some weeks, and has already given work to a number approaching one hundred dressmakers assistants, who actually work and reside in the Borough.

Under its direction, clothing has already been made and distributed to Belgian Refugees at the St. Marylebone Workhouse, and in addition, a large parcel of clothing has been sent to the Duchesse de Vendome for distribution amongst the Belgians.

A number of soldier's shirts have been handed over to the military authorities, chiefly those connected with Marylebone. Owing to the generous support received from the friends of those immediately connected with the Association, particularly Lord Portman, the association is not urgently in need of funds. Gifts of materials, however, would be a great help towards furthering this excellent scheme.

Although the association has the approval of Her Majesty the Queen, and has for its president Her Royal Highness the Princess Royal, it is working quite independently. A large room on the fourth floor of the [illegible] some buildi[illegible]

EMPLOYMENT FOR PADIHAM WOMEN.

EXCELLENT SCHEME ADOPTED.

An excellent scheme has been adopted in Padiham for the relief of distress, and women in need of work can now go to the Technical School and obtain employment at sewing and making useful articles of apparel. The local representative committee for women's employment was formed by the Distress Committee, and consists of Mrs. Noble (president), Councillor Russell (chairman), Miss Horn (treasurer), Miss Briggs, Manchester House (secretary), Hon. Rachel Kay-Shuttleworth, Mrs. Herbert Thompson, Miss Duxbury, Mrs. Hargreaves (of the Board of Guardians), Rev. T. Munn, Mr. Richard Wilkinson, Mr. Snape. The object of the committee is to provide work for women out of work, and in order to carry it out successfully the committee are endeavouring to obtain a grant from Queen Mary's Fund, with which it is connected. Subscriptions from local persons will be thankfully received.

The women and girls are paid 3d. per hour, and are engaged as many as forty hours a week, thus receiving a maximum wage of 10s. a week. The work is intended to be educational, and the girls are given a variety of things to make. Many mill girls are unable to do dressmaking, and here they are given an opportunity to learn. The workroom was opened on Wednesday, and at present 43 are employed, Mrs. Bulcock, of Burnley, who receives a standard rate of wages, being in charge. Already £50 has been given, and a large amount of material has been sent. Old clothes are asked for to be re-modelled. This is an excellent way of administering relief. There are many who would not accept relief willing to do this work. The committee have received many more applicants, and are hoping to engage more girls next week.

Subscriptions to the funds have been received as follow: Lord Shuttleworth, £10; Padiham Weavers' Association, £5; the Hon. Rachel B. Kay-Shuttleworth, £2; Mrs. Joseph Kemp, Sawley Hall, £5; Mrs. Noble, £5; Mrs. Thompson, Rydal Mount, 5s.; Miss Emily Drummond, London, per the Hon. Rachel Kay-Shuttleworth, £3; Mr. G. Green, £3. A bale of material has been received from each of the following: Messrs. George Green, Church-street Manufacturing Co., Messrs. Inghams, Crescent Manufacturing Co., Mr. G. G. Graham, Levant Mill, and Messrs. R. Thompson & Sons. Other employers are looking-up suitable material to send to the committee. The articles, when completed, will be distributed to soldiers' wives and children, and those who are in need through industrial distress. Two girls, the Misses Shaw, of Milton-street, as a thank-offering for being in good work during the war, have sent £1 to the committee.

To-day the ladies of the committee, assisted by the ward visitors and other ladies, will sell red, white, and blue flowers, with the object of raising money for Queen Mary's Fund. Twenty-one gross of artificial flowers will be for sale.

Our representative called at the Technical Institute yesterday and saw the young ladies at work. They were all busily employed making useful garments, under the guidance of the Hon. Rachel Kay-Shuttleworth, the forewoman, and others. If the committee obtain the grant of £250 they ask for from the Central Fund they will be able to make splendid use of it by providing work for the workless girls.

Swinton Journal, Oct. 24th. 1914.

WORK FOR UNEMPLOYED.

The Distress Sub-Committee reported that 58 cases of distress had been dealt with during the week, the great majority being women. The assistance given comprised £12 17s. 10d. in cash and £5 7s. 7d. in food tickets. The total cases now on the books of the Committee are 139 women and 37 men. The position at the local mills and works is little altered from what it was a fortnight ago. The collieries are working five days per week, and several of the mills are on full time. That of Messrs. Monks Bros., Pendlebury, is now working, like Messrs. Gibb's, Moorside, until eight p.m. on urgent work, but except where Government orders have been received the outlook in the cotton trade is not good. At the Acme Mills, Pendlebury, 400 out of 900 operatives are partially employed, their working period being 35 hours per week. Newtown Mill closed yesterday for the week, and Messrs. Bold's mill has been closed all week. Owing to the large number of women workers thrown out of employment the Executive of the Relief Committee have decided to proceed with their scheme to provide sewing work. Arrangements are being made to start 25 workers to begin with, and Trinity School, Swinton, will probably be used as a centre.—At the schools' canteens 3,491 meals were served to necessitous children. The number on the books remains almost stationary at 300, most of whom are fed at the Town Hall, Pendlebury. The Trinity School, Swinton, and Independent Methodist [illegible] also u[illegible]

A WORD FOR THE WOMEN

There can be no question that as a nation we are not doing all that we ought to be doing for the women who find the bread snatched from their mouths as the result of the terrible war which is now being waged. The wives of the soldiers are being fairly well cared for—the Government are seeing to that—but we are doing nothing, or next to nothing, for the many thousands of single women and widows who week in and week out labour from early morn till late at night for a miserable pittance. These women, even when trade is brisk, are never more than one remove from starvation. The labour of women in all departments of industry is very badly paid for. They are an easy prey to the sweater, and he takes full advantage of their inability to help themselves by extracting from them the maximum of work for the minimum of pay. Now that trade has been dislocated by the terrible conflict which is being fought out on the Continent thousands of women find themselves without the miserable sums which they were wont to courteously describe as "wages." Queen Mary, all honour to her, recognising their sad position, set to work to raise a Work for Women Fund and appealed to the mayoresses of the various London boroughs to give their help. That assistance has been loyally given by the Mayoress of Camberwell. But it is one thing to organise a fund and quite another thing to administer it. The difficulty is to discover a suitable means of helping those who have been thrown out of employment by the war. The "Times" a day or two ago devoted a leading article to this subject. Our contemporary complained (and judging by the cases which have come under our own notice not without very good reason) that women in need are not being helped. This is what the "Times" said:—"Their story is that they go to the Central Committee, where they are sent on to the Labour Exchange, whence they are sent to the local committees, where they are told that there is no work for them. We know the difficulty of providing work and the need of a proper system, but there has been a good deal of time and opportunity for organisation, and the upshot does seem remarkably small. The Queen's Fund has been well supported, but its administration at present is more suggestive of experiments in education and social welfare than of the relief of urgent need, for which it was intended by Her Majesty." Somehow or the other the administration of charitable funds seems to get into the wrong hands. Instead of being administered by practical people, who thoroughly understand the situation the control of the money passes into the hands of those who mean well but who move in a circle which renders them quite unfit to judge the trials and sorrows of the woman worker. Hence it comes about that we have the whole thing hedged in by a barbed wire fence. Inquisitorial inquiries take the place of human sympathy and mistrust supplants charity. These times, full as they are of peril to the nation and of anxiety to the individual, are not the times in which to proceed on the lines of what by a strange misnomer is called "organised charity." THE WAR EMERGENCY FUND COMMITTEE.

MUCH GOOD WORK ACCOMPLISHED.

The Woking War Emergency Committee has now been at work for approximately two months, and it will doubtless interest readers to know something of what has been accomplished.

Up to Wednesday last the total amount received was £1,997 6s. 8d. The appeal for funds was first made over two months ago, and the committee cannot help feeling that the response to date will be found inadequate when the full demand for help occasioned by the war is felt. The committee cannot at this stage estimate what funds will be required before the war is over, but in view of the nearness of the winter they earnestly hope that everyone who has not contributed will do so promptly.

The bulk of the work has fallen upon two of the sub-committees—Men's and Women's Unemployment—and more especially on the latter. The Men's Unemployment Committee has not had many applications for employment, for the simple reason that there is very little unemployment amongst labourers in the district. Several men have, however, been found work by the committee, either with local employers, who have recorded their wants with the employment registry, or through the co-operation of the Guildford Labour Exchange, with which the registry is in frequent communication.

Actuated by the dual desire of helping the new army and of providing work for the wives of soldiers and sailors serving with the colours, the Women's Unemployment Committee undertook the organising of the washing of the clothes of over 2,000 of the troops encamped at the barracks. The clothes have been collected by carrier and brought to the Salvation Army Hall, kindly placed, free of charge, at the disposal of the committee by local army officials, and then issued to the little army of women anxious to be thus employed. The women engaged in the washing have been paid the actual amount which "Tommy" has had deducted from his pay for his washing. The other out-of-pocket expenses have been borne by the local fund. In this way the washing for 2,609 men has been dealt with in one week, and over forty women have been given employment, besides other women who have been engaged sewing on the marking tabs. The supervision of this work has been carried out by a devoted band of ladies, some of whom have been called upon to give 12 hours a day for three and sometimes four days per week.

Much other useful work has been accomplished by the War Emergency Committee. Public meetings have been held to gather in recruits for the King's forces. Quantities of fruit have been collected from generous donors, and conveyed to the various local camps for distribution. On the approach of the colder nights an urgent appeal for blankets was issued in the district, with the result that over 600 were collected and delivered to the troops. A successful war lantern lecture has been organised, and a profit of £17 7s. 6d. realised. The Public Hall was, by the kind generosity of Mr. R. N. Stevens, placed by him at his personal cost at the disposal of the committee, and Messrs. Kerrison and Company, Ltd., posted the bills for the lecture free of charge.

Last, but by no means least, the committee has, by the generous kindness of the medical men of Woking, established a free medical scheme for the wives and dependents of soldiers and sailors actually needing such assistance, as well as others in distress in consequence of the war. The medicines prescribed under the scheme will also be provided free.

The Woking Urban Council has extra men employed on works of improvement, and, if the necessity arises, other public work will be put in hand.

Closely allied to the War Emergency Fund, which in part finances it, is the Soldiers' and Sailors' Families' Association. The work thrown upon the local branch has been prodigious, largely owing to the constant changes made by the War Office in the regulations as to "separation allowances," and in some cases by the delay of the various Army pay offices in dealing with the documents sent to them for registration, and the issue of the "ring papers." When, if ever, finality is reached in the regulations, the work of the association will be lessened, but pending that time the Army—both old and new—have cause to be deeply grateful for the large amount of honorary work carried out on behalf of those they have been called upon to leave behind.

EARLY CLOSING REGULATION.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE MORNING ADVERTISER.

SIR,—Will you allow me, through your valuable paper, to make a protest against all this early closing of licensed houses, and to ask—What is to become of all the staffs which are being thrown out of work? There are hundreds of girls and women, to say nothing of the men who are looking for work, and if one of them goes after anything different it is refused, as they have been serving behind a bar, and therefore, in the employer's view, are not fit to do anything else. If they are closing these places, why are other business places allowed to keep open? In dealing with all this money which is being subscribed not one word is said about barmaids. Will you tell us what is to become of us if this thing is going to continue? "Business as usual" is the motto, but they are not keeping their word. I am one of the many who have been thrown out of work by reduction of staff.—I am, Sir, yours, &c.,

WORKROOMS FOR UNEMPLOYED WOMEN.

Among the many good institutions for the relief of destitution doing excellent work are the workrooms opened by Mrs. W. H. Topham and Mrs. Stanley Mappin, at 12, Albert Hall-mansions, where women thrown out of employment owing to the war are found work. A most gratifying response has been made to the appeal for work, but more is still urgently needed owing to the increased number of women who are applying for help. Any kind of clothing can be made, and full details will be sent on application.

Bath Weekly Herald, Oct. 24 th. 1914.

RELIEF OF UNEMPLOYED WOMEN.

Sir,—Some weeks ago I called the attention of your readers to the work being done at Citizen House on behalf of women and young girls who were out of employment owing to the war. This work, under the management of Miss Helen Hope and Miss de Reyes, has been invaluable. The capacities of Citizen House, however, were limited to those girls able to make shirts and other garments, and not sufficient for dealing in addition with those unable to sew.

An influential committee has been formed for the purpose of dealing with the present condition of unemployed girls in Bath, and any future development during the war. Mr. Cedric Chivers is chairman of this committee, and he has most kindly handed over 39, Gay street to provide for the object in view. These premises are all that could be desired for the purpose.

On these new premises there are at present between 40 and 50 young girls (including those formerly at Citizen House). Those who can sew are employed in making shirts and other garments for our sailors and soldiers. Those who cannot sew in knitting socks, etc., for the same purpose. Care has been taken that this work does not come in any way into competition with the trade of the town.

The organisation cannot, of course, be run without funds, and some help may perhaps be obtained from the Prince of Wales' Fund, but the desire of the committee is, as far as possible, to make it self-supporting. Orders can now be given for shirts, socks, etc., or materials sent to be made up.

May I appeal to my friends in Bath, and to the citizens generally to go to 39, Gay street, and give orders for these garments, which will be sent to any regiment or ship desired, or if no special destination is required they will be sent under the direction of the committee to our soldiers and sailors serving at the front or in the camps at home.

Everyone giving an order will be making a gift to a soldier or sailor, and in addition bringing comfort into the homes of those in Bath, whom everyone with a kindly and sympathetic spirit would wish to help.

Yours faithfully,

A. GWYNNE-JAMES.

P.S.—Orders will be received by the lady in charge at 39, Gay street.

GATESHEAD WOMEN WORKERS' COMMITTEE.

The Gateshead Women Workers' Committee, which consists of representatives of the various women's organisations in the town, has inaugurated a scheme for dealing with unemployment among girls and women, particularly dressmakers and seamstresses. A shop, 46½, High West Street, kindly lent to the committee by Mr Mason, is being opened, and people who contemplate making gifts to our soldiers and sailors, to the military hospitals, to Belgian refugees, and to our own poor, are urged to put orders for the making of goods with the committee, who will place them with women requiring employment. All kinds of orders for work for women will be gladly accepted by the hon. secretary.

The National Union of Women's Suffrage Societies has generously placed the services of an organiser at the disposal of the committee to work the scheme.

The Scotsman, Oct. 24 th. 1914

The Scottish home industries in London are likely to benefit to some extent this winter by the demand for comforts for the wounded soldiers and sailors in the war. Queen Mary, who from the first has shown a warm interest in this movement for the welfare of poor working women in the Highlands and Islands, has, I understand, recently purchased a considerable quantity of woollen sweaters and socks from the Orkney and Shetland home industries. This enterprise has been carried on for the last five years at a depôt in Beauchamp Place, Pont Street, by a lady who has long resided in Sandsting, Shetland, where she gives employment to about fifty young women in knitting gloves and other articles for winter wear. Another group of workers are employed in Orkney in making excellent wicker chairs, work baskets, and other useful articles. Queen Alexandra and members of the Royal Family are regular patrons of the Orkney and Shetland home industries.

The Daily Telegraph, Oct. 26 th. 1914.

WORK FOR STEPNEY WOMEN.

The Mayoress of Stepney (Mrs. Chidgey) writes from the Town Hall, explaining the details of a scheme which is being carried on in the borough, by which an opportunity is afforded to poor women whose income has been reduced in consequence of the war to earn a little money by doing work in their own homes.

The scheme is as follows: Garments are cut out and given to these women three times a week to take home and make. Each garment is paid for as it is brought back. Materials and wages have so far been provided out of private subscriptions, and if the articles made can be sold, the work can be continued on a self-supporting basis.

Mrs. Chidgey does not ask for donations, but appeals to ladies and others who are proposing to give clothing to various charities or to the Belgian refugees, that instead of making these articles themselves, they should purchase those made by the poor women of Stepney. In this way two good results can be obtained—charitable gifts of clothing on the one hand and work for the needy on the other.

If preferred, the Mayoress would be willing to have materials made up which are supplied by ladies themselves. There are three of these establishments already in active operation in the borough, and if sufficient support can be obtained more can be opened, for which there is ample demand.

Yorkshire Observer, Oct. 26th 1914.

An Unemployment Difficulty.

It seems to be generally admitted by those who are engaged in finding work for the unemployed that there are certain classes of workers from whom little that is effective is being done. Many firms in order to face war conditions have reduced their staff of clerks and typists. For such people it is impossible to find new work of the same kind, and almost impossible to find work of a different kind for which they are suited. Many occupations, especially manual ones, are such that they fit persons more or less well for other occupations. The various agencies now dealing with unemployment have taxed their ingenuity without success to find new avenues of work for clerks and typists. The women especially are in difficulty. Many girls of middle-class families remain at home during the crisis, but there are large numbers of them who have not this resource. In the universal solicitude for those whose distress is caused by the war they deserve a place. They have furnished a very awkward question for the committees, but it is a question to which some sort of answer should be found.

Liverpool Courier, Oct. 26th 1914.

UNEMPLOYMENT QUESTION.

Suggestion by the Rev. H. D. Roberts.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE COURIER.

SIR,—We are all concerned about the conditions of employment owing to the war. The Town Hall Committees are no doubt engaged in the elaboration of inclusive schemes of work. That schemes are imperatively necessary no one can doubt who knows anything of the extent of unemployment amongst women. More may be said on this subject when the nature and extent of the schemes are made public.

In the meantime there is one industrial occupation that can be aided by a willing and ready response on the part of citizens of goodwill. This is the bookbinding trade. The number of men engaged in this trade in Liverpool alone (excluding Bootle) is about 300; the number of women and girls 800. This week I have visited three bookbinding establishments, which in their variety of work may be taken as typical of the trade in our city. In one shop I found only the employer and a female relative; in another several men and women had been discharged, and all who were still at work were on short time; in the third the employer pointed to an empty place where a man of twenty years' standing had been discharged, to the evident regret of the master. It is unfortunately safe to say that at least 30 per cent. of the employes are out of work, and 50 per cent. are on short time. We note (1) that the trade normally employs 1,100 people; (2) that this in normal times is the busiest season of the year; and (3) that over 300 are now not employed at all, whilst over 500 workers are on short time. The reason assigned is, simply, the war.

I believe that all told the number of women for whom work is provided by the Relief Committees amounts to 100 or thereabouts. Here in this particular trade, if only work comes in, from 300-800 willing workers can be helped to a considerable extent, and this desirable end may be attained by the use of means and machinery ready to hand.

Can we provide the necessary work? There is no doubt in my mind that we can.

How many of us have magazines, pamphlets, music, &c., that will be the more convenient when neatly bound? And we know how greatly bound volumes are appreciated by our valiant Fleet.

Some thousands of us, I am certain.

The bookbinding trade, we may remark, is not notoworthy for liberal pay to girls and women. The employer lamented this fact, but confessed that in the face of competition he could not afford to set the example of paying better and more adequate rates. I have, however, been able to make a provision in regard to work which is sent in owing to this public appeal. Certain firms have agreed to pay girls of 18 or over at the rate of 3d. per hour, or more, for all orders given by public spirited citizens at this critical juncture in our national history, and the manager of the Liverpool Booksellers' Co., 70, Lord-street, has consented to be the channel through which the results of this plea shall pass. Please signify that the labour payment is to be at bookbinding war rates. Bulky parcels will be called for.

This is only one particular arrangement, and can be extended. Perhaps the Unemployment Committee of the Relief Fund may back up and enlarge the operation. But here is an immediate means of succouring hundreds of workers by using the ordinary machinery of the trade and at something approaching fair rates of pay. Who will help? (P.S.—My telephone number is 3534 Royal.) Yours, &c.,

EMPLOYMENT OF WOMEN.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE TIMES.

Sir,—Lady Crewe's letter in The Times of to-day is, so far as it goes, an encouraging response to the comments contained in your leading article on the administration of the funds subscribed by the public towards providing employment for the immense number of women workers who have lost their means of livelihood owing to the war. Your article gave an indication of a widespread feeling of anxiety on behalf of the educated professional workers whose necessities cannot be met by the prevailing nostrum of the workroom remedy, excellent as it may be for other classes of less educated and trained labour. Even here it by no means covers all the ground claimed for it by enthusiastic theorists. The necessities of educated and trained women of superior intelligence and refinement whose specialities do not admit of workroom treatment have nevertheless an equal claim to recognition. Their problem, as Lady Crewe says, is one of extreme difficulty, and for that reason deserved all the more attention from the first. It is gratifying to hear that it is now taken into serious consideration, for I fear the need is growing very urgent. I am glad to know that the claims of the trained secretaries and typists have been brought before the committee. They fortunately possess a small and struggling union, quite inadequate to their needs, but testifying to the unselfish generosity so common among women workers. More difficult still and equally pressing is the problem of the visiting teacher of special subjects in private families and schools. These being in a sense purveyors of luxuries, were among the first to be retrenched, and possessing, I am told, no organization of their own, have no representatives to plead their cause. Their needs do not come before the public, but are none the less real on that account. There are also many professional speakers, usually employed by other than suffragist societies, now thrown out of work. But I must not trespass further on your space. My only excuse for doing so is my desire to express the anxiety felt by many that the funds subscribed by people of all classes and of all shades of opinion should be administered on the broadest lines to meet the necessities of the highly educated no less than of the manual workers.

Yours faithfully,
MABEL BIRCHENOUGH.

CITY TRADE IMPROVING.

Unemployment Committee and the Women Workers.

Speaking in Manchester last night, Councilllor Margaret Ashton said trade in the city was improving every day, but the steps taken to provide work for unemployed women were inadequate.

The Unemployment Sub-committee of the Relief Committee had opened a workroom, where women were making toys and dressing dolls, and they were preparing to add to that scheme. The difficulty of finding fresh openings for them in an overstocked market was great, as she believed that to start anything but well paid trades would be useless at the present time. It would require the co-operation of the trade unions, the employers, and employes before the committee could say they were on a sound basis regarding measures for relieving distress in Manchester.

In order to provide work for women who would otherwise be unemployed, owing to the war, a workroom has been established at the Queen-street Institute, Salford. This is being supervised by local ladies.

The Mayoress (Mrs. Desquesnes) writes pointing out that the work upon which they are engaged consists very largely of sewing and machining, for which purpose second-hand garments, or materials for making up clothing, will be welcomed.

A Dressmaker's Appeal.

Sir,—If you could show the need for women to support their regular private dressmakers you would help us—and many other firms similarly placed—to continue to keep a large staff of workers in employment who will otherwise inevitably be dismissed.

In the ordinary way our staff numbers about eighty, and after the summer holidays we took them all back, but it is impossible to pay wages and rent with "good intentions," and for the first time since we started (twenty years ago) we have been compelled to put them on short time. Unless something is done this short time will soon reach vanishing point, and fifty or sixty workers at least will be out of employment.

WAR AND LABOUR.

IS THERE JUVENILE UNEMPLOYMENT?

CONFLICTING STATEMENTS.

A conference convened by the Advisory Committee for Juvenile Employment of the Glasgow Labour Exchange was held last night in the City Chambers, when a discussion took place on the effect of the war on juvenile employment. Invitations to the conference had been sent to a number of school boards, including those of Glasgow and Govan; a large number of employers' associations, the Glasgow Relief Committee, the Soldiers' and Sailors' Families Association, the Scottish Committee for Women's Employment, the Juvenile Advisory Committee, and officials of the Labour Exchange. The discussion disclosed a division of opinion as to whether there was abnormal unemployment among juveniles at the present time, and the meeting was adjourned.

Mr Charles R. Gibson, who presided, explained the purpose of the conference. He said the question of the probable influence of the war on juvenile employment was discussed by the Executive Sub-Committee of the Advisory Committee on September 3, and on that date it was found on nquiry that at the Centra' Labour Exchange the number of girls on the register was three times more than it had been for some time past. Believing that unemployment would probably increase, and in view of the approaching school leaving day, at which a large number of children would be set free to seek employment, it was decided that some action should be taken in the matter. Discussing the proposals outlined on the agenda, he said that one of them was to continue the education of young persons who were about to leave school till there was employment for them. There was no idea of holding up labour. Children would be free to leave school when there was employment for them. It was also proposed that employers should be asked to give preference to young persons who had been at work and were unemployed through the present labour disturbance. Relief committees might be asked to make grants to necessitous families where possible in maintenance allowances for young persons continuing their education at school.

Mr Clark, clerk to Glasgow School Board, said that the Glasgow Board had written a letter advising parents to retain their children at school till they got suitable employment, and they had also made inquiries to find out to what extent temporary accommodation was needful. They had found that so far as the district of Glasgow School Board was concerned the number of young people who were free to leave school on November 1 was 1408. Of these 466 had already got offers of employment—that was a smaller figure than usual—leaving 942 who had not found employment up to the present day; and of these 509 had expressed their desire to continue at school in the meantime. Of the 942, 389 were boys and 553 girls.

Mr D. H. L. Young said he wanted to know if there really was a number of young persons unable to find employment.

Mr W. H. Howe, of the Labour Exchange, gave statistics taken from the nine Exchanges in Glasgow, showing that for the five weeks ended October 17, 1913, 392 boys and 340 girls registered, while for the same period this year 568 boys and 813 girls registered. The numbers remaining on the register at the end of the month were:—Last year, 77 boys and 88 girls; this year, 106 boys and 317 girls.

"CRYING OUT FOR APPRENTICES."

Mr D. H. L. Young said he was not satisfied with these figures. If the Labour Exchange had all these people upon their records and had not been able to employ them, then it was a mark against the Labour Exchange.

Mr James Macfarlane (of Macfarlane, Lang and Co.) said he could not get boys. He could, however, get girls.

Mr Miller, representing shipbuilding and engineering, said these industries were crying out for apprentices and could not get them.

Mr Roxburgh, Rutherglen School Board, said there seemed to be an idea that in trying to get boys and girls retained in the desirable conditions of continuing their very limited day school education they were making some kind of surreptitious attempt to stop boy or girl labour. He did not think that occurred to any of those who promoted the conference.

The Chairman pointed out that at November 1 there would be at the Labour Exchanges a long list of children who were available for work.

Councillor Charlton said that whether it was proved or not that there was abnormal unemployment among boys and girls at the present time they should provide for the future. He understood the Scottish Advisory Committee of the Prince of Wales's Fund were prepared to consider favourably the lybing of parents to keep their children at school.

Mr C. J. Cleland suggested the adjournment conference for three months.

GATESHEAD WOMEN WORKER COMMITTEE.

Where Orders May be Placed.

A scheme for dealing with the unemployment among the women at Gateshead is being organised by the Women Workers' Committee, which consists of representatives of the women's societies in the town.

Men and women who wish to give clothing and comforts to soldiers, refugees, and our own poor, are asked to give orders for garments at the shop, 46½, High West Street, Gateshead, which is being kindly lent for the purpose of the scheme by Mr. Mason. The Committee will place the needlework and knitting with women who are requiring work. All kinds of orders for work for women are requested, and the members feel confident that the public will respond readily to what will be practically a self-supporting scheme.

The arrangement of the work is being carried out by an organiser lent by the National Union of Women's Suffrage Societies.

Sussex Daily News,
October 28th. 1914.

Less Unemployment.

There are renewed indications that the extent of unemployment is less than even the most optimistic had imagined it must be at this period of the war. The question is largely one of readjustment, and the returns, therefore, show a progressive tendency to diminish. A London paper today announces that its advertisements offering employment to men constitute an absolute record. This is quite consonant with the state of affairs revealed in the Board of Trade figures. The percentage of idle workmen in the insured trades has dropped by '19 in the past week, and by 1·10 in a month. There are slight decreases, too, in the numbers on the Labour Exchange registers, and it is gratifying to see that the figures relating to women are more satisfactory. I am told that the Central Committee on Women's Employment has received schemes from seventeen of the twenty-nine London boroughs. The Queen's Fund now amounts to about £70,000, and the value of the training centres is beginning to be felt.

Work for Women Wanted.

Unemployment among London women, however, is great. The Committees are bestirring themselves, and many have submitted schemes for providing work in connection with the Queen's "Work for Women Fund." Camberwell, where live the dressmakers who depend on the prosperity of the West-End establishments, is naturally suffering severely, and so is Battersea, with its tailoring and dressmaking population. Bermondsey, Bethnal Green (where the distress among cabinetmakers is acute), Shoreditch, Deptford, and Hoxton, in each of which there are armies of out-of-work charwomen, kitchen-hands, box-makers, and poorly-paid factory workers, are in urgent need of assistance. The same story comes from Islington, Finsbury, Holborn, and Chelsea, and in this time of distress among the women of the London industrial boroughs it is true indeed that he who gives quickly to the Queen's Fund for providing work gives twice. Every effort is being made to extend the schemes for providing it, but urgency is the keynote of all the appeals which are pouring in upon the Central Committee. In the various districts the inhabitants are doing their share nobly, and the committee gratefully acknowledges the fact that in no single instance has rent had to be paid for workrooms, which in some cases have also been furnished through local generosity, and often with the help of those to whom such assistance has meant considerable sacrifice.

ISLINGTON WOMEN'S WORKROOM.

A PEEP INTO THE DEPARTMENTS.

MARVELS IN ECONOMY.

A fine old house, with big, airy rooms, massive chimney pieces, ceilings beautifully moulded, a fine old house—but apparently as dead as a door nail. Its last flicker of life departed when the last young lady left its portals which for many years had admitted many such young ladies to the wide realms of knowledge and erudition. It gave up the ghost as a school and lay for a long time inanimate off Canonbury-place, and autumn leaves fell and buried the garden and the playground as though they were attempting a decent burial of the whole premises. There had never seemed a house so dead.

But towards the end of the Autumn of 1914 something happened. The front door was opened and a whole troop of ladies whisked in accompanied by one or two men folk, and after visiting the rooms and tapping walls and mantelpieces, departed, but came again next day. Lots of other people came and soon almost every room of the old house was alive again and busy, people were bustling about all over it, while even the kitchen breathed again with exhalations that suggested the savoury idea of good roast beef and pudding.

THE EXPLANATION.

Now, the explanation of this sudden resuscitation of the old mansion in Canonbury-place was that a number of ladies and gentlemen—ladies chiefly, no doubt—hit upon a plan for relieving the distress of workless women and at the same time producing garments of descriptions which would be invaluable to those families in distress by reason of the war. In short, they established Workrooms for Women, and what better place could they have found than the old house in Canonbury-place? Mr. Warman kindly approached the owners of the premises—the Public Schools Trust. Consent was readily given, and "Sesame!" the old doors opened, the house lived again, and the wind swept away the leaves in the paved yard, protesting it was a case of premature burial.

Yesterday afternoon a representative of the DAILY GAZETTE visited the rooms and spent a most interesting time in a round of the various departments and examining the handiwork of the busy workers.

THE SCHEME.

Before, however, describing the operations it may be as well briefly to outline the working of the scheme. The work is financed by Queen Mary's Fund, and the aim is to find work for women and girls out of employment by reason of the war, and who have registered at the Labour Exchange. The workers spend their time knitting and sewing and adapting articles for distribution to families in Islington distressed by reason of the war. Nothing is sold, so there is no competition with trading concerns. The material is supplied by numerous kind donors, and the amount of employment given is largely regulated by the quantity of material sent in. At present about 150 are engaged, and it is estimated that the place could find a working capacity of 200.

The women are paid 3d. a day, and are guaranteed 40 hours work a week. They work from nine to five, and have an hour for dinner. The women and girls employed comprise a great many dressmakers, while typists and clerks are amongst the number. In fitting up the premises the committee were fortunate indeed. The Gas Company put up gas stoves free of charge. The Borough Council provided chairs and tables, while other necessary furniture was kindly sent by furnishing houses of the locality. Another appreciated concession is that of the Borough and Water rates.

A TOUR OF INSPECTION.

The busy clicking of a typewriter greets the ear on entrance to the hall. This comes from the room dedicated to the secretarial department. Here all manner of letters are being typed—a large percentage being letters of appeal, for the committee pride themselves on being brazen beggars with the accompaniment of tact, however, which achieves the desired end. Here on the ground floor is also the inquiry and committee room, where the candidates for work are interviewed and meetings are held. A little farther on is the kitchen, where quite a large staff is employed preparing the meals of the 150 workers. Dinner is provided at the modest charge of 3d. Roast beef and baked potatoes and rice pudding and stewed apples was the menu on Monday. Yesterday mutton broth and currant pudding was the order. Near the kitchen is the dining-room. The tables at the time of our visit were spread with white cloths for tea. On the other side of the passage is what was once the school hall. This is to serve for the holding of entertainments and social gatherings in the coming days.

THE BUSY BEES.

Upstairs on the first floor, after a peep at the ironing room and admiring the gas fittings for heating the irons, we passed to the work rooms proper, which we found as busy as a bee hive. The bees worked at long tables looking clean, happy and contented as they plied needles, scissors and knitting pins. They were making almost every thing that can be made with needle and cotton. In the sewing room, material which had been sent in was being fashioned into baby's clothes, clothes for children, shirts for men, and garments for women. The ingenious economy and methods of adaptation exercised was a marvel to a mere man. We saw an admirable pair of diminutive nether garments for a boy. They had been fashioned from mere scraps of cloth of the same pattern. But you would never see the joins. They were artfully schemed just where you would not see them. We had a peep into the store cupboard. Here was such a display of warm things for all ages. Skirts, petticoats, shirts, belts, jackets, trousers, mittens, vests, overalls, caps, millinery. These will make all the difference between comparative comfort and desolating misery in many a home in the days that are to come. Amongst the firms which have kindly sent material are Messrs. Selfridge, Messrs. Rackstraw, and Messrs. D. H. Evans. A large quantity has also come from private donors. "Islington people have been extremely good," is the opinion of the committee. But more is wanted.

THE TRIUMPH.

The triumph in economy which finally took the GAZETTE man's breath away was found in the knitting room. He saw great bales of flannelly-looking stuff being knitted into thick squares which he was told would finally be joined together and made into warm bed quilts. The material used was mere "waste," the selvedges torn from the yards of flannel which are being made into garments. This seemed the last word in the science of economy. Not a bit of stuff is wasted. Even the flannel snippings are gathered up and made into cushions.

The second floor is the receiving and sorting department. Here the second-hand clothes are dealt with and arranged in order ready for alteration and adaptation. The committee appeal for gifts of left-off clothing, not too old. Women's and children's boots and shoes are a particular necessity. Very few have been sent in. Islington ladies are asked to remember. "Boots, boots, boots" is the cry of the committee. All sorts of woollen material and clothes which can be made up again are wanted by the ladies.

Mrs. Abbott is the chairman of the committee; Mrs. Holman is the hon. secretary; and Miss Michael, the hon. treasurer. Others prominently associated with the work are Miss M. B. Brown, Miss J. Clarke, and Miss Gill.

Women Workers in Distress.

Attention has frequently been directed in our columns to the sad plight in which hundreds of women workers find themselves in Belfast owing to the destruction of their means of livelihood by the war. As yet the greater industries have not been so seriously affected; but the disemployment of many outworkers, and of educated young women who maintained themselves as type-writers and in other occupations, is a matter of urgent seriousness, though it has not attracted general attention on this side of the Irish Sea. In London the necessity for prompt action is becoming recognised; and several letters to the principal papers have been published on the matter. The problem is "full of extreme difficulty," says one writer, "and for that reason deserved all the more attention from the first. It is gratifying to hear that it is now taken into serious consideration; but I fear the need is growing very urgent. I am glad to know that the claims of the trained secretaries and typists have been brought before the committee. They fortunately possess a small and struggling union, quite inadequate to their needs, but testifying to the unselfish generosity so common among women workers. . . . . My only excuse . . . is my desire to express the anxiety felt by many that the funds subscribed by people of all classes and of all shades of opinion should be administered on the broadest lines to meet the necessities of the highly educated no less than of the manual workers." The educated and the "manual workers" amongst women in Belfast and other places are suffering bitterly; but up to the present moment no practical steps towards securing for them a fair share of the National Relief Fund appears to have been taken.

WORKROOMS FOR WOMEN.

Mrs. Percy Abbott, chairman of the committee of the Islington Workrooms for Women, writes to us in reference to our recent article upon the Canonbury centre:

We really feel quite flattered by the very kind report you have given us.

I note that one error, probably the printer's, has crept into the report, and I should be so glad if you would give the correction as prominent a place as possible, viz., that the women are paid 3d. an hour and not 3d. a day. [We have already made this point quite clear.]

Your readers will probably be quite interested to know that the workers earn 2s. a day, and that their hours are from nine till one o'clock and from two till five. They are thus paid for the dinner hour, and are allowed a quarter of an hour for tea. In addition, we pay 5d. for National Insurance for each worker, and we give every facility to workers to return to their ordinary work when opportunities arrive. In fact, we arrange that the workers attend at the Labour Exchange once a week.

Glasgow Evening Times Oct 30th 1914.

The emergency workrooms for women at 281 Cathedral Street, consisting of two houses placed at the disposal of the Scottish Council for Women's Trades by the Misses M'Arthur, 30 Montgomerie Drive, are now employing 54 girls. The scheme has already been described in the "Citizen," and Miss Irwin, the secretary, invites the public to inspect the rooms from between 2.30 and 4 p.m., except on Saturdays and Mondays. Information has been collected by the council with a view to training some girls in toy-making. Other ways of giving work to unemployed girls are being considered.

WORK FOR WOMEN.

A National Land Council has been formed to encourage co-operative rural industries. One of its chief objects at the present time will be to provide employment for women who have been thrown out of work in consequence of the war. The idea is to organise poultry-farming schemes, by means of which, it is thought, women will secure suitable occupation. The plan seems a promising one. The demand for poultry and eggs is always so great that the enterprises should prove commercial successes, provided, of course, that adequate measures are taken to meet the preliminary difficulties, and to give the women farmers a fair start. The National Council will see to these matters, and it will also have the advantage of advice from the Board of Agriculture.

SIDE ISSUES OF WAR.

SELECTED LETTERS.

WOMEN AND UNEMPLOYMENT.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE TIMES.

Sir,—May I add something to the letter of Mrs. Birchenough in your issue of 26th? In considering the needs of the women of the classes which do not come under the heading of industrial workers, several factors have to be considered.

In the first place, such women are almost entirely unorganized, and one of the first lessons for these is the necessity, under modern conditions of labour, of greater cohesion among all workers in a particular craft. Of the many who are now registering at the centres of recognized professional associations comparatively few made any attempt to support those associations in normal times. It is to be hoped that the present opportunity of organization will not be lost.

In the second place, large numbers of women and girls who have crowded into clerical work are not, by education or training, fitted for anything but mechanical tasks, nor do they care to improve themselves. It would be a great advantage if many of these could be drfated off to other trades, but nothing save the severest compulsion will induce them to take the step downwards (in their view) to domestic work.

There is in consequence a movement to secure for the girl of the professional and middle classes a training in domestic science, and if this is successful we shall soon see the despised craft of household management resuming its proper and honourable place in women's work. The war will certainly bring many of us back to simpler methods of life, and the suffering it entails will not be wasted if, through it, the middle-class woman regains her kingdom, becoming really the mistress of her home and not the slave either of social exigencies or the caprices of other women, whom she is obliged to employ for duties of which she herself is entirely ignorant.

The salient feature in the present crisis is the existence of a large body of unorganized, and practically untrained, women workers. The capable educated ones need only temporary help, but whatever form the scheme of the Queen's Committee for clerical workers may take, it is to be hoped that it will not be merely a system of relief works. Such works are almost invariably expensive, and they tend to stereotype the conditions which they are intended to relieve. The aim to keep in view is to give training rather than relief employment, and to widen the area of work, and training in housecraft has this advantage over every other, that, even if it is not used as a profession, it is always indispensable for all women, as a matter of daily need.

From the national point of view the ignorance of the Englishwomen of all classes in this respect has been, in the past, little short of a disaster, and the opportunity for putting a large number through a practical training is too good to be lost.

Yours, &c.,
ETHEL COLQUHOUN (Mrs. Archibald Colquhoun).

LONDON UNEMPLOYED.

DISTRESS AMONGST WOMEN.

In a report forwarded to the Local Government Board on the conditions of labour throughout the metropolitan area last week, the Central (Unemployed) Body for London state that 1,013 applications were made by men for work. Compared with the figures of the preceding seven days, this was a falling off of 231. On the other hand, 8,310 women registered, a total which was much in excess of any experienced in former years. The highest previous total, 524, was recorded to Nov. 4, 1911. There were noticeable individual increases at Southwark, Westminster, and Woolwich, and noticeable decreases at Bethnal-green, Hackney, and St. Pancras. At Southwark the total reached was 1,057 This was larger by 310 than for any other distress committee.

WORK FOR HULL GIRLS.

Miss Muriel Wilson Explains.

TEMPORARY EMPLOYMENT SCHEME.

The other day the "Mail" called in casually at the emergency work rooms for girls, at 74, Prospect-street. This is an unoccupied shop, and the few mats on the floor and a desk or two hardly disguise the fact. The counter still remains, and behind it was Miss Muriel Wilson, who looked business-like in such environs. From the workroom upstairs came the faint hum of sewing machines, where young women were turning out garments for soldiers, or in accordance with other orders that came along. Miss Wilson endeavoured to maintain a conversation with the "Mail," but it was rather hopeless because there were so many young women callers Some brought back socks they had knitted, and others garments, whilst the "Mail" representative's thoughts were quickly confused by a medley of questions and answers concerning the socks and the size of needles, number of stitches, length of foot, and so many inches before arriving at the welt. Never before had one imagined so many mysteries attached to the knitting of a pair of socks.

HINTS ON SOCKS

Mrs Oswald Sanderson and Miss Muriel Wilson are taking the leading part in what is most essential work in finding temporary employment for young milliners, dressmakers, and other young women who find themselves out of work indirectly through the war.

"We are anxious to get materials, wool, and all the help we can," said Miss Wilson, "in finding work for the girls, but the moment they can get other work they can leave us at a moment's notice. In fact, we want them to get work in the ordinary course, because we ourselves do not know how long we can keep on. They come at 9.30 in the morning, have an hour for lunch, and leave for the day at 4 o'clock."

Asked if there was any objection to stating the terms of pay, Miss Wilson replied: "Not at all; we pay them 3d an hour, and they earn about 8s 6d a week, but they are not required to work hard."

Miss Wilson was further explaining that rolls of grey flannel for shirt-making would be useful gifts when, with another caller, she entered upon a disquisition on socks once more, and as the hint may be useful one ventures to repeat that Miss Wilson stated the foot must be 11 inches, the leg 11 inches, and then start the heel For knitting a pair of socks a shilling is paid, and the wool provided free, so that from this item alone it will be seen funds are needed. Incidentally it may be added here that our generous readers who help the "Mail" knitting fund are assisting this emergency work for girls. Work is also given out to women in need at their own homes after careful inquiry as to circumstances. In the cosy workroom upstairs the "Mail" observed nearly twenty young women at work, glad of the emergency work till the time they could get back to their old or new situations

The ladies connected with this emergency work also include Mrs Birkinshaw, Mrs Walford, and Mrs Travers, and they have some generous friends Mr Wells, of Sheffield, has loaned the shop free of charge, and Mr Bladon, Hammond's, and Davis's, amongst others have lent machines and similar requirements. At the time the "Mail" arrived a welcome order came along from the officers and friends of the Royal Horse Guards at the front in which Miss Wilson's nephew, Mr Arthur Wilson, the son of Mr Arthur Stanley Wilson, M.P., is a lieutenant. They sent along a bale of flannel to be made into shirts for the men. The girls have made several hundred shirts, and are most proficient in this department.

PROFESSIONAL CLASSES AND THE WAR

Relief Council and Its Scheme

No classes in the country are being more badly hit by the present crisis than the professional, and we gladly give publicity to a scheme for amelorating their hardships which seems both comprehensive and well-matured. The Professional Classes War Relief Council has its offices at 13 and 14 Prince's Gate, London. Major Leonard Darwin, President of the Eugenics Education Society, is its provisional Chairman, and the Honorary Secretaries are Mr. Theodore G. Chambers, Mr. Alexander Goddard, and Mrs. Gotto. As at present constituted, the Council is composed of the following members, along with the Chairman and the honorary secretaries. There will be important additions to it, as is explained later on:

Miss K Andrews, Secretary, Incorporated Association of Assistant Mistresses in Public Secondary Schools; Mr. A. L. Bowley, Lecturere at the London Echool of Economics; Mr. B. I'Anson Breach, Past President, Auctioneers' and Estate Agents' Institute; the Countess of Caccillis; Mr. R. F Cholmeley, Hon. Secretary, Incorporated Association of Headmasters; Mr. H. Chatfield Clarke, President, Surveyors' Institute; Miss K. D. Courtney, National Union Women Suffrage Societies (Relief Organisation); Mr. Harold Cox; Miss Craig, Assistant Secretary, Central Bureau for Employment of Women; Mrs. Creighton, President, Union of Women Workers; Mrs. Henry Fawcett, President, National Union of Women's Suffrage Societies; Mr. H. M. Fletcher, Hon. Secretary, Architectural Association; Miss Green, Secretary, National Union of Women Workers; Mr. C. Harris, Secretary, Auctioneers' and Estate Agents' Institute; Mr. G. H. Heath, Secretary, Assistant Masters' Association; Mr George Hubbard, Vice-President Royal Institute of British Architects; the Hon. G. W. Lascelles, Chairman, Benevolent Fund, Land Agents' Society; Miss S. Lawrence, Central Committee on Women's Unemployment; Miss F. M. Leaf, Press Emergency Fund; Mr. I. MacAlister, Secretary, Royal Institute of British Architects; Sir J. M'Clure, President, Headmasters' Association; the Duchess of Marlborough, Womens Emergency Corps; Mr. C. Marshall, Secretary, Land Agents' Society; Mr. J. Martin, Secretary, Society of Incorporated Accountants and Auditors; Miss Morison, Headmasters' Association; Mr. E. Newton, President, Society of Bri. .a Architects; Mr. H. C. Peake, Past President, Institution of Mining Engineers; Miss Robertson, President, Headmistresses' Association; Mrs. Scharlieb, M.D.; Mr. P. Strzelecki, Secretary, Institution of Mining Engineers; Mrs. K. Tarpey, Women's Emergency Corps; Mr. P. B. Tubbs, President, Society of Architects; Mrs. A. Tweedie, Incorporated Society of Authors; Sir J. Tweedy, President, Royal Medical Benevolent Fund; Mr. P. Waterhouse, Architects' War Committee; Dr. S. West, Treasure, Royal Medical Benevolent Fund; Mr. J. T. Woolley, President, Auctioneeers' and Estate Agents' Institute; Mr. F. R. Yerbury, Secretary, Architectural Association; Mr. G. Udny Yule, Lecturer in Statistics, Cambridge University.

HOW THE PROFESSIONS ARE HIT.

It has been obvious from the outbreak of war that many in the professional classes must suffer severely, but there were reasons why recognition of this fact, in the shape of a special organisation, should have been delayed until now. The most urgent call was for consideration of the families of our fighting men. It may be remarked in passing that literally to the ranks of these are being daily added members of the professions, who have not, of course, any claim on the funds for officers' families. Besides the fighters there are also the poor whose poverty is due to the war. For the alleviation of distress in both these classes it was imperative to collect at once large funds, which happily now exist and will continue to swell. But apart from such prior claims on the relieving energies of the country, there are explanations of the delay in tackling the question of distress among the professional classes. For one thing, these classes have no mind to make their hardships known, nor a machinery for doing so. Then, again, war breaking out when it did, the summer holiday was in many cases cancelled, and the consequent saving of a necessary but often trying annual expense may well have lulled many professional men with the assurance of a useful and unexpected economy having been achieved. The date of the outbreak also postponed for some weeks a decision upon a very heavy item in the budget of many professional families, the education of the children. These are one or two of the causes for the inevitable pinch during the war being kept at bay i nfact, and probably also there was an inclination to hold it at bay in contemplation. For this crisis is of such a kind that the higher the intelligences the more completely are they absorbed by its causes and course, and to the trained intelligences of the professional classes it did no doubt seem a sort of duty to put off the individual account with Fortune, and to give all their energy of mind, as well as often of body, to the national fortunes in the struggle But this vacation from anxiety, and from the need to face anxiety in the open, was bound to come to an end, and has in many cases come to an end already. Questions of ways and means no longer admit of postponement. They are now urgent, though most often they may be battled in silence. And it is to discover and to bring a self-respecting assurance to such cases that the Professional Classes War Relief Council has come into existence.

CONSTITUTION AND AIM.

We can only indicate now the general constitution and aims of the Council. It will immediately occur to many that the professions are organised, and that professional institutions have benevolent funds on which members in stressed circumstances can depend. But those who know the conditions are aware that a very great many professional men are not in any way, or only inadequately, organised. The problem set the Council for the Relief of the Professional Classes thus showed at once two conditions, which remain distinct in its programme. Then it might also be thought—and probably this was at one time the opinion of many of the promoters of this scheme—that the first of these conditions need not be considered in it, since the organised members of the professions might well be left to the responsibility of their respective funds. As their scheme matured, however, it revealed to the Council a quite other conclusion. To the different professional institutions, it is true, will be left responsibility for their members, and with the manner in which they discharge their responsibility the Council has not the remotest desire or intention to interfere. But it is believed that as a kind of consultative body the Council could, if representative of these professional and other institutions and funds, perform a most useful service. A persual of its membership printed above shows that the Council is, as a matter of fact, representative in a very comprehensive sense already, and it only awaits the nominations to membership invited from other institutions, which have still to meet to consider the matter, in order to be made much more widely representative still. So that when the Council meets there will meet at it, through their representatives, the various Benevolent Fund Committees, to learn from one another much that will be useful to each. This is perhaps the new Council's chief function—to provide such a common meeting-place. Its aim, in a word, is to become a channel of communication between these committees and various societies organising relief, by means of which the purpose of all parties will be facilitated.

The Council has still another purpose in view, should funds be available. Money is required, and will, no doubt, be generously subscribed, so that the Council may itself initiate assistance in certain forms. This assistance where possible will be given through the agency of the existing Benevolent Funds Committees. But it will also be available for alleviating distress in the unorganised ranks of the same classes. In particular, in regard to the unorganised, the experience in dealing with middle-class distress on which it can draw will enable the Council to offer sound advice, especially as to methods of bringing the supply of professional capacity in touch with the demand for it. While the question of assisting individuals with money and the helping hand to work must not be overlooked, the other function, of acting as a kind of clearing-house of counsel for the various Committees engaged in relief, will be kept well in the foreground.

THE WORK OF SUB-COMMITTEES.

This, it will be recognised, is a very comprehensive scheme. It has not been announced before being well thought out, as is shown by the six Sub-Committees through which the Council's general purposes will be achieved in detail. These are Education, Maternity Assistance, Training and Emigration, Temporary Employment, Economics and Legislation, and Finance. A word or two upon each will illustrate further the scope and intention of the whole organisation

The Chairman of the Education Sub-Committee is Sir John M'Clure, President of the Association of Headmasters. Its purpose is, on the one hand, to assist parents of the professional classes during the war to send their children to school as early, and to keep their children at school as long, as they would have done in normal times; and, on the other hand, to help schools to tide over the present crisis by relieving them of embarrassments caused by the falling off in pupils. Those efforts are complementary. They must, it is evident, treat the problem in a great variety of ways, as the Committee, representative of many scholastic associations, are well able to advise.

The Maternity Assistance Sub-Committee has the help in its important work of a House Committee and a Medical Staff. Its Chairman is Mrs. Scharlieb, M.D. The Home like the offices of the Council, is at Nos. 13 and 14, Prince's- gate, the double house of Mr. Pierpont Morgan, who has placed it at the disposal of the organisation, rate and rent free, during the war. The Council has issued an appeal for furnishings and fittings such as many householders who are not able to subscribe funds may be willing to give or lend. The list of specific articles required ought to be consulted, and offers of them made first by letter to Mrs. Hills, 32 Prince's gardens. Other Homes will be opened in London and the provinces, and the services of trained voluntary nurses in private houses are contemplated.

Large questions are involved in the business of the sub-committee for training for favourable openings both at home and in the Dominions and for assisting emigration to the latter Like other aspects of the scheme, this particular effort points to a usefulness permanently, and not merly during the period of the war. Temporary employment again sufficiently indicate the general business of the sub-committee, of which Mrs. Percy Boulnois, representing the Women's Emergency Corps, is chairman. The workshops opened by that corps are specially mentioned as models.

Briefly, the Sub-Committee for Economics and Legislation will examine and report on all schemes submitted by the other committees, as well as consider the larger economic questions involved in the present situation as bearing on the administration of relief. The chairman is Mr. Arthur Bowley (London School of Economics), and the other members are Mr. Harold Cox, the Duchess of Marlborough, Mr. Ian MacAlister, Mr. H. E. Peake, Mr. Udny Yule, Miss K. D. Courtney, Professor Pigou, Professor Ashley, and Mr. Hartley Withers. Finally, a committee, with Mr. Chatfeild Clarke as chairman, will advise on the finance of the Council and superintend the financial arrangements in connection with centralised forms of assistance.

THE INDUSTRIAL SITUATION.

RETURNING PROSPERITY IN BIRMINGHAM TRADES.

SIGNIFICANT FIGURES.

A reassuring report on the industrial situation in Birmingham was presented to the Executive of the Citizens' Committee yesterday by Professor W. J. Ashley, their "Intelligence Officer." It states that the situation described in his report of September 30 has since changed only for the better. It was then pointed out that great activity and a good deal of overtime over the larger part of the field of employment—that concerned, directly or indirectly, with the production of war material—existed side by side with slackness and under-employment in certain other trades, such as jewellery, furniture making, printing, pens, and cycles; and the anticipation was expressed that the prosperity on the larger side would flow over on to the other, and beneficially affect the whole area of industry. There are many indications that this is beginning to be the case. It is a matter of common knowledge, also, that the great arms and munitions concerns and the makers of saddlery and accoutrements find it difficult to obtain a sufficient supply of trained labour, and are giving employment to an increasing number of workpeople from the depressed trades; not a few cabinet makers, for instance, are finding work in the making of wooden trees for cavalry saddles. It is an additional encouraging fact that a real beginning has now been made in more than one direction with the manufacture by employers in the depressed trades of goods previously obtained from Germany.

RETURNS FROM EMPLOYERS.

After pointing out that if there had been no war there would probably have been a falling-off in trade in some directions this autumn, in comparison with recent years of prosperity, Professor Ashley quotes figures confirming the statement in his previous report that in the week ended September 26 among 18,500 workers, fairly representative of the town as a whole, only 3 per cent. were totally unemployed—i.e., not more than in normal times—while 22 per cent. were working short-time and 28 per cent. working overtime. The figures have been furnished by manufacturing concerns employing some 33,700 persons, of whom three-fourths are men. They are engaged largely in the iron and steel manufactures characteristic of Birmingham. Comparing the last pay-days of September, 1913 and 1914, firms employing some 9,700 workpeople employed 9.4 per cent. fewer persons and paid 13.2 per cent. less wages, indicating (as the rates of wages had not been altered in the meantime) there was, in their case, a small amount of short time; firms employing 3,000 workpeople showed no change in either respect; while firms employing approximately 11,000 workpeople employed 21.8 per cent. more than in 1913 and paid 41 per cent. more wages, pointing to the fact that there was in their case a considerable amount of overtime. The wages figures are roughly equivalent to an increase of almost 14 per cent. over the whole number employed. From a particular group of employers representing 10,000 workmen, of whom 5,000 are not included in these returns, the average output for August and September, 1914, exceeded that for the same months of last year by more than 6 per cent.

REGISTERED UNEMPLOYMENT.

In regard to the month of October, fairly conclusive evidence of the improvement in employment is provided by the returns of the Birmingham Labour Exchanges. The figures for the insured trades (engineering, building, and construction of vehicles) are the most instructive, because in these trades all unemployed workpeople qualified for benefit are obliged to register, and almost all continue to do so even when benefit has run out. And these returns show the number of unemployed on the "Live Register" has gone down by hundreds every week, ever since the week ended August 28. The last available figures, those for October 23, show there were then in those trades actually 183 fewer men registered as unemployed than before the war. The figures for women have not yet reached so cheerful a level, but their numbers are only a quarter those of the men, and they also have been dropping off every week after September 4, at first by a few only, but of late more rapidly. From the uninsured trades, the number registered began to fall off, in the case both of men and women, after September 25; and on October 23 the number of men in these trades registered as out of work was 129 fewer than before the war. The registration of women in the uninsured trades fluctuates from week to week; but since September 25 the general movement has been downward. Among men one chief cause of lessened registered unemployment has, of course, been enlistment. On the other hand, the insistence by the Citizens' Committee on the use of the Labour Exchanges by applicants for relief was making them more generally known, and increased the number of registrations reported.

REVIVAL IN WOMEN'S TRADES.

Professor Ashley is informed by the officer in charge of the Women's Department that there has been a marked revival in the majority of trades for women in Birmingham during the present month. The saddlery trades are very busy; there is also a distinct improvement in the electro-plate trade, many button makers are engaged on Government work, an improvement is clear in the printing trade, and just discernible in the cycle business; while a good many dressmakers and tailoresses are turning to the making of knapsacks, canvas bags, bed covers, and similar work for the Government. The Juvenile Labour Exchanges are very conscious of improvement. During the four weeks ended October 24 they were notified, on an average, of 288 vacancies a week, and received from young people 374 applications for employment; while in the corresponding weeks of September the vacancies per week were only 222, and the applicants as many as 403.

From every side come indications of a return to prosperity. Thus the average daily number of free meals in Birmingham schools increased until the week ended October 3, when it reached 11,387. In the next two weeks it fell to 10,439 and 9,082 respectively. There can be little doubt this is partly due to the more liberal scale of allowance to soldiers' dependents, and also to greater efficiency in the methods of payment. Similarly it is encouraging to find that since the week ended September 19 the number of persons in receipt of poor relief has every week decreased—in that ended October 17 by as many as 145 persons. It is now only 4 per cent. greater than it was before the war. The decline during the last few weeks is the more significant since last year there was an increase week by week during the same period.

UNEMPLOYMENT CASES RELIEVED.

Dealing with the total number of cases of unemployment attributed to the war receiving assistance from the Citizens' Committee, he states the number of cases open on October 16 was 3,244, representing, with children and other dependents, 14,962 individuals. The significance of figures such as these depends on their proportion to the whole population. They undoubtedly stand for a good deal of hardship and anxiety; but they are only 1.7 per cent. of the population of Birmingham. If the cases then closed are added, 1,219, together with their dependents—representing a total of 5,527 (many of whom, in fact, were refused as unsuitable)—the total is 20,499, which is only about 2.3 per cent. of the population. But in the last period of distress which visited Birmingham, the winter of 1904-5, relief was granted in thirteen weeks to 6.5 per cent. of the population. For various reasons the conditions then and now are not altogether parallel, but they are sufficiently alike to make people realise that the present distress must be much less than that accompanying a period of severe trade depression of the ordinary kind.

EMPLOYMENT IN MANCHESTER.

REPORT OF OFFICIAL ENQUIRY.

LESS APPLICANTS AT LABOUR EXCHANGE.

WOMEN'S TRADE SATISFACTORY.

That there has been no serious growth of unemployment in Manchester and district during the last fortnight will be seen from extracts, given below, which we make from a report prepared for the Local Government Board by Professor Chapman and Mr. T. Hudson (Town Clerk). Though there has been no serious increase in the amount of unemployment during the period named, there is, of course, still a considerable lack of work, but much of this has been absent since the first fortnight of the war. The position in regard to trades in which women are concerned is, however, decidedly encouraging.

The evidence furnished in the report is also corroborated by the statements made by Sir Thomas Shann, chairman of the Unemployment Sub-committee, made at yesterday's meeting of the Manchester Relief Committee. Sir Thomas stated that the manager at the Labour Exchange reported a decrease both in the number of applications for employment and also in the amount of money paid out in unemployment insurance.

According to the report of Professor Chapman and the Town Clerk, there is a distinct improvement in the state of affairs at the Women's Labour Exchange, despite an increase of 67 on the books, which is due to the closing down of textile firms in the district.

Printing, overall making, sweet making, and skirt and mantle making have experienced something of a revival, and the activity in the clothing trade has made it impossible for the moment to meet the demand for skilled machinists.

Recovery is due largely to orders which are exceptional (e.g., special Government orders). The number of shop assistants on the register is not large, possibly because reduced time and reduced pay seem to be the rule, instead of dismissals of staff.

The pressure on firms to engage more assistants seems to arise from applications from those who are on short time or reduced pay in other trades, and are anxious, if possible, to supplement their earnings.

The openings for domestic servants continue good in number, but lack of women with reliable references makes it impossible to fill the positions. Hardship exists among the dismissed restaurant hands and hotel kitchen helps, and also among the number of girls discharged from firms engaged in the fitting of small electrical parts.

Offiers to engage women in various kinds of work for their keep alone have been refused by the superintendent on the ground that the practice is demoralising and tends to create serious wages difficulties.

The Manchester inspectors report that only six cases of distress have been met with among the 287 out-workers visited during the past two weeks. The general shortage of home workers continues, but there is a slight improvement to report among umbrella workers.

The Salford Distress Committee has taken steps to provide employment principally for unemployed needle women and machinists, who constitute the largest section of registered unemployed skilled workers. The figures of the latter are:

Sewing and machinists	63	cases.
Tailoring	28	"
Waterproof garment makers...	8	"
Dressmakers	7	"
Capmakers	11	"
Corset makers	3	"

The plan is, in effect, that of the Manchester Women's Sewing Room, and the Salford Committee hopes to secure also the making of goods (e.g., shirts) for military purposes.

The following information has been obtained from certain unions of warehousemen who do not use the Labour Exchange. The state of employment of these men depends mainly on the condition of shipping, which has not recovered yet, though it may be depended upon doing so eventually when the stocks in foreign markets have been depleted and the conditions in the cotton market have become such as to make people believe that a moderately stable level of values has been reached.

Makers Up. (Society No. 1).—During the past fortnight the situation has not changed very much. If anything unemployment is rather worse. It is certainly no better. The situation has been relieved somewhat by the fact that about 40 members have joined the battalions raised in Manchester. The total membership of this society amounts to about 800. Of these not more than 70 or 80 are working full time. The majority are working from 3 to 4 days a week, but a large number not more than 1½ to 2 days.

Makers Up (Society No. II.).—In this society there are 310 members, of whom 53 have enlisted. At the present time only three are totally unemployed, but of the remainder very few are working more than two or three days a week. In many cases the men are earning just sufficient to keep them off the unemployed funds.

Regarding the provision of work for men, the Corporation have several schemes in hand as follows:

Road-Making.—New southern road leading from Manchester into Cheshire. Before this work can be commenced negotiations will have to be completed with the landowners. The City Surveyor does not anticipate that this work can be started this year.

Paving Works.—The Paving Committee are doing some additional paving, repairs and relaying of pavements to provide employment for paviors and paviors labourers, etc.

Barlow Hall—Purchase and Lake-making.—This work will afford employment to a large number of unskilled workmen at a reasonable distance from the most congested part of the city, but it is necessary to hold a Local Government Board inquiry, which cannot be done until the City Surveyor has completed the plans and estimates, etc., for the work, which are being expedited.

Main Drainage.—The City Surveyor is reporting to the Rivers' Committee upon intended works of main drainage, in order to avoid throwing out of employment a large number of men that are now engaged on works approaching completion.

Carrying companies are busy, and full permanent staffs are being employed at full wages. The Ship Canal Company reports slightly greater activity during the week. The Danish provision traffic is maintained (thirty vessels have discharged their cargoes here during the last three weeks).

The engineering department is now more active. On the whole the state of employment in the building trades remains fairly good. Such pressure of unemployment as exists is felt mainly by masons, painters, and decorators.

The temporary short time arrangements have given way to full time work again in most cases, and once more the master builders have rejected a proposal for organised short time, preferring to leave arrangements to each separate firm as the contracts fall out. The building of huts for the new battalions has relieved the shortage of work threatened among the joiners. Supplies of material are well maintained, and there is no immediate cause for anxiety.

In engineering there is no marked change. As the reports to the Board of Trade indicate, the number of those employed have not diminished, and the under-employment, which affects about one-third of the workers, is accounted for almost entirely by the short time worked by the textile machinery makers. In this section there is no immediate prospect of improvement. In other branches affected favourably by war orders, there is even some probability of a shortage of the right kind of labour, as 20 per cent has joined the Army.

Southport Visiter, Oct. 31st 1914.

SOUTHPORT NATIONAL AID SOCIETY. WOMEN'S EMPLOYMENT BUREAU.

Last week employment was found for 37 women and girls, who finished 98 garments, made 189 stuffed toys, and dressed 68 dolls. The committee is constantly hearing that Southport ladies would like to have more information about the workroom. The workroom is situated at the Friends' Meeting House, Portland-street, and has been open since October 5th. The applicants are all sent from the Labour Exchange, where they apply for work. Visiters are welcome every Friday afternoon. The office is open daily (Saturdays excepted), from 10 to 12, to give information and to receive orders for garments for those in distress. Material is always welcome for shirts or women's and children's clothes; and the committee wish particularly to thank those ladies who have kindly sent remnants of cloth, serge, flannel, etc. Small pieces are most useful in making garments for the children of Belgian refugees and others in distress. Ladies can also help by bringing their material to be made up by the workers when the garments made are to be given away to those in distress. The toys are sold only to the trade. They can be bought in local shops. The work of the bureau is commended to all who wish to do something for their unfortunate sisters who find themselves out of work owing to the war.

Glasgow Herald, Oct. 30th. 1914.

DISTRESS AMONG WOMEN WORKERS.

A GLASGOW RELIEF SCHEME.

While certain trades are more than usually busy with orders for war supplies, there are others which have been very hard hit, and the loss of work has resulted in severe economic stress among the employees. Female adult labour in many of its branches has been very seriously interfered with, and the curtailment of staffs has thrown a great many women on a stagnant market. The problem of providing remunerative work for them is admittedly one which presents many difficulties, but it has been faced in an eminently practical manner by the Scottish Council for Women's Trades. This organisation, which devotes a great deal of energy towards the abolition of sweating, has established emergency workrooms where it is furnishing employment for over 50 women and girls whose means of livelihood has been taken from them owing to the war. The officials have also evolved a system of registration and are working in conjunction with the labour exchanges in their efforts to get applicants placed in permanent positions.

EMERGENCY WORKROOMS.

It was very shortly after the outbreak of war that the fact was borne in on the officials of the council (of which Miss Irwin is the indefatigable secretary) that acute distress was imminent among the employees in certain trades. Living in lodgings, as a great many of them did, and earning wages ranging from 8s to 10s per week, they were entirely unprepared for a period of idleness. The council felt that this was a situation calling for their special attention, and steps were immediately taken to set up ameliorative measures. A sub-committee, to which were added direct representatives of industrial women, was entrusted with the carrying out of the schemes of relief employment. In six weeks there were registered at the offices of the council, 53 Renfield Street, 847 women and girls who were out of work. Through the generosity of the Misses M'Arthur, 30 Montgomerie Drive, two houses at 281 Cathedral Street were put at the disposal of the council. These contain 13 rooms, which have been cleaned and furnished by gifts from local firms. Fifty-four girls are now finding employment there daily. They are being fed, many of them have received gifts of clothing, and they are paid weekly wages. The workers have been classified as skilled and unskilled. The former include tailoresses, mantle makers, dressmakers, and underclothing workers; and the latter embrace charwomen, employees in confectionery, jam, and tobacco works. The first class are engaged in making clothes for distribution by charitable agencies and by private individuals, in household mending and darning, and in making Red Cross requirements. Their wages are 10s per week. The less skilled women are provided with materials which they are taught to make up in clothing for their own use, and they are paid 8s per week and receive also the clothes they make and alter. The workers are provided with a substantial midday meal of two courses, and they are also being trained in cooking under the direction of experienced instructors. One of the first problems which confronted the organisers of the workrooms was that they might be assailed on the ground that their temporary work would be competing with the production of regular workers in the industries concerned. With this point before them they took care to disarm any criticism on that pretext, and when large orders are offered for the workroom the policy of the sub-committee is to discover whether they could be undertaken in a regular factory, and if so to send them there. The committee also insist on all workers registering at the labour exchange, so that permanent work may be secured for them as soon as possible.

TYPIST AS FARM WORKER.

Other outlets than those of the workroom are being found for the energies of the Council on behalf of distressed women. Recently a request was made for 70 suitable women and girls for the potato harvest and other agricultural employment. A wage of 3s per day, including Saturday, or 4d per hour broken time, with free lodgings and half railway fare, was offered. The housing of temporary agricultural workers is a question round which controversy has raged, and knowing that there has frequently been room for complaint on the ground of inadequate accommodation, the Council made it a condition on their sending workers that proper provision would be made for them. A satisfactory undertaking having been given, the Council, in co-operation with the Labour Exchange, sent on the required number. Forty-nine of them did well, but 11 were obliged to leave on account of ill health, and 11 were found unsuitable. Though the greatest amount of unemployment has been in trades ministering to luxuries, these are not solely affected, and it is an interesting sidelight that one of the temporary agricultural workers was a girl with considerable experience as a typist. She was unable to find a situation in her own profession, and her circumstances were so straitened that she was glad of the opportunity of work of any kind. It may be added that she was a success as an agricultural worker. The Council are also joining in a modest way in the war on German trade, and arrangements are being made for training girls in toymaking. Miss Janie Allan has placed rooms at the St. [illegible] Club at the disposal of the Council, and it is [illegible] the industry has been collected [illegible] that the collection [illegible]

Though the greatest amount of unemployment has been in trades ministering to luxuries, these are not solely affected, and it is an interesting sidelight that one of the temporary agricultural workers was a girl with considerable experience as a typist. She was unable to find a situation in her own profession, and her circumstances were so straitened that she was glad of the opportunity of work of any kind. It may be added that she was a success as an agricultural worker. The Council are also joining in a modest way in the war on German trade, and arrangements are being made for training girls in toymaking. TRAINING WOMEN.

Doll and Shirt Making for Unemployed.

The Manchester Relief Committee agreed yesterday to the recommendations of the Women's Unemployment Committee to furnish work for women by the providing, at an additional cost of £80 a week, tuition in shirt making, doll making, and as skilled machinists.

In a report on the relief of distress in Manchester and district, given to the Manchester Relief Committee yesterday, it was stated that:

There is a distinct improvement in the state of affairs at the Women's Labour Exchange despite an increase of 67 on the books, which is due to the closing down of textile firms in the district. Printing, overall making, sweet making, and skirt and mantle making have experienced something of a revival, and the activity in the clothing trade has made it impossible for the moment to meet the demand for skilled machinists. Recovery is due largely to orders which are exceptional (e.g., special Government orders). The number of shop assistants on the register is not large, possibly because reduced time and reduced pay seem to be the rule, instead of dismissals of staff.

Undercutting Evil Avoided.

The pressure on firms to engage more assistants seems to arise from applications from those who are on short time or reduced pay in other trades, and are anxious, if possible, to supplement their earnings.

The openings for domestic servants continue good in number, but lack of women with reliable references makes it impossible to fill the positions. Hardship exists among the dismissed restaurant hands and hotel kitchen helps, and also among the number of girls discharged from firms engaged in the fitting of small electrical parts.

Offers to engage women in various kinds of work for their keep alone have been refused by the superintendent, on the ground that the practice is demoralising and tends to create serious wages difficulties.

The Manchester inspectors report that only six cases of distress have been met with among the 287 out-workers visited during the past two weeks. The general shortage of home workers continues, but there is a slight improvement to report among umbrella workers.

The Salford Distress Committee has taken steps to provide employment principally for unemployed needlewomen and machinists, who constitute the largest section of registered unemployed skilled workers. The figures of the latter are:—

	Cases.
Sewing and machinists	63
Tailoring	28
Waterproof garment makers	8
Dressmakers	7
Capmakers	11
Corset makers	3

From August 21 to October 10, 13,189 persons applied in the city for help, and 8,562 families were relieved.

The state of employment of warehousemen depends mainly on the condition of shipping, which has not recovered yet, though it may be depended upon doing so when the stocks in foreign markets have been depleted and the conditions in the cotton market have become such as to make people believe that a moderately stable level of values has been reached.

Extent of Short Time.

The Makers-up (No. 1 Society) report that during the past fortnight the situation has not changed very much. If anything unemployment is rather worse. Of 800 members, not more than 70 or 80 are working full time. The majority are working from 3 to 4 days a week, but a large number not more than one and a half or two days.

In No. 2 Society, with 310 members, only three are totally unemployed, but of the remainder very few are working more than two or three days a week. In many cases the men are earning just sufficient to keep them off the unemployed funds.

Very few members of the Print and Grey Cloth Lookers' Society and General Warehouse Men's Society (Nos. 1 and 2) are wholly unemployed, but with the exception of four or five members, all the rest are working short time, in many cases not more than one and a half or two days, and in many others not sufficiently to keep the members off the unemployed funds.

Of the General Warehouse Men's Society (No. 9), it is said that a fortnight ago few had done any work since the war commenced, and this is the present position.

Carrying companies are busy, and full permanent staffs are being employed at full wages. The Ship Canal Company reports slightly greater activity during the week. The engineering department is now more active. On the whole the state of employment in the building trades remains fairly good. Such pressure of unemployment as exists is felt mainly by masons, painters, and decorators. The temporary short time arrangements have given way to full time work again in most cases, and once more the master builders have rejected a proposal for organised short time, preferring to leave arrangements to each separate firm as the contracts fall out. The building of huts for the new battalions has relieved the shortage of work threatened among the joiners. Supplies of material are well maintained, and there is no immediate cause for anxiety.

In engineering there is no marked change since the last report. The number of those employed has not diminished, and the under employment which affects about one-third of the workers is accounted for almost entirely by the short time worked by the textile machinery makers. In this section there is no immediate prospect of improvement. In other branches affected favourably by war orders, there is even some probability of a shortage of the right kind of labour, as 20 per cent. have joined the army.

UNEMPLOYMENT AMONG GIRLS.

The Mayor of Chelsea (Mr. F. J. Welch) presided at a meeting held yesterday afternoon at the Governor's House, Chelsea Hospital, by permission of Lady Lyttelton, to consider the desirability of providing workrooms for the employment of girls during the war. There were present Earl and Countess Cadogan, Viscountess Strathallan, the Dowager Countess of Guilford, Lady Alice Ashley, Lady Evelyn McDonald, Lady Dawkins, Lady Maud Hoare, Lady Victoria Manners, Lady Fremantle, Frances Lady Legard, the Hon. Mrs. and Miss Buxton, the Hon. Mrs. Bertie, Miss Pickford, Mrs. George Trevelyan, and Mrs. W. Phipps.

The MAYOR pointed out that a work-room had been opened at the public library buildings in Manresa-road by Miss Robinson. This had been of great assistance to many girls. A Women's Committee had been formed to promote the extension of this scheme, and it was desired to form a recreation club in connection with it.

Lady MAUD HOARE said unemployment among the women was increasing considerably, the number registered at the labour exchanges last week being 35,800, as against 34,700 in the previous week.

Lord CADOGAN urged the necessity of making use of all the existing facilities before starting new ones, such as clubs. The prevalent spirit of unselfishness and charity and desire to assist one's neighbours had induced ladies to say they would economise in order to provide comforts for the soldiers. He would like to urge them not to economise in that way, but rather be a little more extravagant than usual, so that dressmakers and others might be found plenty of employment. He was sure the husbands would not mind paying the larger bills. (Laughter.)

UNEMPLOYED GIRLS.

With a view to dealing with the question of women shorthand-typists now out of employment, the City of London Committee of the National Relief (Prince of Wales's) Fund propose to open an office for receiving the names and addresses and other particulars of those persons who, prior to their present unemployment, were employed within the City. Pending the opening of this office those who are qualified as above and who desire to register should apply by letter only to Mr. A. V. Cox, hon. secretary of the committee, Guildhall, E.C., for a form of registration.

WOMEN VICTIMS OF THE WAR.

At the meeting of the Central Unemployed Body yesterday it was stated that there was great distress among the professional classes, especially in the theatrical profession, owing to the war, and that women were suffering more than men.

It was also stated that about one-third of the dressmakers and a quarter of the milliners are working short time or are out of work owing to women's economies in dress.

It was decided to open more workrooms for women.

Work for Unemployed Women.

Swinton Scheme Started.

One of the problems which the Swinton and Pendlebury Representative Committee have had to face in connexion with the relief of distress arising out of the war is that of unemployed women and girls. A considerable number of these, who are usually engaged at the cotton mills, have been for some weeks out of work, and prospects of a resumption being very uncertain, they have begun to feel real hardship. During the past week the number of unemployed women and girls registered in the district has increased from 139 to 200, and this fact has impressed the Local Committee with the necessity of work of some kind being provided. A scheme was prepared some weeks ago and submitted to the Local Government Board, but after waiting in vain for official sanction, the Committee decided, in view of the opening of a local relief fund, to make a start with the scheme without waiting longer for official approval. A start was therefore made yesterday at Trinity School, Swinton, where 12 girls were set to work making garments which it is intended to give away to the most needy of the local distress cases during the coming winter. The scheme is organized by the local Employment Sub-Committee, of which Mr. H. Entwisle, surveyor to the Council, is secretary. Mrs. Norbury, of Broad Oak Park, Worsley, is the chief organizer of the scheme, and under her able direction, several other local ladies are taking active part, not only in the work of organization, but the provision of materials. Discussing the scheme with out representative, Mrs. Norbury pointed out that owing to the restrictions with regard to

and the necessity of avoiding any clashing between the Local Committee and labour organizations, the scheme is confined to comparatively small limits. In essence, it is to provide work, instead of relief tickets, to the women who desire to give some return for the assistance they receive in this time of stress. The minimum wage authorized by the Government Department is threepence per hour, but the workers under the Swinton scheme will be paid fourpence, and their hours will be from 10 a.m. to 4 p.m. Monday to Friday. The scheme is being financed from the local relief fund. If this proves inadequate the local branch of the Prince of Wales' fund will be drawn upon, but the generous response now being made to the local fund encourages the hope that the needs of the situation will be met. The local workpeople who are fortunate enough to be fully employed are sending substantial weekly subscriptions to the fund, and if these are maintained it should be possible to shortly increase the number of workers under the scheme. It is also hoped to obtain a Government grant in support of the work. It will be appreciated that the need in some local families is much greater than in others, and the organizers of the scheme are trying, as far as possible, to give preference to those who are most hardly hit. The ladies who, under Mrs. Norbury's leadership, are devoting their time and energies to secure the successful working of the scheme are worthy of all praise and support. They will be grateful for all help that can be given, either in money or materials.

EMPLOYMENT FOR GIRLS AND WOMEN AT ECCLES.

The Unemployment Sub-Committee of the Administrative Committee for the National Relief Fund at Eccles have, in conjunction with a Women's Committee, had under consideration a scheme for providing employment for women and girls who may be thrown out of employment through the war. A National Fund started by the Queen Mother has taken up this question in London and other large centres, and the Eccles Committee are hoping to obtain a grant to finance their scheme. The Executive Committee have approved the latter, by which it is proposed to open one or more workrooms for the making up and repair of clothing, which would be available to relieve distress in another direction. Two rooms have been offered to the Committee, one at the Eccles Congregational Church Schools and another at Messrs. Ermen and Roby's Mill at Patricroft. The scheme provides for the apopintment of a competent fore-woman at the standard rate of wages, and the employment of women and girls at a minimum rate of 4d. per hour, the maximum hours to be worked to be from 25 to 30, according to the income of the family of the workers. The Committee are also anxious to improve the efficiency of the girls and women in domestic and other subjects, and it is hoped to combine with the scheme training in domestic economy and other instruct

THE WAR AND IRISH TRADE

SPEECH OF MR. T. W. RUSSELL, M.P.

RATHMINES SCHOOL OF COMMERCE.

The annual presentation of certificates to the students of the Rathmines School of Commerce and Domestic Economy took place in the Rathmines Town Hall last night. Mr. Francis Bride, Chairman of the Technical Education Committee, presided, and there was a large attendance of students and friends. The prizes were distributed by Lady Shaw.

The Chairman said the history of the schools had been a record of success, and had contributed a great deal to the welfare of the students.

Mr. Williamson, Principal Rathmines Technical School, mentioned that the attendance had increased from 806 pupils in 1912-13, to 972 in 1913-14. The schools had made a splendid start, and were looking forward to greater success in the future.

Professor Cole delivered an interesting lecture on the necessity of efficiency in the life of the nation. Technical education, he said, was doing a great deal to give equality and opportunity to all young persons of ability and adaptability who had the energy and determination to improve their position in life. There was, he believed, too much talk about the culture to be derived from books and picture galleries, while the more important training of the mind in the great necessity for accuracy in and despatch in the ordinary affairs of the daily business of life was too often neglected (applause).

SPEECH OF MR. T. W. RUSSELL, M.P.

Mr. T. W. Russell, M.P., in supporting a vote of thanks to the lecturer, said there was hardly a town or village in Ireland that had not its technical institute. There were 46,000 pupils attending these schools, but there had been up to the present a gap in the system. They had not touched a class which specially required this form of education; and it was still more curious that the war was going to bring about some reformation in this respect. The war had really turned men's minds and thoughts in a direction which would be of ultimate benefit to the country. The Department at the present time was anxiously considering the question of technical education as applied to industries, as applied to domestic economy, and scores of industries in the hands of the Germans, and it would be the people's own fault if these industries ever went back to Germany (applause). The toy industry was almost entirely in the hands of the Germans. America even did not make toys; they get them from Germany. We are engaged at the present moment, proceeded Mr Russell, at this work. We have experts from England visiting the cities and towns of Ireland to test the capacity of the young people in the schools to see whether it would be possible to make our own dolls. I believe it is quite settled that we can make everything but the head (laughter). Even the dressing of the doll is a separate industry in Germany. We are considering how far we may be able to get something out of this industry. Continuing, Mr. Russell said there was another question brought to the attention of the Department within the last few weeks. They were not suffering at the present time from any serious want of employment as regards men. He was happy to say that a great number of labourers and workers had gone to the front (hear, hear). Without Conscription, which nobody ever dreamt of unless some foolish newspaper man. Without pressure thousands and thousands of men had gone to the front from Ireland (hear, hear).

Question of Unemployment.

But whilst there was no unemploymen worth speaking of among men, there was great deal of unemployment amongst girls and women. It had been ascertained by the Department that seamptresses and dressmakers and women engaged in work of that kind, were losing their unemployment every day, and who stand in the near future to lose more and more. Girls engaged in the class of work he had mentioned should also come under the technical education schemes. The Department had taken this matter in hands, and before very long, he hoped, they would be able to start technical schools, not only in Dublin, but in every place in Ireland, to give the young girls and women now out of employment technical education. He believed it would be the greatest benefit imaginable to them, and would largely help to fill the deficiency in women's education. A great deal more was required to be done, said Mr. Russell, in conclusion. The great industry of Ireland was agriculture. The science of agriculture must be brought home to the farmers. And what was true of the farmer was equally true of other things (applause).

Venerable Archdeacon Pricher, P.P., V.F. Rev. Mr. Macaulay, and Mr. Baxter, Chairman of the Rathmines U.D.C., also spoke.

EMPLOYMENT WORKROOMS.

HELP FOR WOMEN OF THE PROFESSIONAL CLASSES.

At a meeting of the Professional Classes War Relief Council, it was announced that the Women's Emergency Corps and the Relief Organisation of the National Union of Women's Suffrage Societies have kindly offered to be responsible for the temporary employment workrooms for women. The council will pay the minimum wage of 10s. per head per week for its nominees, who will, of course, be entirely women of the professiona' classes.

This offer relieves the council of the onus of opening new workrooms, it being considered most desirable to use, wherever possible, existing machinery, and to ensure the widest co-operation with all other societies giving relief.

The offer was most gratefully accepted, and the council passed a vote of thanks to the Women's Emergency Corps and to the National Union of Women's Suffrage Societies, who are represented on the council respectively by the Duchess of Marlborough and Mrs. Percy Boulnois, and Mrs. Henry Fawcett and Miss K. D. Courtney.

These temporary workrooms, which include needlework, toymaking, and other trades, are to be used for women who require immediate aid to bridge over the time necessary for finding them permanent employment.

FOR WORKLESS WOMEN.

NEW RULES FOR HELPING DESERVING CASES.

Revised regulations regarding the provision of work for women temporarily unemployed were issued yesterday.

They provide that any special schemes should be educationally and socially beneficial, and that resort should not be had to a special type of workroom until every effort has been made to find employment in a regular trade.

Only women thrown out of work by the war may be taken into consideration, and distress caused by unemployment amongst men should not be relieved by the giving of work to women not previously wage earners.

The maximum relief in the form of work is fixed at 10s.

Where the rate of pay is fixed above 3d. an hour the hours should be reduced, and where 10s. is above the wage normal in the district, hours should be adjusted so as to regulate the wages to the desired amount.

Girls between 16 and 18 years of age, except when they have previously earned more than 3d. an hour, should be given a maintenance allowance of a shilling a day.

Women Economising in Dress.

From a statement made yesterday at a meeting of the Central Unemployed Body dressmakers and milliners are being injuriously affected because of the economies of women who are buying cheap ready-made clothes and cheap plain hats. One-third of the dressmakers and a quarter of the milliners are working short time, or are out of work. As the Government is making a special grant of £1,000 the central body decided to open at once more workrooms for the benefit of unemployed women.

UNEMPLOYED WOMEN.

(FROM OUR CORRESPONDENT.)

LONDON, Friday Night.

Women workers are feeling the stress of unemployment and short time more than men, and the prospect is not too favourable. At the labour exchanges throughout the country 36,800 women registered last week, as compared with 34,700 the previous week. The central unemployed body for London has 3000 more cases to deal with than at the same time last year. One-third of the 66,000 dressmakers in the London district are working shorter hours, and of 13,400 milliners about a quarter have had their earning opportunities similarly curtailed. This falling off, it is stated, has been caused by ladies purchasing inexpensive, ready-made clothes and cheap trimmed hats. Women of the professional classes generally are also suffering like their poorer sisters from the effects of the war. At a meeting held in Chelsea to-day Lady Maud Hoare said that some ladies were not ordering dresses so that they might have more money to spend on shirts for the soldiers. She very sensibly remarked that it was no use doing that because it helped to throw other people out of work. Meanwhile the problem is receiving careful attention, and the Central Committee on Women's Unemployment has issued a paper containing a number of suggestions, the principal being that any special schemes of employment should be educational and socially beneficial, and that resort should not be had to a special type of workroom until every effort has been made to procure employment for the workers in a regular trade.

Nottingham Express, [illegible]

NOTTINGHAM TRADE.

How the Women Workers are Affected.

POSITION NOT ACUTE.

According to the conclusions of the officials of the Nottingham Labour Exchange, unemployment in the city is by no means acute, although at the same time the working classes as a whole are stated to be "not well off." This comparatively comfortable condition of being able to "rub along" is in some measure due to the fact that most local working families are composed of two or three workers, and these are, as a rule, engaged in different industries. Thus when one member of the household is out the income continues to some extent.

Since the war began, however, unemployment has increased amongst women workers by something like 100 per cent. This does not necessarily mean that the number of women totally unemployed has doubled, but rather the increase represents the number registering for work. For instance, on the outbreak of war the number of charwomen on the register went up from 20 and 30 to 50 and 60, but of this number many are putting in two or three days' work a week. The total of women unemployed just now is about 365, whereas for this period of the year 200 would be about normal. On the different trades lace comes first with 135 registered, and domestics second with 130. About 30 dressmakers are registered, about 12 shop assistants, and 20 classified as commercial occupations (typists, clerks, &c.).

Making Khaki.

With regard to dressmakers, it is stated that there would be more but for the fact that the big employers in the city are loyally doing their best to keep all hands on. Some of the big firms who do ladies' tailoring are contemplating the advisability of undertaking khaki work for the Government, the matter having been brought to their attention by Mr. A. G. H. Thatcher, the manager. It is interesting to note that three firms of wholesale clothiers in Nottingham have already commenced this class of work, and are turning out about 500 or 600 suits a week.

With regard to male workers, there are registered about 274 of uninsured trades and about 1,000 of the insured trades. Lace machine builders, who are amongst the sections most affected, are somewhat difficult to place owing t the fact that an expert in this branch is not ways an all-round engineer. Nevertheless, t local Exchange has been successful in placi about half-a-dozen in the Woolwich works. I the matter of placing general engineers, too, the officials have been particularly fortunate, about 40 or 50 men having been found good berths in the North and at Birmingham and elsewhere. In addition, employment was found for something like 100 or 200 carpenters at the Belton Park camp, which is now nearly completed. It is highly probable that the men will go similar work at Salisbury, where a muc extensive camp is being constructed.

It is important t has not wholly t to work in oth cases their fa and are being

LIVERPOOL'S LABOUR MARKET.

UNEMPLOYMENT AND SHORT TIME.

VARYING EFFECTS OF THE WAR.

At the moment, perhaps one of the most interesting documents issued by the Liverpool municipal authorities is the report of the State of Employment Sub-Committee, which is connected with the Committee for the Prevention and Relief of Distress. Whilst it is stated that conditions of employment in the city remain generally satisfactory, there continues to be evidence of unusual depression in certain insured trades, particularly those of building, shipbuilding, boilermaking, engineering, and shipyard labouring. Thus in the insured trades during the week ending October 10 there were on the registers of the Labour Exchange 1,939 men, as compared with 929 for the corresponding week of last year. These figures indicate an increase in unemployment equal to 108 per cent.

The growth of unemployment among women, coupled with the working of short time, says the report, has become a serious problem. The small extent of unemployment among men is doubtless due to the withdrawal of men to the forces of the Crown. The following are the latest and most reliable figures available for this drain on the labour market:—

Serving	Regular	7,000
,,	Reservist	5,000
,,	Kitchener's Army	15,000
,,	Territorial	15,000
,,	Regular Navy	5,000
,,	R.F.R. and Pensioners	1,171
,,	Royal Naval Reserve	1,300
,,	Royal Naval Volunteer Res.	750
Total		50,221

State of Trades.

Probably the building trade has suffered the most severely from the war, for from the report it appears that, according to returns obtained from a group of firms employing 3,000 men, unemployment has increased by 11 per cent. since the war broke out, and, after due allowance has been made for the men joining the Colours, it would seem that of the total population of over 16,000 people engaged in the building trade in Liverpool 2,421 are unemployed—an addition of 1,777 since the outbreak of war.

The painting trade has also suffered considerably; certain firms have discharged all hands, whilst others are working short time.

In the uninsured trades it is reported that the number of applicants for work greatly exceed that of the corresponding period of last year. Throughout the furnishing trade short time is the rule, and the printing trade is affected in the same direction. Sugar confectionery continues to be extremely depressed. Shop assistants, laundry workers, café girls, and dressmakers are experiencing short time.

Machinists and Dockers Wanted.

Employment for machinists, according to the report, seems to be greater than the supply, and this, broadly speaking, may be attributed to Army contracts. Infringement of the Factory Acts by Government contractors working for the supply of troops appears to be inevitable when the supply of labour fails to equal the demand. It would clearly be more helpful and more economical that this trade should be working in two shifts instead of one, and the suspension of the Factory Act for this purpose would be an advantage, but such a proposition cannot be put forward until the supply of labour is equal to the demand.

It is estimated, proceeds the report, that 2,000 dock labourers have joined the colours, and, owing to the marked shortage of labour in the early part of the week, especially on Monday, the Dock Labour Joint Committee has found it necessary to register an additional 2,100 men. These have for the most part been given seasonal tallies, which are only available for a certain period. The figures show that during the week ending October 10 16,423 men were employed, as opposed to 16,403 in the week ending October 3, and the wages paid in the week ending October 10 were £16,398, as opposed to £17,019. The figures last week represent a decrease in the number of men paid of 3,195 in comparison with the corresponding period for the previous year, since 1,187 less deposited their cards [illegible] the clear[illegible] thi[illegible]

Railway Review,
Nov: 6th. 1914.

THE ORGANISED WORKERS AND UNEMPLOYED CHILD LABOUR.

SIR,—All anxious to see the Labour and Socialist movement assert its claim to be regarded as a force in the political work of the nation must have felt great satisfaction on reading the statement of policy which, recently issued by the National Workers' War Emergency Committee, is to be propagated in numerous great conferences in London and the provinces.

Among the proposals the provision of work for the unemployed of necessity finds a place. In this connection, however, there is one serious omission to which I should like to draw the attention of N.U.R. men and the numerous other Trade Unionists who I know read the "Review." No mention is made of the great amount of unemployed child labour prevailing in the country at the present time, although for many years past a strong lead in this direction has been given by the Trades Union Congress—as many Ministers of Education have been made fully aware by the various deputations of the Parliamentary Committee, which, acting on the instruction of the Congress, have laid before the Government the education demands of the Trade Union movement.

"The provision of work for the unemployed" does not meet the case of the unemployed child under 16 years of age, nor does it meet the Trades Union Congress demand that all child labour under the age of 16 years should be abolished, and that the difficulty—the economic difficulty—should be met by the provision of a maintenance grant or scholarship for every child between the ages of 13 and 16 years. Thus, out of the collective wealth of the community would be paid to the child considerably more than the amount he now obtains as a wage-earner, while the labour he now performs could be transferred to an adult unemployed. Still further productive work would also be forthcoming in the provision and the equipment of the increased number of educational institutions which would be necessary, and in supplying the wider needs of children being educated according to a higher standard of life. While life is being so freely spent on the battlefield abroad we must devote our best energies to the saving of life from the ravage of industrial warfare at home. Therefore, in every Labour programme of proposals for meeting difficulties arising out of the war the working-class child must have a foremost place; and when this maintenance grant is given, Trade Unionists must see to it that it is given to all elementary school children unconditionally, and not on the ground of poverty, just as ordinary free elementary education is given, and without any accompaniment of insulting, inquisitorial investigation as to the amount and method of expenditure of the income in the child's home.

If the enormous cost be urged as an insuperable difficulty in carrying out this, one oft-repeated demand of the Trades Union Congress, then another demand, also oft-repeated, may be quoted, viz., the restoration of the filched wealthy educational endowments, in so many cases intended for the education and maintenance of poor children, and now devoted to the education of the children of the well-to-do.—Yours, etc.,

WORK FOR UNEMPLOYED AT CLYDEBANK

At a meeting last night of Clydebank Town Council a minute of the Streets and Buildings Committee was submitted. It stated that the Local Government Board had approved of the proposals to widen Kilbowie Road, Park Road, and to form a recreation ground for bowls, etc., and that the Master of Works was still corresponding with the owners of adjoining land and with the manager of the Glasgow tramways. The work involved by these schemes is to be carried out by unemployed labour in the burgh as far as possible. A minute of a special meeting stated that Provost Taylor proposed that the balance on hand of the Unemployed Relief Fund of 1909, amounting to £100, and that from the Coronation Celebration Fund, amounting to £77, should be made available for the Women's Unemployment Relief Fund at this time, which was agreed to. Provost Taylor also explained that on the suggestion of the Scottish Committee on Women's Unemployment, instituted by the Scottish Advisory Committee, the local Prince of Wales's Relief Committee had made a remit to a sub-committee of ladies to provide work for women out of employment on account of the war, and they had already given employment to about 100 women, and expended a sum of between £40 and £50 on material and wages.

WORK FOR UNEMPLOYED WOMEN.

SUFFRAGE SOCIETY'S APPEAL.

A meeting of the Birmingham Women's Suffrage Society was held at the Grand Hotel, last night, to enable members to hear the details of a scheme which the organisation has promoted for providing work for women thrown out of employment by the war.

Mrs. A. C. Osler presided, and stated that the committee had had evidence brought before them that there was a peculiar demand for work for women in the Ladywood district, and they had decided to direct their attention to that district. The Vicar of St Margaret's had granted them the use of his schoolroom. They had found it exceedingly difficult to obtain any money from the national funds, and had therefore decided to appeal to their friends, workers, and members. They were enabled by the contributions already received to employ at needlework thirty women, and could help as many more as funds were forthcoming to make it possible for them to do. The articles thus manufactured they proposed to give away to needy people.

Miss Matheson, speaking on the general conditions of women's employment in the city, said that things had settled to a degree that not the most sanguine dared to hope. A number of trades, however, were considerably affected. They were not at the worst of their trade difficulties yet. History taught that whatever might be the dislocation now, they had got to look forward to a period of really worse trade. The women's position was not quite so serious as they thought it was going to be, but it was bad enough There were a great many girls and women on short time and women whose husbands were on short time. They might have enough to keep body and soul together, but not enough to enable them to keep up to the standard of their own class. Although the problem might not be very acute, yet the problem was very much there.

WOMEN CLERKS.

Viscountess St. Cyres has been appointed to represent the Association of Women Clerks and Secretaries on the Professional Classes War Relief Council.

As was anticipated, great distress has arisen among this class of professional women, many hundreds being thrown out of work by small firms and businesses having closed down owing to the war. Where possible work will be found for these women in their own profession, special efforts being made to place the highly trained and competent. A form of assistance has been foreshadowed by a public-spirited woman who has collected a small fund to pay salaries to highly trained secretaries, to assist with various schemes of public relief organisation who would otherwise have been compelled to employ purely voluntary and untrained work. This excellent movement has had the effect of giving double assistance, for while it helps to maintain a certain number of competent women in their own profession, it also ensures higher efficiency in the running of the various organisations.

Where, however, it is impossible to find work the younger members of the profession will be trained in other less overstocked employments, such as the training required for certain openings in the Colonies and elsewhere.

Money is much needed to carry on this work of assistance. Cheques (crossed Messrs. Coutts and Co.) to be made payable to the Treasurer, 13 and 14, Prince's-gate, S.W.

WORK FOR WOMEN.

The Salvation Army Emigration Office has just received information from the Government of Nova Scotia that they can receive and happily place a hundred young women suitable for domestic service before Christmas. The Salvation Army will, where necessary, advance the passage money for girls desiring to take advantage of this opportunity who should make application at once to 122, Queen Victoria-street.

THE EMPLOYMENT OF CHELSEA GIRLS DURING THE PRESENT CRISIS.

THE beautiful panelled room of the Governor's House, Royal Hospital, Chelsea, was crowded on Friday last week when a meeting was held by kind invitation of the Hon. Lady Lyttelton to discuss the question of a workroom for the employment of Chelsea girls during the present crisis.

The chair was taken by the Mayor of Chelsea, who told of the great need existing in Chelsea for such work. Considerable delay had, it might be felt, occurred in meeting this need, but the time had not been wasted as many important investigations into the need existing, and the possible ways of meeting it, had been made. In this connection, of course, the Queen's Work for Women Fund immediately suggests itself, and naturally application had been made to it. The result had been an appalling amount of correspondence, but after considerable trouble it was found that the conditions attached to the fund hardly met the principal needs of the cases occurring in Chelsea. A great number of these were found amongst superior dressmakers and others, capable and accustomed to do work of a very good class, who were amongst the first to be deprived of their employment by the stress of the present time. Many of these earnestly desired work at home, and for this the Queen's fund made no provision, and he hoped that in course of time some opening would be found for them. In the meantime they had taken over a workroom, opened by Miss Robinson in the early days of the war, which had already done work of a very valuable character, and it was now housed in commodious premises in the rooms under the Free Library, where it would be able to develop along its own admirable lines.

Lady Maud Hoare, in the course of a short speech, said that the chief industrial sufferers from the war were women; for men of service age the Army was the natural place, and they in many cases left work which could be done by other men older or in other ways ineligible for service. Moreover, there were many trades in which a regular boom was created by War Office requirements, but they were not those in which women participated. In Chelsea there were numberless superior dressmakers, clerks, and typists thrown out of work whose employment presented a grave problem. She urged people to be careful how they injured one class in benefiting another, and remarked that it was poor economy to go without a winter dress, with all the toll of lucrative employment it gave, for the sake of buying shirts for the Army. It was, she knew, a difficult problem which they were up against at the present time, but because a thing was difficult was no excuse for shirking it, and she felt that some considered means must be taken to meet the growing need.

Mrs Wilton Phipps in a lucid and very interesting speech told of the work which was being done in general and of that of Miss Robinson's workroom in particular. The great point she urged in its favour was that it did work which was really wanted, not merely work which would eventually be given away whether it was wanted or not. Indeed, speaking from an experience of thirty years, she deprecated the prevalent custom of making large gifts of clothing to schools irrespective of any specific need. The question of wages was an anxious one, for though at present the bulk of the girls employed were quite young, and so fairly remunerated at the 10s. a week, which was the maximum wage under the Queen's Fund, or even under, they felt that such remuneration was too small for older and more accomplished workers.

At present statistics prove that each week the unemployment amongst women is increasing, and more dressmakers of different grades and other women are thrown out of work or put upon half time. It was hoped, however, that in the natural course of events this would remedy itself, and one point of the method employed at the Chelsea workroom was to allow each girl half a day off a week in which she could seek regular employment. All manner of needlework was undertaken in the workroom, and orders were much wanted for blouses, shirts, babies' and children's clothes, &c. Three successive orders had been gratefully received from the Queen's Needlework Fund, over 300 shirts having been made in this way, with 100 other garments, and an order from this source, one of the earliest received, gave great encouragement to Miss Robinson. An interesting fact, too, was the receipt of successive orders for shirts from Harvey Nicholls, which proved not only that the work was carried out on a thoroughly practical and businesslike basis, but also that it did not interfere with trade interests. She felt, therefore, that in pleading for support for this workroom they were pleading for no new or untried scheme..

The Rev. H. R. Gamble remarked on the really remarkable absence of suffering and privation which the war had brought yet upon the people of this country; there was, however, one class which had suffered sadly, and that was composed of the work girls whose plight they were now considering. With regard to a suggestion made by a previous speaker, that clubs for recreation should play their part in the scheme, he urged that existing institutions should as far as possible be made use of instead of multiplying efforts. There were, he remarked, several such clubs in the neighbourhood, to which the only difficulty was to get the girls.

In proposing a vote of thanks to the speakers and to Lady Lyttelton, Lord Cadogan urged people to make as many purchases as possible, saying that even extravagance in this way was justifiable. In a very brief speech seconding the motion Mr Ball struck an important note when he mentioned the political and patriotic importance of preventing distress from unemployment in view of the possible long duration of the war.

EMERGENCY LEAGUE.

Meeting of West Ward Workers.

PROPOSED WORK ROOMS

For Unemployed Women.

The eleventh weekly meeting of this League has been held at Ruskin House, West Croydon, Councillor H. T. Muggeridge presiding.

After formal business had been transacted and sundry cases of distress reported and advice given as to the steps necessary to secure relief, a report was submitted as to the progress made towards the establishment of workrooms for unemployed women. The constitution of the committee of management has been decided upon, and it will consist of five nominees of various women's organisations, and four nominees of the existing Trades and Unemployment Committee. A grant for the purposes of the Women's Workroom Committee will be obtained from the Prince of Wales's Fund, a scheme has already been drafted for submission to the approval of the Mayor's Committee.

Copies of the Government's new pamphlets on separation allowances to the wives and children of soldiers, or to the dependents of unmarried soldiers (or widowers) were distributed to the meeting. These were read and discussed in detail, as it was felt that the information contained would be extremely valuable to the members of the League.

LIVERPOOL'S UNEMPLOYED GIRLS

Additions to the Ranks of Street Newsvendors.

Whilst there is a shortage of labour in regard to employment under the Mersey Docks and Harbour Board, there is evidence of depression in certain trades in Liverpool, among which the chief are building, shipbuilding, boilermaking, engineering, and general shipyard labour. A Blue-book issued by the Liverpool municipal authorities shows that during the week ending October 10 unemployment in the insured trades doubled. But the extent of unemployment among men is actually not large; the fact that over 50,000 men are with the two branches of the forces has had its effect on the labour market. The building trade has been the most severe sufferer, unemployment having increased by a large percentage since the outbreak of war, whilst the painting trade has suffered considerably, certain firms having discharged all their hands, while others have placed their men on short time. In the furnishing trade short time is the rule rather than the exception, and printing firms are similarly affected.

It is among women that unemployment is most serious. Particularly hard is the lot of girls employed in the sugar, confectionery, laundry, café, dressmaking, and shop assistant concerns; most of these have been placed on short time and others discharged. Some of these girls have been driven in their need to take up the street selling of newspapers.

EMPLOYMENT FOR WOMEN.

Meeting of the Ulster Committee.

The inaugural meeting of the Ulster Committee on Women's Employment was held in the Lord Mayor's Parlour at the Belfast City Hall yesterday afternoon. The Dowager Marchioness of Dufferin and Ava presided, and there were also present the Lady Mayoress (Mrs. Crawford M'Cullagh), the Honourable Lady Kennedy, Mrs. Sinclair (Hopefield House), Mrs. M'Mordie, Mrs. Mercier Clements, Mrs. David Stevenson (Londonderry), Mrs. J. M. Andrews (Comber), Mrs. Letts, Mrs. Garrett Nagle, Mrs. Harold Barbour, Miss M'Cance, Miss Slocock (H.M. senior lady inspector of factories, Belfast), Mrs. Dickie (Dublin), Miss F. F. Clark, Miss A. N. Daunt (Belfast Labour Exchange), Miss M. Galway, Miss M. Magee; Messrs. James Johnston, J.P.; J. H. Stirling, E. A. Saunderson, S. Eraut (H.M. inspector of factories), R. Garrett Campbell, John Johnston (Lurgan), Guy Morrish (Londonderry), and F. W. Moneypenny, M.V.O.

Apologies for absence were received from the Lord Mayor, the Honourable Ethel Macnaghten, and Mr. T. Somerset.

The Committee, it may be mentioned, has been formed by the Local Government Board for the purpose of providing employment for women whose means of livelihood have been affected by the war. It will be conducted on similar lines to those adopted by kindred organisations in England, and will derive its income principally from the Prince of Wales's Fund and Queen Mary's Fund.

At yesterday's meeting the Lady Mayoress was appointed honorary treasurer, and Mrs. Mercier Clements was requested to act as honorary secretary.

Lady Dufferin made a statement dealing with the question of unemployment amongst women, and said she hoped the Committee would serve a very useful purpose. She added that she trusted the members would do their utmost to make the scheme as successful as possible.

After discussing various matters it was decided to appoint a sub-committee to carefully consider the situation together with the suggestions received from the Local Government Board, and to draw up a report for next meeting. The following were appointed to act as the sub-committee:—Lady Dufferin (chairman), the Lady Mayoress, the Honourable Lady Kennedy, the Honourable Ethel Macnaghten, Mrs. M'Mordie, Mrs. Sinclair, Mrs. Harold Barbour, Mrs. Stevenson (Derry), Miss Galway, Miss Clark, Mrs. Letts, Miss M'Cance; Messrs. James Johnston, J.P.; Guy Morrish, and H. Berrington.

Lady Dufferin read a letter which Sir Henry Miller, as the honorary secretary of the City of Derry Citizens' Committee for the Prevention and Relief of Distress, had sent to the Local Government Board. The Committee had asked for the Board's assistance in obtaining a grant from the Department of Agriculture and Technical Instruction for the purpose of enabling them to carry through a scheme which had been formulated with the object of reducing distress. With grants from the Department and the National Relief Fund, it was thought that the Committee would be able to augment the income of the women benefiting by the scheme to the amount they were formerly earning, and it was hoped and believed that markets could be found for their products—namely, socks, gloves, helmets, &c.—which would further supplement the available funds. Instruction would be given in some branch of industry other than that in which the women were ordinarily employed.

The meeting afterwards terminated.

Unemployment Among Women.

Sir,—A committee has been formed, working in conjunction with the Lord-Lieutenant's committee, for the prevention and the relief of distress and to deal with the question of unemployment among women.

We should be glad if anyone in the county cognisant of distress or part-time employment among women would notify Miss C. M. Gordon, 3, Osborne Terrace, Newcastle, to whom also donations for relief in this area should be sent.

We should be glad to receive orders for knitting or sewing, particularly body belts, shirts, socks, jerseys, clothes for refugees, etc.—Yours, etc.,

OUT OF WORK WOMEN.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE MORNING ADVERTISER.

SIR,—Can nothing be done to help the unemployed barmaids? We do not care to walk round the streets in bands as the men usually do when out of work, but suffer in silence. The licensed victuallers still advertise principally for barmen, although the women can do their work, and I notice that it is only the women whose wages have been reduced. We cannot go to the front, but we should be thankful to do barmen's work, and be very glad of their money. There is now no need for unemployment among men, but it is quite time something, and that not charity, was done for women.—I am, Sir, yours, &c.,

Freeman's Journal,

A scheme for the employment of women whose means of livelihood have been affected by the war is under consideration by the Ulster Committee on Women's Employment. The committee has been formed by the Local Government Board, and the necessary financial support will be derived principally from the Prince of Wales's Fund and Queen Mary's Fund. This question of the unemployment of women has become very acute in Glasgow, where the Distress Committee has decided to establish a workroom where women can dress dolls and manufacture a certain class of stuffed toy animals. This class of work, it is stated, was almost entirely carried on by Germany, so that the proposed "factory" will not be in competition with any British firm.

Further Schemes Needed To Meet Distress.

POST OFFICE HINT.

Suggested Employment for Female Victims of War.

Many schemes have been launched in Manchester to find work for unemployed women affected by the war, but more are necessary if the problem is to be effectively dealt with.

Councillor Margaret Ashton suggests that women should be given their share of the extra sorting work imposed by the Post Office during the Christmas rush. So far women have not been employed in that branch of postal work, but Miss Ashton and others who are actively associated with relief work in Manchester see no reason why a new departure should not be made, particularly at a time like the present.

"The work is not difficult," said one informant, "and it would be an easy matter to employ at least three or four hundred women out of the 2,000 or more extra hands usually taken on for postal work in Manchester alone. Women have been hit by the war much more severely than the men. I hope, therefore, that the postal authorities will take the present opportunity of doing something for unemployed women and girls."

Inquiries by a Daily Dispatch representative revealed the fact that extra female labour is provided by the postal authorities at Christmas, but this is for such work as assisting in the telegraph department or behind the public counters at the head Post Office and sub-offices. As those employed must have had experience in that special work, it does not provide an outlet for the out-of-work shop girl, machinist, etc.

Too Proud to Ask for Relief.

We have received a letter from a Manchester shop girl, who suggests there ought to be a fund established whereby "the poor shop girls in need of assistance could be helped." She adds:—

Though poor, many of them are too proud to ask for relief. Firms who are receiving Government orders, and require extra machinists and leather stitchers, want experienced hands only, so what is the poor shop girl to do?

Why could not some kind of institute be opened to find employment? If the salary was only 10s. per week it would at least serve to keep the wolf from the door. If something is not done soon, distress amongst the women and girls will be very serious.

During the war, married women whose husbands are receiving a fair salary should not be employed. It would give the single women, who very often have someone depending upon their earnings, a better chance.

Workroom Opportunities.

A member of the Manchester Relief Committee suggested last night that shop girls who have been used to millinery and dressmaking might apply for work at the rooms established by the Womens' Employment Committee. They could easily do doll-dressing. At some of these special workrooms plain sewing is done, whilst next week it is intended to train women and girls as power machinists for shirt making.

WAITING FOR JOBS.

Children Idle after Leaving School.

ANXIOUS PARENTS.

War's Effect on Juvenile Labour in Manchester.

One of the results of the war—and one, perhaps, which has almost escaped public notice—has been to make it exceedingly difficult for juveniles to obtain employment on leaving school.

This aspect of things was discussed yesterday by the secretary of the Manchester Juvenile Employment Bureau with a representative of the Daily Dispatch at the Education Offices in Deansgate.

"The position is not so bad now as it was when the war started," he said. "At first we were snowed under with applications from parents who were anxious to get work for their children. Manchester, however, was never so seriously affected as some of the outside districts, such as Openshaw, where the mills were in a bad way.

"At the present moment we have altogether about 500 names on our 'live' register, these names being those of children who are looking for a job. Roughly, half of them are girls and half boys, and their ages range from school leaving age to 17, though we have some on the register only twelve years of age. The last-named are those who have passed labour examinations, and thus become exempt from attendance at school.

"The greater number of the girls on our register are desirous of getting office work, and it is very difficult to find them this employment at the moment. It is always the case in normal times, when, of course, there are many more openings than now, that the supply of girls for office work is vastly in excess of the demand.

"A considerable number of girls are looking for jobs as machinists. It might be thought there are plenty of openings for machinists just now when so many firms are busy making army uniforms. The fact is that in the great majority of instances such firms are too busy to take on any learners."

The secretary of the bureau explained that in addition to the "live" register there is a waiting list, which contains the names of about 200 girls who are waiting for post office or ordinary office work.

During the past month alone the officials received 313 visits from fathers and mothers of children, and in two months the bureau was successful in placing 650 juveniles in employment, about two-thirds of whom were boys.

Women Workers Wanted.

While many women workers in the city are unemployed, there is a lack of hands in particular trades. One of these is shirtmaking, in which there is a scarcity of machinists. It is suggested that a number of the unemployed women should be trained by the Relief Committee to follow this occupation, which is enjoying a boom, thanks to War Office contracts. A well-known city firm, whose factory has been adapted for the manufacture of army blankets, have offered to train 50 girls for this work and to pay them 7s per week while under tuition. Another firm in the weaving business have also offered to employ 50 girls. Both offers are being considered by women's organisations concerned.

Devon & Exeter Gazette,
Nov: 12th. 1914.

Everyone knows that the war is bound to interfere with the conditions of employment, and also has resulted in many homes becoming poorer and approaching nearer to financial difficulties than ever before. But some of the inmates of those homes, the wives and mothers, who have suddenly found their incomes depleted, through the direct or indirect effects of the war, are too proud to take benefit from the various funds set up, and are eagerly desirous of working in some way in order to provide for their own support. Her Majesty Queen Mary was the first to realise this and inaugurated a movement, the aim of which is to ensure means of employment for women and towards this end made an appeal to the community for gifts of money and articles (not jumble sale articles) in order to establish the nucleus of a fund which will adequately deal with the problem. Devon has enthusiastically taken up the matter. Yesterday, at Ottery St. Mary, the result of an appeal on her Majesty's behalf by the local Committee was to be seen. There had been gathered together a large collection of articles, while many money gifts were received. The various articles given were exhibited for sale, and those unsold were sent to the London depot. If all places in Devon approach the matter as energetically as Ottery St. Mary has done there will be little doubt about the practical result of the movement.

EMPLOYMENT FOR GIRLS.

DUCHESSES OF PORTLAND AND RUTLAND VISIT A LOCAL ORGANISATION.

Commenced originally in the early part of September at the offices of the Nottingham branch of the Constitutional Women's Suffrage Society, and later transferred to a more commodious workroom placed at the disposal of the organising committee by Messrs. Levi, Sondheimer and Co., of Short-hill, the finding of employment for local girls thrown out of their situations through the war has grown to such an alarming extent that yesterday when the Duchess of Portland, the Duchess of Rutland, and the Mayoress (Mrs. J. H. Gregg) paid a visit to the new premises, close upon 120 young women were busily engaged turning out piles of garments for the War Relief Fund.

Shortly after its inauguration the scheme was taken over by the Queen's Work for Women Advisory Committee, who enlarged it to the fullest extent, and since that date grants of varying amounts have also been received from the War Relief Committee.

The present organisation is split up into a number of committees; the Emergency Workroom Committee, which provides the hands with employment and pays them at the rate of 3½d. an hour; the Distributing Committee, which apportions the garments made to the poor of the city; and the Entertainments Committee, which will have the task of arranging concerts and parties in the city and county, the proceeds being devoted to the Queen's Fund.

SCOTTISH TRADE AND INDUSTRY.

THE EFFECT OF THE WAR.

[FROM A CORRESPONDENT.]

II.*

THE trade which probably suffered most at the beginning of the war was the Border tweed industry, which, owing to the shutting off of the large German and Austrian market, was for a time threatened with complete collapse. The Government have been able to do very little directly for the general coal trade, but by the placing of large orders for Army equipment, supplemented by large contracts from France and Russia, they have been able to put the Border mills in the meantime in a strong position, and the beneficial effect of this step has already been felt by the subsidiary industries in that district.

The great iron and steel trades—particularly in their higher branches of shipbuilding and engineering—have similarly been beneficially affected by the placing of Government contracts, and with the return of public confidence ordinary commercial orders have also begun to come in. This is particularly noticeable with regard to shipbuilding. Owing to Admiralty orders shipbuilding and its allied industries have positively benefited by the war, and in some of the yards on the Clyde and elsewhere ordinary merchant orders are also beginning to be booked. The importance of our command of the seas is emphasised in this as in many other respects. Shipbuilding and armament orders have played a large part in saving the situation, and it is always to be remembered that though these orders in a strictly economic sense are not productive, the mere fact of the employment of thousands of workers in their fulfilment creates an effective demand upon other branches of industry. In other words, what we have lost in what may be called the civilian home market owing to monetary stringency and economical buying has to a large extent been made good by the enormously increased demands of the home naval and military market. The wholesome stimulus to these industries has undoubtedly also contributed largely to the activity among transport workers by land, and we may remark that the quick recovery of this branch of industry by sea is an equally noticeable feature of the situation. Another thing that we must remember is that wherever there is a demand in the home or in neutral markets, and any home industry at all capable of meeting it, that industry must benefit materially by the wholesale elimination of foreign competition brought about by the conditions of the present war.

Another classification of trade which is of interest at the present moment is that of trades which primarily purvey luxuries and those which purvey necessities. It is a not unwholesome symptom of the present situation that in investigating the present state of affairs on these lines we find that what may be called the luxury trades are among the principal sufferers. To take the drapery and clothing trade generally, we find that even within the confines of a given trade the branches devoted to the provision of its more luxurious products have suffered acutely, while those which cater for the more necessary requirements are in some cases actually doing better than before the war. This is particularly illustrated by the report from the Aberdeen district, which points out that the drapery trade which deals with the poorer class of customers is doing better than before, a fact attributed largely to the wives of reservists in the neighbourhood having more available income than previously. Tailors and mantlemakers' throughout the country report that the high-class line of trade is practically at a standstill, while in Glasgow the mantlemakers' trade, though now suffering little in diminution of actual numbers of orders, is still suffering acutely from the reduced quality and price of the goods demanded. A similar phenomenon is observable in the motor trade, though a certain improvement is now indicated through all its branches. This really means that whilst the public generally is refraining from necessity or prudence, from the purchase of luxuries, the demand in many cases for what may be termed "necessities" by the working classes is not adversely affected by present conditions, and the general state of the confectionery trade, though at first it might seem to contradict this theory, in fact really bears it out. It is noted that the higher grade chocolate trade is good, whilst the lower grade trade in sweets is bad. This means that the poorer classes, whilst not reducing their orders for necessaries, are also cutting off luxuries, whilst those who have a larger margin of income, though cutting off their more expensive luxuries, can still indulge in the comparatively cheaper luxuries, such as high-class confectionery.

One of the industries which has been most adversely affected by the war is the fishing, with its dependent industries. In this case both the restriction of markets and the difficulties of obtaining the staple of the industry are factors which have both been at work. The necessary Admiralty restrictions have seriously affected the herring fishing, and the loss of Continental markets belonging to now enemy nations and the difficulty of transit have produced a very serious state of affairs, which has only been alleviated latterly by an improvement in the inshore fishing, by considerable enlistment in the Naval Reserve and by the continuing migration of fishing populations to southern ports to find employment in merchant vessels and in the southern fishings.

In a category by itself is the building trade. In some districts this has been little affected so far, but the general report is that whilst the trade is busy with existing contracts, further orders are not coming in briskly, and in the less densely populated areas, as in Aberdeenshire, there is a good deal of temporary unemployment, as of house painters, whilst joiners are busy at their work, and of joiners when the work passes on to the house-painting stage and before work has begun on their contracts. This half-way period was formerly largely filled in by small local jobs, the reduction of these having a distinctly adverse effect. On the other hand, Government contracts for hut-building for the troops, &c., have found employment for many men in these subsidiary branches of the building trade. The reports of the Dean of Guild Courts of Glasgow and Edinburgh are not at all encouraging with regard to the prospects for the future, but in this connection we must remember an important consideration which is a great difficulty in estimating the effects of the war on trade and industry in general, because a survey of the building trade in the last few years reveals the fact that, apart from a temporary improvement last year, the continuance of which in any event would seem to have been doubtful, the building trade for the last few years has been in a very depressed condition, and consequently it is very hard to say just how far the present depression is at all due to the war.

It is of interest to observe that in Glasgow the Union of Clerks reports that, in spite of the enormous enlistment of its members, from 12 to 15 per cent. of them are at present unemployed. In view of all the other facts of which we are aware, this would seem to suggest that, whilst from the point of view of the working classes trade and industry is being wonderfully well maintained, the directors of businesses are impressed with the necessity for economy at the present time, and there has been a reduction of staffs in some cases possibly out of proportion to the amount of general unemployment in the business.

In attempting to estimate the general position of trade and industry, two other features must also be noted. One is that whilst at present, apart from the dependants of soldiers and sailors, there is very little actual distress, and not more than in ordinary poor years any great volume of actual unemployment, there is a very considerable amount of under-employment which among thrifty workers will not reveal itself in applications for relief until the savings of these classes have been exhausted. The other point of interest is that in the large urban centres the most acute problem at present appears to be the distress arising from the unemployment and under-employment of women workers.

In the light of what has already been said, it is not surprising to find, on reviewing the situation according to the areas of the country, that Aberdeenshire and Banffshire district, which is largely dependent upon the fishing and allied industries, has been one of the severest sufferers and one of the slowest to recover from the first effects of the war; that the coal industries of Fifeshire have been amongst the most severely affected, and that whilst a certain improvement has taken place there it is so far only of a limited character; that the Border district has, temporarily at least, been restored to prosperity by home and foreign Government contracts; and that the engineering districts of the Clyde, largely on account of Government contracts also, have suffered very little; whilst in the large urban centres of Glasgow and Edinburgh the average maintained has been wonderfully good, the unemployment and under-employment of women being the most serious feature in these localities; that dockyard employment, as at Glasgow, Leith, Aberdeen, and Montrose, varies largely according to local conditions; and that agricultural districts have suffered, if anything, only from a shortage of labour. It is, indeed, an encouraging indication that the Labour Exchanges are now actually furnishing to the Scottish authorities particulars as to areas in Scotland and the North of England where there is a considerable shortage of labour in various employments.

A detailed account of the movement of food prices during this period would be outside the scope of this article, but it may be remarked in passing that the general run of food prices soon steadied to a level not very much above the normal of recent years, though fish and eggs can still hardly be described as satisfactory in this respect. Sugar for a time came under the same category, but the Government action is now bearing fruit in a steady return of the prices towards normal.

We may conclude this attempted estimate by a reference to the weekly totals of the live registers of the Scottish Labour Exchanges in general. These "live registers" give the numbers of applications for employment still being dealt with as on the books of the Exchanges at the end of each week. The totals with which we deal are the totals for the whole of Scotland classified under the heads of "men in insured trades," "men in uninsured trades," "women," "girls," and "boys," and the grand total for each week. In estimating the value of these figures as an indication of the state of trade and industry, we must remember, first, that a considerable percentage of workers of the better class have a distinct aversion from registering on the Labour Exchanges. This is partly a matter of "caste" feeling, and is partly due to the disappointment of men who have registered and have had to wait a very long time for results. Women workers of the better class are particularly averse from such registration, as, indeed, they also are from any application for monetary relief. On the other hand, it has been noted, particularly in Glasgow, that a certain class of men, whilst actually engaged in at least casual labour, will register as applicants for such municipal employment as that of Corporation tramway cleaners, &c., as they consider such employment desirable from its steadiness. It has also to be remembered in considering any record of unemployment that the recent wholesale enlistments and calling up of men to the Reserve has had a tremendous effect in alleviating the conditions of the labour market. But a comparison of all other available data with the figures of the live registers shows them to be a fairly accurate indication of the movements of trade and industry during the war. We may, therefore, compare the figures for the week ending 17th July 1914, when the rumours of war could hardly have affected the labour market, with those of 4th September 1914, when, as far as we have gone, the effects of the war were most severe, and those of 30th October 1914, when, after an almost unbroken improvement from the previous date quoted, the figures show the lowest totals since those of July 17th.

The totals are as follows:—

Date.	Men insured.	Men uninsured.	Women.	Girls.	Boys.	Total.
July 17, 1914 ..	5,797	1466	1431	497	569	9,760
Sept. 4, 1914 ..	11,870	2924	2808	1314	845	19,851
Oct. 30, 1914 ..	5,185	1655	2885	1013	413	11,151

From a consideration of this table, taken, even with the qualifications recommended, we in Scotland have every reason to congratulate ourselves upon the results so far. Indeed, unless the war is abnormally protracted, and given always a sufficiency of reserves for the fighting line, recent indications are all against such a possibility, we may look for a continued improvement in trade and industry as far as actual employment and distress are concerned meanwhile.

The real crisis will arrive with the termination of the war and the return to the labour market of enormous numbers of men at present engaged in the field, but with reasonable forethought and energetic preparation now we ought successfully to surmount that crisis, and actually embark upon a period of even greater prosperity than ever before.

UNEMPLOYMENT OF WOMEN IN EDINBURGH.

WHAT THE SCHOOL BOARD IS DOING.

The question of unemployment caused directly or indirectly through the war has engaged the attention of the Edinburgh School Board, and naturally their particular care is the employment of young boys and girls just leaving school. In order to lessen the influx of children into labour markets which at present may not be too encouraging, the Board has appealed to parents to keep their children at school until the end of the war, or until, at least, suitable employment has been secured. Appeals have also been made to employers to notify all vacancies to the Juvenile Labour Exchange, with whom the School Board are in touch. A special series of day continuation classes is being provided to meet the particular needs of the time, and at a meeting held in the Central Hall, Tollcross, last night, addresses were given under the auspices of the School Board on "Women's Unemployment Caused by the War," and "The Continuation Classes." Mr H. Arthur Rose, Convener of the Continuation Classes Committee, was to have presided, but he has taken a commission in the Edinburgh Battalion, and his place was taken by Mr W. M. Ramsay, of the Hope Trust, ex-Convener of the Continuation Classes Committee.

The Chairman said that many problems confronted them as a consequence of the war, and one important problem calling for solution was the unemployment of women. Speaking later in the evening, he expressed the view that after the present war of arms would come a great war for the world's trade, and he maintained that only by equipping ourselves fully now, and using to every advantage such means as continuation classes, could the young render themselves efficient in order to help in that war when the time came.

Miss Alice Younger, the Board of Trade's Organising Officer of Women's Work in Scotland, was the first to address the meeting, which was composed entirely of women and young girls. In order to show the extent of the problem they had to face when dealing with the employment of women, the speaker stated that at the last census there were 593,000 women earning their living in Scotland. The war had brought much dislocation in trade and industry, and while some trades had been much reduced and others almost suspended, there were industries which were working at top pressure to supply the demands of the Army for clothing and equipment. She showed the work the Labour Exchanges had been doing in advising how women could best adapt themselves to the new demands, but there were still many who could not get work, and who must face difficulty for a time. In order to deal with this class, the Queen's Work for Women Fund had been started in order to provide work, for it was realised that to give work was better than to give charity.

Mrs Selcraig Murray, a member of the School Board, dealt with the work of the School Board in relation to unemployment, and particularly with those activities which were directed towards increasing the efficiency of women.

Miss M. G. Cowan, M.A., also a member of the Board, spoke mainly on the day classes which had been formed, but made it clear that the present day classes had been specially called into being to meet a particular emergency, and was not to be confused with a permanent scheme of day classes which they hoped to have in the future. The classes were only for those who were unemployed; they would have instruction in general, technical, and domestic courses, and the class-rooms would be linked up by telephone with the Labour Exchanges, so that a boy or girl who had his or her name on the Exchange lists could leave immediately a request came for a certain class of worker. At the present time there were 247 young girls between the ages of 14 and 17 out of work in Edinburgh, so that for the whole of Scotland they could put down 1000 as the figure out of employment between these ages.

Lady Carlaw Martin moved a vote of thanks to the speakers, and urged young girls to take whatever employment offered, and not to wait until some particular work which they preferred could be had.

PROGRESS OF THE ORGANISATION IN EDINBURGH.

A meeting of the Sub-Committee on Women's Employment in Edinburgh was held in the City Chambers yesterday afternoon—Mrs T. J. Millar presiding.

It was reported that the workrooms in Melville Street had now been open for a week, and already twenty-three girls, under two experienced forewomen, were at work. There was a renovating room and a sewing room. The girls were paid at the rate of 3d. an hour and 10s. a week, and cheap dinners, the preparation of which was superintended and assisted by voluntary workers from the School of Cookery in Atholl Crescent, were being supplied, and were much appreciated. It was hoped to develop the organisation soon, for new premises had been generously offered, and had been accepted, in Magdala Crescent. One week's experience had shown the value and importance of the work, and many more workrooms were required to meet the present need. Already there were many applicants, and the Committee were anxious to have the scheme under way before the unemployment problem became more pressing. The Committee had several other schemes before them which would enable them to develop their work.

Miss Alice Low was appointed to act as joint secretary with Mrs Maitland.

UNEMPLOYMENT AMONGST WOMEN.

Sir,—In your issue of yesterday you report Mr. Alderman Alsop's interesting statement of what is being done in the evening schools for the direction and efficiency of the girls in their industrial life. We must all give honour to Education Committees that are looking ahead. But in the first place, may I ask whether there is a present shortage of older workers in khaki and allied Government contract business? and, in the second place, if such shortage exists, whether the best method is not to train women now out of work? Our first duty, I beg to submit, is to these.—Yours, &c.,

LUXURY TRADES AND WAR.

(To the Editor of the "North Mail.")

Sir,—Nothing, I think, gives one such an impression of the sterling courage of the Parisians as to read of the quiet way in which their autumn fashion shows are being carried through, and the orders that are being given, not, one may be sure, in order that one woman may outvie another in her dress, but rather in her quiet courage.

Our English women are doing their share in the same direction, but for all their efforts there are many who cannot make their accustomed purchases, and milliners and dressmakers are, to a great extent, without their usual work.

The Newcastle Women Workers' Committee has set up a small workroom at Hope House, Oxford Street, where these girls are being employed in dressing dolls in the uniforms of the Allied Armies. Thomas Atkins is there with all his little pockets and leather trappings; Piou-Piou in the crimson trousers that the Germans know so well, and his poor brother from Belgium; also a gorgeous Zouave is shortly to be joined by a Highlander and a Cossack.

Those who cannot make their usual purchases of winter smart clothes will, we are sure, still find a few shillings to spare in toys for their children friends at Christmas. If they will spend this money in purchasing these dolls, which will certainly be particularly popular and appealing to the children this Christmas, they will be able at the same time to give employment to those of their poorer sisters who are especially hard hit by the war.

Orders may be placed and dolls can be seen at the shop, 51, Blackett Street, or ordered from the Women Workers' Committee.—Yours, etc.,

ETHEL M. N. WILLIAMS,
Chairman.

The mineral water manufacturers have to face the rise in the price of sugar together with the fact that the Government have commandeered the greater number of their horses. Messrs. White alone have had 500 horses taken, with consequent dislocation of the distribution, and their girls have had to suffer. Laundry people have suffered the same way, and hundreds of women are displaced in the laundries, while all the little workshops and factories employing twenty or thirty girls, such as the places where ostrich feathers are handled, have shut up. In the West End and other drapers' shops the wages of the assistants has, with few exceptions, been severely reduced, while certain of the girls have been told to take extended holidays. At a low estimate, 8,000 girls in London are already out of work, while 75 per cent. of the remainder are not taking more than half their ordinary wage. When it is remembered that the wages of the greater number of these girls and women are so low that they must keep in full work to live at all, it is surprising to note the spirit in which they have met the cruel situation in which they find themselves. There is not a single complaint as to the harshness of employers, not even from the Women's Trade Union officials. Everyone recognises the inevitable nature of these happenings, and if they do not accept the position cheerfully, they at least do not grumble. It is to be hoped that the necessary relief for these poor women will be given out quickly, and I believe that it will.

A. L. H. and BARBE.—As an occupation translating is not to be recommended; it is very poorly paid, and the market is quite overstocked with women who translate French and German. You might, however, write to the secretary of the Central Bureau for the Employment of Women, 5, Princes-street, Cavendish-square, London, W., who will advise you on the matter. It is a bureau dealing with the professions and employments of educated women, and there may be a chance of obtaining translation work through that medium. A small fee is charged for advice. You might also advertise in Women's Employment, which is a most useful paper issued fortnightly by the bureau.

WAR-TIME EMPLOYMENT OF WOMEN

APPEAL TO AGRICULTURAL COLLEGE.

The Dairy and Poultry Committee of the Governors of the North of Scotland College of Agriculture recently received a deputation from the Women's Corps and Bureau War Emergency Workers' Committee, 173a Union Street, on the question of the employment of women on the land in the cultivation of vegetables, poultry farming, and pig rearing, and otherwise, as a means of fresh occupation to women deprived of their usual means of livelihood during the war. Miss Marguerite Ferguson, who appeared in the deputation along with Miss Sarah C. Dunbar and Miss Jean Coutts, addressed the meeting, and urged on the committee the necessity, in the present circumstances, of assisting in developing the production of eggs, poultry, dairy produce, and pig rearing, which was largely recognised as women's work. She further stated that there was room for the development of afforestation, an occupation in which women could be usefully employed.

In the discussion which followed, several members pointed out the openings there were for the services of women in connection with domestic work both in counties and in towns, which would absorb a very large number of people, and probably girls of the fishing class, as well as shop assistants and dressmakers, would find employment in this way, as well as in the other lines of industry suggested by the committee. The Chairman (Mr Alexander Wilkie) suggested that, in the meantime, the secretary should be instructed to give the names and addresses of the Dairy and Poultry Committee to the secretary of the Women's Corps and Bureau Committee, with whom they should communicate in order to ascertain the needs of the various districts, and the openings for employment which could be found for women of the class referred to. The chairman also explained that he had spoken to Mr Gammell, the chairman of the Forestry Committee, who had in view certain proposals which could start at once, in connection with which the services of women could be utilised.

UNEMPLOYMENT AMONG WOMEN.

Efforts to deal with unemployment among women are being pursued with the thoroughness which the really serious nature of the situation demands. The Soldiers' and Sailors' Families Association, whose work has been generously acknowledged in the House of Commons, is arranging that its clerical work shall be done by professional women clerks. I am told that in London alone this will ensure five weeks' employment to over a hundred clerks in dealing with arrears of work, and it is probable that further work will then be available for many of them. The City of London Committee of the National Relief Fund has been giving very careful consideration to the same problem, and has approached the Central Committee on Women's Employment in relation to some comprehensive schemes. The case of female shorthand typists receives special consideration, but a scheme for providing "Home Helps" is now in hand.

PUBLIC WORK AND WOMEN'S EMPLOYMENT.

RULES FOR THIS DEPARTMENT.

1. Letters of enquiry should be accompanied by the Public Work and Women's Employment Coupon, which will be found in the advertisement pages. The coupon must be duly filled up, and the letter be addressed to the Public Work and Women's Employment Editor, Queen Office, Bream's Buildings, London, E.C.

2. The Editor does not undertake to forward letters from one correspondent to another, but will endeavour to do so when the letter to be forwarded is sufficiently stamped, bears the pseudonym or initials of the addressee, and is enclosed under a separate cover addressed to the Public Work and Women's Employment Editor. Letters cannot be forwarded when more than a fortnight has elapsed since the publication of the Queen containing the pseudonym or initials of the addressee. An exception to this rule is only made on behalf of correspondents living at places more than a week's journey by post from London.

3. The Editor of this department does not send addresses or engage (save under circumstances which the Editor may deem exceptional) in private correspondence.

4. Difficulties which may be solved by advertising cannot be dealt with. The Editor, however, will gladly advise in all other matters connected with the subject in which guidance may be desired—such, e.g., as general education, special profession or technical training conditions of tuition, and apprenticeship, openings for particular kinds of work, and where and how to set up in business.

5. Correspondents who forward trustworthy information respecting opportunities for women's public and voluntary work or remunerative employment will confer a benefit upon applicants to this department, for which the Editor will be much obliged.

BUSINESS UNUSUAL.

By MRS MARGARET HEITLAND.

BUSINESS THERE IS in these days—more business than ever for anybody who can do anything—but to talk about business being "as usual" is pitiful folly.

Many of the most deplorable conventions and ideas which were "as usual," and threatened so to remain for ever, have gone, have dropped away and been destroyed. Their destruction might well have been compassed without the loss of any man's life.

Looking at people and their movements just now, I confess to a sense of surprise at the general readiness to discard the "as usual" spirit and to accept unusual duties with zeal. People who formerly said "I am always at home on Thursdays in November," "I always lie down for half an hour before dinner," "I always go to the Riviera at Christmas," now spare us these statements and probably go always (though they may say nothing about it) to a committee room to lear a hand in some rather fatiguing work. There are people whom I should have thought that nothing but death could compel to abandon their (to me) very stupid fixities of custom, who, all the same, have abandoned them as though quick change were quite their nature. It only shows how far we are yet from any accurate science of humanity.

The war, apart from all the political changes it will bring about in the relative size and importance of the nations, will for a generation have greatly altered each nation in itself by reason of these changes of work and habit. None of us who, during the war, have changed our rules of life will be the same sort of persons afterwards.

Many of us—women in particular—will have learnt that it is possible to fill a day so very much closer than we used to pack it, even when we talked most about "the hurry and stress of modern existence." I am not referring to those women only who did nothing but what they termed "social duties." But I think also of women who used in peace days to look in for half an hour at one committee and half an hour at another, and miss a third by going to somebody's afternoon tea. To women of this sort—pseudo-busy women—it comes as a revelation of the use of time when they spend several hours in one place, steadily writing business letters or making out a catalogue of refugees' addresses. Women of this type who were wont to complain of being frightfully busy and driven, actually lost the greater part of the day in locomotion. Anchored to any one of the spots where they were by way of helping, they could really have accomplished something. "Business unusual" is giving them a grand training.

What again is unusual is the almost complete stoppage of book study for young men. In university streets a black gown, be it no more than a little wisp, a shadow of fluttering drapery, has an unbusinesslike look. Khaki is the only handsome wear. But the person in the khaki must know something. We realise the significance of that as we never did before. People who have not trained their minds and their senses, who have not made the most of their aim and their sight and their hearing, who have not studied engineering and the forces of mechanism, are not of much use. They ought to be able to do business unusual with the trained body and mind which carry a man over the early difficulties into the heart of his job.

The games mania which to many of us at the time of the Boer War seemed so shocking in its persistence has sensibly weakened. A man must offer himself a long private explanation before he can be content to be watching men play football or ride races for bets while other fellow men are in the trenches and fellow-women are at their posts. In the midst of death and waste and horror there is in some directions a stoppage of waste and a sudden determination to turn everything and everybody to some use. It is terrible that nothing short of such a war as this and the agonising deaths of millions of men in the prime of their strength should be able to check the sheer idle waste of life and of the fruits of human labour. Yet thus it would seem to be. If people are no longer throwing away wealth purposelessly, no longer dashing about in expensive motor-cars on absolutely useless errands, no longer buying clothes and food and wine that they do not want, the reason of this abrupt return to decent conduct is that elsewhere the waste and loss are so gigantic that the lives and the goods that remain have suddenly acquired more value. The same conditions which send up the price of meat and eggs, and make a common motor 'bus appear almost precious, also make our time of consequence. We are beginning to draw on our time reserves, and to find in them an asset about which nobody troubled before. Now that there is much to be done, and quickly too, the fact stands out that thousands of able-bodied middle and upper class women have vast reserves of time which they cannot be allowed to waste after the old manner. The real unemployedness of almost all the women who are not bringing up young children or doing public or wage-paid work becomes generally apparent, and is no longer glossed over or treated as justifiable. "We must get some of you ladies to do this work," says the business man when a new duty is thrust upon an overworked committee, "I have to attend to my own business part of the day." In war time it is taken for granted that "ladies" have no business; for in war time we strip truth bare.

In the stripping process the people who in peace were rather useless are now useless in an extreme degree. And the lowest rung of uselessness is occupied by men of the semi-genteel, semi-educated clerk type. The very urban, black-coated man who is rather too old or too feeble to fight, is difficult to use in any way. He can neither make roads, nor put up hospital or army huts, nor drive a car. The middle-class woman is fairly useless, but not so useless as he is. She can do more things for herself and other people, and she never seems to be quite so much in the way. She blends with a domestic setting if she is doing no more than knit a comforter; but the unoccupiedness of the black-coated man is loudly accentuated, not to be blurred. The difficulties of the Belgian refugee problem are complicated by the presence of the black-coated man. There can be no pretence of "business as usual" while he is most obviously without any business. A Belgian potato-digger is all right; a Belgian woman who can cook for all her family is equally right. Even the stout Madame who has been accustomed to sit sphinx-like for hours behind the comptoir of an Antwerp restaurant, is rather more pliable than she looks. But the Belgian clerk is ill to place. The worst of it is Belgium rather runs to clerks. It is (to express oneself irregularly) one of the towniest countries in Europe.

And everything towny or ornamental or luxurious is tremendously "off" at present. There is no "business as usual" among the luxury trades, but there is business unusual among the utilities. The one luxury, however, that we appreciate more than ever is good workmanship. We do not tend to fall into the artistic sin of "constructing ornament," but we do thoroughly value the perfection of simple construction which the real artist or expert (as opposed to the bungler) can give us.

This epoch of "business unusual" finds many of us changing our work and our places, but we must carry into our new work any of the gifts which practice had developed in the old. The only things I long to see left behind as sheer lumber are the conventional follies and time-and-money wasting habits which have dominated society for fifty years or more.

There is a little lumber mixed up with Christmas

JEWISH GIRLS AND NON-EMPLOYMENT.

[COMMUNICATED.]

Since the outbreak of war the Jewish Association for the Protection of Girls and Women has had its hands full in dealing with a large number of Jewish girls who were thrown out of employment owing to the war, and who, but for the intervention of the Association, might have been brought into circumstances of danger through lack of occupation. The need for special measures was first brought under the notice of the Association by the fact that several members of the Girls' Club conducted under its auspices were discovered to be out of employment and in a destitute condition. It was accordingly resolved to open temporary workrooms to save these girls from starvation, and with the exception of the West Central Jewish Girls' Club, which took similar action a day previously, the Association was the first organisation to organise this particular kind of relief. The workroom was opened with twelve girls on August 21st at the premises of the Association in Mansell Street. The fact speedily became known in the East End and the Association was immediately overwhelmed with applications for admission to the workrooms. By the end of August eighty-seven girls were at work, which number grew in the following week to over 220. From that date conditions in the labour market improved, and at present between fifty and sixty girls are employed.

No girl is admitted to the workroom who has not previously registered at a Labour Exchange, and every encouragement is given to the girls to find regular employment. The workrooms are open from 10 to 4, so that opportunity is provided in the morning and evening for the girls to seek regular work. A nominal wage of 1s. per day is paid to those in attendance at the workroom, which suffices to save the girls from starvation, though the payment is not such as to attract girls to remain if other openings are available. At first it was hoped that the workrooms would receive a grant from the Queen's Fund, but it was found that this fund was only available for British-born girls, and only a small percentage of the girls affected would have come within that category. The application for a grant was accordingly withdrawn, and the workrooms have since been supported from private sources, no portion of the ordinary funds of the Association having been utilised for this purpose. The Committee of the Association are greatly exercised on the question of finance, and it is hoped that members of the community will give financial help to the workrooms.

Every care has been taken to ensure that the workrooms shall not compete with paid labour, and work is only accepted for charitable purposes such as gifts to the soldiers' refugees homes, philanthropic institutions, etc. Most of the girls are unskilled labourers, and the majority of them have to receive special instruction, which, though it makes the work quite unremunerative, will fit the girls for better-paid employment when they again enter the labour market. The Committee would be grateful for orders for making shirts, scarves, underclothing, baby linen, etc. The work is superintended by a paid organiser who is assisted by voluntary helpers. Among the girls employed are several refugees from France and Belgium, who are received as a preventive measure, to safeguard them from the dangers of the streets, to which they would be exposed were they totally without occupation. The workrooms were visited last week by Lady Rothschild, who expressed great approval of the work that is being done and commended it to the sympathetic consideration of the community.

MUSICIANS AND THE WAR

EMERGENCY ENTERTAINMENTS.

While it is inevitable that there should be great distress in the ranks of musicians and actors during the war, it is good to know that very real and thoroughly well-organised efforts are being made to alleviate their misfortunes. The committee of the War Emergency Entertainments, of which Lady Helmsley, Mr. Gordon Selfridge, and Miss Elizabeth Asquith are moving spirits, inaugurated at Claridge's Hotel yesterday afternoon, with the aid of Mr. Isidore de Lara, a series of concerts which certainly ought to achieve some tangible result.

Miss Asquith pointed out that musicians had always been the first willingly to give their services in the cause of charity, and she felt it to be a debt of honour for the organisers of charitable entertainments to whose aid they had come, to do something for them now. No musician cared to accept charity, so in order that they might be given that opportunity of living by their art which, at present, was denied to them, a number of concerts was being organised, not only in London, but also all over the country, at which engagements would be offered them, with a minimum guaranteed fee, to be increased should the receipts render it possible. Miss Asquith expressed a hope that the movement would grow and spread from town to town, and that it would receive the ardent support even of those who felt strongly disinclined to go to any form of entertainment at the present moment.

Certainly the attendance at the first concert was excellent, and if this measure of support is always forthcoming the success of the project should be assured. During the afternoon Miss Asquith appeared not only as speaker but also as reciter, giving Kipling's "If" with an admirably direct simplicity. Among the singers were Miss Ada Davies, Miss Elizabeth Amsden, and Mr Philip Ritte; the pianists included the Ranee of Sarawak, who was associated with Mr. Luis Figueras in Saint-Saëns's "Le Cygne" and Davidoff's "La Sorgenta"; Miss Romanitza sang and danced a scene from Mr. de Lara's "Messaline," to the composer's accompaniment. Miss Gwendolyn Teagle played violin solos, and Miss Evelyn Hoope recited Emile Cammaerts' "Chantons, Belges, Chantons," and other pieces. Madame Hope Temple and Miss Ethel Attwood were the accompanists.

LONDON'S UNEMPLOYED.

EFFECT OF EARLY CLOSING.

Some interesting particulars concerning London's unemployed were given by Mr. Frank Brinsley-Harper, the chairman, at yesterday's meeting of the Central (Unemployed) Body for London. Outdoor pauperism showed a decrease last week of 28 on the previous week. School feeding on Saturday and Sunday was continued in five boroughs—Bethnal-green, Finsbury, Hackney, Shoreditch, and Southwark. The figures on Saturday were 944, and on Sunday 538 as compared with 1,025 and 503. Casual wards were 290 last week, as against 265 in the previous week.

There was practically no material change in employment. If anything there was a slight improvement in ordinary trade. The building trade was slack, especially in the West-end. The trench work required by the Government in London was over; but orders for winter housing were still employing a considerable number of men. The clothing trade dependent on the Government was better owing to the distribution of contracts, while furniture was benefiting by a better distribution of Government orders. At the Docks and the Port of London more men were employed than a year ago, and the casual docker was much in demand. Restaurants were seriously affected by no banquets being held and early closing. One well-known West-end restaurant had discharged 200 men; but English waiters had not benefited to the extent expected, owing to the employment of Dutch, Swiss, and Italians. The worst trade in London last week was the fur skin-dressers which was being sub-contracted to the fourth and fifth degree, which seemed incredible.

DISTRESS AMONG WOMEN.

So far as their own figures were concerned, the registrations were 17,308, including 10,406 women, which compared with 5,095 last year, inclusive of 486 women. They had found work for 2,397, as against 667 last year. Of the total, 1,102 were [illegible] a. The great distress was among the women [illegible]ant on themselves; principally dressmakers, [illegible]rs, laundresses, and charwomen.

[illegible]nty-two of the twenty-eight boroughs work[illegible]re in operation. There were forty-two [illegible]ntrolled by the Central Body, the Central [illegible] and the Mayors' Committees, and in all [illegible]en were employed at a cost of £1,885. That was an annual cost of £100,000 [illegible]um for women alone, and of the sum [illegible] fell on the Queen's Women's Fund. Other [illegible] were in view, so that although women's un[illegible]ment was serious, it was being dealt with [illegible]s.

PAID TO GO TO SCHOOL.

NOVEL SCHEME FOR HELPING UNEMPLOYED GIRLS.

To provide young girls of 16 years of age and under, who have lost their employment in consequence of the war, with suitable occupation and maintenance, the Central Committee on Women's Employment has prepared a scheme with the approval of the National Relief Fund.

The essential feature of the scheme is that the education authority shall provide special classes suitable for the girls, and that the local relief committees should send girls to school instead of giving them employment in workrooms.

The L.C.C. has already opened classes at the Borough Polytechnic.

Girls attending school will be paid 4s. a week each.

The Star, Nov. 18th 1914.

OUT OF WORK GIRLS.

Practical Scheme of Education During War Time.

For the girl of sixteen and under who has been thrown out of employment by the war a scheme of education with maintenance has been devised by the Central Committee on Women's Employment, and has received the approval of the National Relief Fund.

The essential feature is that these girls, while attending day classes for general and technical education, will be paid four shillings a week. Besides this, they are to have a mid-day meal on five days a week.

The scheme provides that, while the girls are attending school, partly to improve their general education, they shall also attend classes of the trades in which they have been employed, in order to increase their chance of good employment later.

These classes are in direct communication with the Labour Exchanges and the Junior Advisory Committees, and as soon as any vacant posts arise in the labour markets word is sent by telephone to the schools, and the pupils are allowed to leave the classes and to apply for the situation. Preference is, and will be, given to the young people attending these classes.

WOMEN AND THE WAR

DISTRESS AMONG PARISIAN WORKERS.

SOCIALISTS AND THE STRUGGLE

(FROM OUR CORRESPONDENT.)

PARIS, Wednesday.

Women are amongst the greatest sufferers from the present war conditions, and more particularly unmarried women, as they have no claim to State allowances like their sisters who are wives and mothers. If, however, they can present to the Mayor of their district a duly signed certificate to show that they are completely thrown out of work by the war and almost destitute a little money is given them. But thousands of respectable women accustomed to support themselves by their own work would almost rather starve than accept alms. Seeing the prevailing distress of female workers, both girls and adults, the "Humanité" protests indignantly and rightly against the conduct of certain employers who consent to keep on their female hands but reduce their wages by 50 per cent., the hours of labour remaining the same as before. Happily, however, it is rare.

In a variety of ways the people of Paris seek to come to the aid of distressed women and girls. At several second-class restaurants notices are posted up to the effect that women coming alone will be charged half price for lunch or dinner, the menu being the same as for customers paying full price. At "ouvroirs" opened by charitable society ladies female workers are taken on at a fair price for making warm clothes for soldiers. Be it said in passing that were those wealthy ladies who, with their daughters, spend their time in knitting socks, gloves, or underwear for the army, to leave this work to their poorer sisters, who would earn a few francs per day for doing it, the soldiers would be as well served, while the destitute female worker might be spared the shame of soliciting alms or the alternative of possible self destruction when the last penny is spent. It is painful at the present time to note the number of women, evidently never intended for the occupation, who trudge for hours about the city selling newspapers. Their timidity and awkwardness tells against them, and frequently after hours spent on the streets the poor famished creatures have not earned the few pence needed to buy a pound of bread.

A good many hotels offer accommodation to Belgian or French refugees with a reduction of 50 per cent. Some of the prominent Paris hotels, moreover, are advertising special terms for French families of the better class who may be returning to Paris, but owing to war conditions are unable to resume life in their west-end flats for lack of servants and so on. These hotels announce they will take people at the rate of 12f. per day with the three usual meals and no extra charge for firing, lighting, or bathroom. I believe a good many families whose normal existence has been disorganised by the war will profit by this economical arrangement.

The "Figaro" is engaged in a discussion with the Socialist press on the theory of "two Germanys"—the one responsible for the war, hateful, barbarous, and dangerous; the other the proletariaas, merely victims of German Imperialism. The "Figaro" declares such a theory to be perilous and demoralising at a moment when the flower of the French nation is on the battlefield fighting for civilisation and emancipation from Teutonic militarism. The public are warned not to be [illegible]ay by such doctrines and to shut [illegible] against ill-timed sentiments.

A WAR EXPERIMENT.

Sheffield's Effort to Cope with Unemployment among Women.

Again Sheffield has shown enterprise and initiative in public service. Long before "Schools for Mothers" caught the imagination of London our city had passed the experimental stage in similar work via organisations with the less catchpenny titles of the Baby Clinic and the Motherhood League.

And even as London has established its workrooms where women who have lost employment through the war can find work, so has Sheffield. The house on the estate known as Abbeyfield Park, Pitsmoor, is the locale of the experiment, and here when the writer called yesterday were about 40 girls and women varying in age from 16 to 64 busily engaged on repairing or making over old garments, and cutting out and making up new material into shirts and dresses. These civic workrooms, for such they may be called, give ordinary commercial rates of pay, and are under Factory Act regulations. They are open from 9 a.m. to 5 p.m., a total of 39 hours per week, but each worker is restricted to a weekly output of 30 hours.

Lady Mayoress Interested.

A sub-committee appointed jointly from the Distress Committee and the Ladies' Civic Aid Committee is responsible for the inauguration and management of this experiment, an experiment in which the new Lady Mayoress (Mrs. Oliver C. Wilson) is deeply interested, and with which Mrs. Robert Styring and Dr. Helen Wilson are closely associated. The house has been lent by the Corporation, the Tramways Committee has made a grant of £150 towards wages, while expenses are paid from the Lord Mayor's Relief Fund. Beyond the sweeping of the walls, the scrubbing of the floors, and the introduction of the necessary tables (these a loan by the Markets Committee) there has been little preparation necessary for turning the south wing of Abbeyfield Park into an admirable set of civic workrooms. True a gas stove has had to be installed in the spacious room, which acts as a kitchen-dining room, but this has been done free by the Gas Company, who have also put up the other necessary gas fittings. Even the sewing machines are a loan from Messrs. Jones, and the crockery, except for breakages, is lent free by Messrs. Stenton and Price. So it will be seen that no big initial outlay has been incurred.

Much of the work done has been for the Ladies' Civic Aid Committee Clothing Depot, whence is sent weekly a list of the garments specially needed. The day of the writer's visit a batch of ready cut out shirts and waistcoats had arrived from the Army and Navy Aid Committee, who will, of course, pay for the making up of the garments. Indeed the civic workrooms will take orders for any kind of plain sewing, mending, or simple dressmaking at ordinary commercial rates of pay.

Necessary Conditions.

Workers are only admitted through the Labour Bureau, where they must register each week, and where the officials encourage them to enter both on the relief works register and on the ordinary trades register. This prevents a woman becoming too closely associated with relief work—an always undesirable possibility—and keeps her in touch with any openings that may occur for getting back into her own special trade again. For all the workers in the civic workrooms are not skilled dressmakers and tailoresses—they include laundresses, office cleaners, and charwomen who have lost their employment through the war. Indeed these civic workrooms will better fulfil the purpose for which they were established if they merely prove stop-gaps, and do not attract a stationary body of entrants. Arrangements are being made to investigate every case with a view to accomplishing this.

Educational Value.

The educational value of these civic workrooms ought not to be lost sight of. Just because some of the entrants are not skilled seamstresses they have very often to be taught even the rudiments of sewing and mending, and thus while earning a wage are actually acquiring a practical knowledge that will stand them in good stead throughout their lives The women benefit too in another direction for by the small payment of 2d. each they can partake of a hot dinner every day served in a bright, warm room.

Not the least fascinating of all the arrangements are those connected with the catering and cooking department. Here a trained cookery teacher is in command, giving her services entirely free. How valuable Miss Baldwin's services are may be gathered from the fact that under her judicious marketing and knowledge of food values it has been possible to make the 2d. payments cover the cost of foodstuffs for an entire week. Always the hot dinner consists of two courses, either a soup followed by a roly-poly pudding, or stew followed by rice or suet pudding. On Fridays steamed or boiled fish is served followed by bread pudding. Potatoes appear at every meal, and the average consumption for a week is 1¾ stones.

Ideal Conditions.

While Mrs. Robert Styring and Dr. Helen Wilson are daily visitors to Abbeyfield Park and take an oversight of everything, the civic workrooms have a capable paid manageress in Miss Bennett. There is also an assistant manageress who does most of the cutting out, and two of the workers give a hand each morning in the kitchen.

Lofty, spacious workrooms lighted by wide windows giving an outlook over green lawns to a miniature lake, are the ideal conditions of work found at Abbeyfield Park. Can one doubt that they conduce to a greater cheeriness of mind than is the lot of most humble workers? Certainly the women who have known them, thanks to Sheffield's experiment, already show a marked physical improvement.

M. A.

The Queen, Nov. 21st. 1914.

The best antidote for worry, we know, is work, and every week that passes brings new opportunities for joining in some work that aims to keep under check the suffering and want that must result where the ordinary trade of the country is dislocated and many works are closed down. Crowds of women have become the only breadwinners of the family; many are thrown entirely out of work because of the withdrawal of men from the factories and shops. The women all suffer most because their work is largely unorganised and their names are unregistered. The first step to take in any district where attempt is made to meet distress is to establish a labour exchange, so that time and effort in seeking work themselves shall not be wasted. The country town might follow the example of certain outlying districts of London, by establishing a labour exchange first, then bringing round this a women's settlement, which settlement embraces one or more workrooms, a kitchen and dining-room, a crèche, and suitable sanitary accommodation. In such a centre you have a rallying point for the workless and friendless, and the time of waiting while their usual employment is closed to them is usefully and happily filled up.

To be quite practical, let us instance the example set in West Ham, a district where large factories abound which employ mostly young girls and women. A hall has been taken which will accommodate 150 workers; there is a comfortable dining-room and a kitchen, and the girls take turn in batches in cooking the dinner that is provided free. They also take turn in squads to do the cleaning and washing up. They have classes in practical housewifery, in dress-cutting, and in health instruction. In the evening they are taught Swedish drill and games.

In the workroom they are making, under direction, children's pinafores, stays, bibs, and simple articles that can be sold among poor wives and mothers; as they improve finer needlework will be taken in, also mending. While doing this temporary work the girls are encouraged to improve themselves in reading and writing and general knowledge, and to keep their names on the books of the labour exchange so that as soon as better-paid work offers they may get it.

Providing temporary help like this is better than any amount of charity doled out in gifts. Those who help others to help themselves are doing a good that will not pass when the time of distress is gone.

The war time is bringing all classes of women more closely together, and we want the good of this to leave its permanent mark by a lifting-up of the poor out of their hopeless acceptance of poverty under wretched conditions, and by at least some dispersal of the ignorance that makes generation after generation continue repeating the mistakes that hinder progress.

Some of the work that is undertaken is necessarily of a type that would not be needed in a time of normal prosperity; of that type, perhaps, is the provision of cheap meals such as our great penny dinner centres supply. These may, or may not, become a national winter institution. While this time of stress lasts they are, at any rate, a national necessity. But there are many forms of work that, started as emergency measures, will crystallise, we hope, into permanent benefits. Whatever the type is, be it temporary or permanent, there need not be a single idle pair of hands even in a country that is, as some tell us, "untouched by the reality of war."

L. H. YATES.

Everyman, Nov. 20th. 1914.

The war is having, as, indeed, it must, an immediate, and in some cases a terrible, effect upon women, and especially upon women of the middle classes. Thousands of them who but recently were fairly comfortably provided for, or who found it easy to earn a livelihood, are now faced with the necessity of working, and working hard, to earn their daily bread. There is a grave danger in such a situation—the danger that the market will be flooded with cheap female labour who will turn to any unskilled trade that presents itself. To avert this, practical steps are being taken, one is glad to learn, by the Central Bureau for the Employment of Women." Practical, first-hand instruction is given to all women who want to make their way in the world, and due account is taken of any special aptitudes or accomplishments that they possess. Untrained workers are taught suitable trades, and those who are already proficient are helped to find employment. The scheme is an admirable one, but its operations should be directed, not from one but many centres.

The New Statesman,
November 21st. 1914.

The official statements as to unemployment and distress become weekly more optimistic, and even complacent; and it certainly does appear as if the provision of "maintenance under (military) training" for a million and a quarter men had now reduced the unemployed men—apart from cotton and furniture—to no more than "normal." Among the two and a half millions of men in the insured trades, for which alone we have exact statistics, there are almost exactly the same number as this time last year, or fewer than a hundred thousand, standing idle—a sufficiently startling total out of only one-sixth of the wage-earning population. The reduction to this "normal" level is, however, not so much due to the increase since August in the volume of business, though there has been a steady increase, not wholly caused by Government orders, as to the successive withdrawals from the labour market of the men taken into training. The success of this method of dealing with an unparalleled shrinking of employment has, indeed, been complete. Without it, we should have had a million and a half men standing idle, falling off in health and character, and rapidly going to the bad. As it is, at no previous time of bad trade has there been, among men, so little deterioration and so little distress; and the Chancellor of the Exchequer is able this month peremptorily to stop all expenditure having for its object the augmenting of the volume of employment or the relief of an overstocked labour market.

Unfortunately, the official optimism refuses to see that matters stand otherwise with regard to the five millions of women wage-earners, for the unemployed among whom—proportionately as numerous as among the men—there has been no far-reaching provision of "maintenance under training." In Lancashire and Cheshire, in particular, the number of women wholly without wages still keeps not far short of a hundred thousand, whilst probably twice as many are earning only a few shillings a week. The continued failure of the Government to make special provision for this quite special stress of unemployment in the cotton trade seems to us scandalous. In London, where twenty thousand women and girls were turned off on the outbreak of war, fewer than three thousand seem to be yet provided for by the "Women's Training Centres," which the Central Committee for Women's Employment is struggling to increase. Throughout the whole country we cannot learn that as many as twenty thousand, out of the probable total of a quarter of a million of unemployed women wage-earners, have had any sort of "training" offered to them, or other maintenance provided. The Cabinet Committee, in fact, refuses to take the unemployment among women wage-earners seriously; and we see no sign of any intention on the part of the Government to do even a twentieth as much for the five million females as they are doing for the fourteen million males. The women have a real grievance here.

Trade Unemployment.

A good idea of the state of business with the felt and silk hat factories can be obtained from the Board of Trade "Labour Gazette," which every month publishes particulars of the extent of unemployment in various trades. The October issue of this publication stated that employment in the silk hat trade during September was bad, and rather worse than a month ago. It was considerably worse than a year ago. During October employment in the silk department was very bad and worse than in September. On an average the operatives were working half the normal hours.

Although in the felt hat trade employment was also reported as bad, and much worse than a year ago, it is gratifying to notice that there has been a distinct improvement on the conditions prevailing at the end of August, when the percentage of trade union members without work was as high as 37.8. At the end of September, 11 per cent. were unemployed. A year ago the percentage was only 3.6. A further slight improvement took place in October, only 5 per cent. of the trade union members being unemployed at the end of the month.

Denton continues to suffer severely by reason of the trade depression. The state of things in that town, which is essentially a felt hat-making centre, and has no other industries of any import, will be gathered when it is learnt that 95 out of every hundred workers were reported to be on short time. Employment was also bad at Stockport, while in Warwickshire, at Nuneaton, Atherstone, &c., it was quiet. The same conditions prevailed during October, the operatives at Stockport working only from 20 to 30 hours a week.

THE URGENT DEMAND FOR ARMY CLOTH.

LABOUR DIFFICULTIES IN HUDDERSFIELD.

The extraordinary position with which employers and operatives in the Huddersfield district are faced in consequence of the big demand for khaki, which has caused great pressure in some departments and slackness in others, was discussed by the Huddersfield War Relief Committee yesterday, Mr. W. Dale Shaw presiding.

A sub-committee recommended that an advertisement be issued requesting female workers who are unemployed or who are working short time and earning less than 15s. per week to register themselves at the labour exchange or at the various district centres for the payment of relief, and that copies of the advertisement be sent to the various workplaces in the borough.

Mr. T. Topping (Labour) said an endeavour was being made to ascertain the number of those who are under-employed.

Mr. Fred Wood said it was not generally known that persons under-employed in the cloth mending and dressmaking trades were entitled to relief.

The Chairman gave figures as to advertisements that had appeared in the local press for girls, boys, men, and women. He urged that the committee should be careful in asking anyone to come on to the funds at present. He thought some employment could yet be found for a considerable portion of those who were under-employed or out of employment.

Mr. Owen Balmforth asked whether it would not be possible to draft into the district some of the Lancashire cotton operatives.

Mr. Topping said the cotton weavers of Lancashire would not think of coming to Huddersfield or into Yorkshire owing to the comparatively lower wages paid in the woollen trade.

Mr. J. S. Armitage asked what provision had been made for teaching woollen menders to weave, and said that some girls were earning only 1s. 6d. per fortnight.

Mr. A. V. Priestley, a manufacturer, said that the practised weavers were very willing to help the learners. A clever girl could learn to weave the sort of work required by the Government within a week. The greatest shortage of labour was in the spinning department. His firm had advertised and had received replies from sixty Lancashire cotton operatives who were willing to come to Huddersfield if lodgings could be secured for them.

Mr. Alfred Shaw (president of the Trades Council) said there was a difficulty in getting the material to weave. In one instance fifty-six weavers had to go home and wait for material. He asked why others should be taught to weave when full employment could not be found for the present weavers. The girl menders considered themselves skilled workers, and would not lower themselves to learn to weave. Unfortunately, the menders would bide their poverty before they would go into the "loom gate."

The recommendations of the sub-committee were adopted.

The Unemployment Problem.

Efforts to deal with unemployment among women are being pursued with the thoroughness which the really serious nature of the situation demands. The Soldiers and Sailors' Families Association, whose work has been generously acknowledged in the House of Commons, is arranging that its clerical work shall be done by professional women clerks.

I am told that in London alone this will ensure five weeks' employment to over a hundred clerks in dealing with arrears of work, and it is probable that further work will then be available for many of them.

The City of London Committee of the National Relief Fund has been giving very careful consideration to the same problem, and has approached the Central Committee on Women's Employment in relation to some comprehensive schemes.

The case of female shorthand typists receives special consideration, but a scheme for providing "Home Helps" is now in hand.

Evening Standard & St. James Gazette,

TRAINING LOANS.

ASSISTANCE FOR EDUCATED WOMEN PREPARING FOR PROFESSIONS.

The difficulty of obtaining work, where educated girls are concerned, is at the present moment a problem which has a counterpart in the impossibility in many cases of meeting the expenses of training.

Many parents, in fact, are finding it necessary to prepare their daughters for a career, while at the same time the growing expenses and general curtailment of income which make a girl's earnings a necessity also create the difficulty of finding training fees. Owing to a handsome legacy which has been left to the Society for Promoting the Employment of Women, 23, Berners-street, Oxford-street, W., by one of its oldest supporters, the committee will, however, shortly be able to assist a larger number of girls with loans for this purpose than has hitherto been possible.

Repaying by Instalments.

The object of the society, which is over fifty-five years old, is to help well-educated girls and young women to procure definite professional or technical training. Information and advice about employment of different kinds is given, free of charge, to those who need guidance, and loans up to £30 are granted without interest for the training fe of those who are unable to procure them elsewhere, and whose future prospects would be marred without such ining. The loans thus advanced are d by instalments, in proportion to the arnings of the grantee after she has finished her training and obtained employment.

Glasgow Evg. Citizen,
Nov: 27th. 1914.

In connection with unemployment among women, more labour facilities are to be provided in the city, as the result of representations made by the Glasgow Committee of the National Relief Fund. The Board of Trade are next week opening at 104 West George Street a special city office for the registration of women of particular types, e.g., shop assistants, milliners, dressmakers, typists, clerkesses, &c. Lady Arthur has consented to open the office on Wednesday afternoon. A special office for women will also be opened in the next week or two in Dumbarton Road, Partick, pending the Department securing suitable permanent premises in the district, in which the women's work can be taken along with the other sections. An extension of the Parkhead Exchange is expected to be completed within the next two or three weeks, which will permit of a separate section in that office being opened for women.

EMPLOYMENT FOR WOMEN.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE IRISH TIMES.

SIR,—Will you kindly allow me to call the attention of your readers to a scheme which I have initiated for establishing domestic training centres for women thrown out of employment through the war? The first of these centres has been opened at 14 Lower Dominick street (premises kindly lent by the Duke of Leinster), and is recognised by the Department of Agriculture and Technical Instruction, and approved of by the Local Government Board. The girls to be trained while the war period lasts are the unskilled workers who have been disemployed owing to slackness of trade, and through no fault of their own; they are to be given a maintenance grant of 6/- per week from the National Relief Fund (as learners). The subjects to be taught are simple home cookery, laundry, sewing, housewifery, and hygiene. The food cooked and the clothes made will be sold to the girls at cost price. Rooms will be set apart to be used as a club by the girls two evenings a week, where they can have games and other amusements. Help is urgently needed in furnishing the rooms, in providing books, games, etc. Parcels of left-off clothing, which the girls will be instructed to remake for their own use, will be most gratefully received.

I shall be very pleased to give any further information regarding this scheme to any of the relief committees who wish to employ the unskilled girls who have been thrown out of employment through the war and are not eligible for the sewing rooms.—Yours, etc., BRIDGET DUDLEY EDWARDS.

EMPLOYMENT FOR WOMEN—AN OXFORD SCHEME.

To the Editor of THE OXFORDSHIRE WEEKLY NEWS.

SIR,—May we ask the hospitality of your columns to bring before the notice of your readers a scheme that we are anxious to set on foot at the present time on behalf of girls who have received their education at secondary schools or at home? We feel that the seriousness of economic conditions during the present crisis will lead many such girls to seek employment of different kinds, and that in some cases guidance in the choice of work may be needed, and in others advice as to the training necessary for special callings. We would lay particular stress on the latter point, for many who want work do not realise the extreme importance of being specially trained for special branches of work. Advice as to the cost of training, the time needed for training, the most suitable places to go for training, might prove of great help to those not already in possession of such information. We have formed ourselves into a committee which is anxious to further the efforts of those seeking work, and if we could so far inspire confidence as to induce both those who wish for posts and those who know of posts to communicate with us, we might hope to avert serious distress in the future by helping many girls to become self-supporting. Information as to such openings as teaching posts, secretarial posts, librarians' posts, nursing posts, dispensing posts, clerkships, and so forth would be gratefully received by any one of us. We would add further that an office will be open for the carrying on of such a scheme at the Oxford High School, Banbury-road, on the following days and at the following hours: Wednesday and Thursday, from 5 to 6 p.m., beginning on Wednesday, November 18th.—We are, yours faithfully.

THE LABOUR EXCHANGE

Divisional Office Removal.

OFFICIAL EXPLANATION.

The intimation of the intended removal next May from Glasgow to Edinburgh of the Scottish and Northern Divisional Office for Labour Exchanges and Unemployment Insurance appears, we are officially informed, to have caused some misconception. This office is not a labour exchange. It is the office from which all instructions to exchanges in Scotland and the North of England are issued, and in which are stored the ledger sheets and other records for over half a million of people in the division who are insured against unemployment. This office is at present accommodated in two sections, the financial and routine insurance work being performed at 13 Bath Street, and the general administrative work from part of the Labour Exchange premises at 29 College Street. While, therefore, the Board of Trade will next May surrender the premises in Bath Street, the office in College Street will continue to be occupied as the principal Glasgow Labour Exchange, the manager of which is Mr J. M. Cramond. The departure of the Divisional Office Section to Edinburgh will permit of the Glasgow Labour Exchange having the necessary room for expansion, a matter which is already causing some difficulty. The needs of employers and work people in the city will, therefore, continue to be catered for exactly as in the past; indeed, better Labour Exchange facilities are to be provided. Largely as the result of representations made to the Divisional Office for Labour Exchanges by the Lord Provost's Committee in connection with H.R.H. The Prince of Wales's Relief Fund, the Board of Trade are opening at 104 West George Street a special office for the registration of women of particular types, such as shop assistants, milliners, dressmakers, typists, and clerkesses. Lady Arthur is to perform the opening ceremony on the afternoon of Wednesday next. A special office for women will shortly be opened in Dumbarton Road, Partick, pending the Department securing suitable permanent premises in the district, in which the women's work can be taken along with the other sections. An extension of the Parkhead Exchange is expected to be completed within the next fortnight, which will permit of a separate section in that office being opened for women.

WAR HELP MOVEMENT.

REFUGEES' CLOTHES MADE FROM EVENING DRESSES.

Since the very beginning of the war the spacious garden of Russell Square has been one of the most useful places in all London for the training of recruits. Within doors, too, great activity has gone on in connection with the war-help movement. On the west side of the square a novel sort of collecting box on the railings causes the passer-by to pause and examine. He finds that the flags of the Allies are grouped behind the box, while on either side of it are figures representing a wounded sailor and a wounded soldier. Little Red Cross flags, and an invitation to "give what you can" complete the design. The mansion to which this box of the many-sided war-help movement is attached is the Royal Institute of Public Health, whose principal, Professor W. R. Smith, is distinguished not only in medical and scholastic work, but in public and military life as well (his son, by the way, is Captain Arthur Smith, of the R.F.A., at the front). The institute is now the centre of women's employment in the Holborn district, the Mayoress of Holborn being the president and Mrs. W. R. Smith the chairman of the sub-committee which has it in charge.

The Institute's war work first began in connection with its National Health Department, of which Queen Alexandra is president and Lady St. Helier chairman. They went on for many weeks employing women out of their own funds in the making of clothes. Then came a more official recognition, making 37, Russell Square the women's employment centre in the activities of the Committee of Emergency for the Borough of Holborn.

Every day, therefore, some thirty women and girls find paid employment at the Royal Institute of Public Health, the lecture-room being converted into a work-room. Clothes have been sent to Queen Mary's Needlework Guild, St. Bartholomew's Hospital, Charing Cross Hospital, the Metropolitan Nursing Association (Bloomsbury branch), the British Red Cross Society, and the Belgian refugees. A considerable part of the work of late has lain in altering unsuitable garments which have been sent in by ladies for the refugees. These include evening dresses! The refugees have, alas! no use for evening dresses as such. An exhibition of the work is to be held shortly.

In normal times the Royal Institute of Public Health is the place to which doctors go for a diploma in order to take public appointments. The students, that is to say, are qualified medical men, and a large number have gone to the war as officers in the R.A.M.C. One of the most able has been killed—namely, Lieutenant Dr. Herbert Leslie Hopkins, the only man who took the M.D. in State Medicine last year from the University of London. He was mentioned in despatches.

NORTH OF SCOTLAND COLLEGE.

INSTRUCTION OF SMALLHOLDERS.

A meeting of the Governors of the North of Scotland Agricultural College was held yesterday in Aberdeen—Dr James Campbell, the chairman, presiding.

THE LATE SIR JOHN MACPHERSON GRANT.

On the motion of the Chairman, it was resolved to record in the minutes an expression of the sense of the loss which the College had sustained through the death of Sir John Macpherson Grant of Ballindalloch.

EMPLOYMENT OF WOMEN.

The Dairy and Poultry Committee reported that they had received a deputation from the Women's Corps and Bureau War Emergency Workers' Committee on the question of the employment of women on the land in the cultivation of vegetables, poultry farming and pig rearing, and otherwise, as a means of fresh occupation to women deprived of their usual means of livelihood during the war. The Committee pointed out various lines of industry for the services of women, and it was suggested that in the meantime the secretary of the Women's Corps and Bureau Committee should ascertain the needs of the various agricultural districts within the College area, and the openings for employment which could be found. It had been further explained that Mr Gammell, the chairman of the Forestry Committee, had in view certain proposals which could start at once, in connection with which the services of women could be utilised.

The report was adopted.

THE INVERNESS SCHOOL FOR SMALLHOLDERS.

There was submitted the letter which the secretary of the College had, as directed, sent to the Board of Agriculture for Scotland with reference to the proposal for the establishment of a college or school for the instruction of smallholders at Beechwood, Inverness.

The Secretary of the Board of Agriculture, under date 18th November, wrote stating that the Board did not agree that the proposed scheme, which provided merely for the establishment of an intermediate agricultural school, would in any way prejudice the interests of the College, and that the Board must consider any scheme which was matured upon its merits.

The Chairman proposed that a large and representative Committee be appointed, with powers, to confer with the Board of Agriculture, and, if necessary, with the Secretary for Scotland, by deputation or otherwise, and report.

The Chairman's proposal was adopted.

UNEMPLOYMENT AMONG TYPISTS.

Yesterday there was a conference of City men at the Mansion House on the subject of the distress prevailing among lady typists and secretaries owing to the war. The Lord Mayor, who presided, said it was estimated that over 2,000 of these young women had lost their situations. The Mansion House Committee had started a register at St. Bride's Institute, and 600 girls had already enrolled their names. He felt sure that there were many banks and business houses who could give temporary work to these girls if they knew that this register existed. Already a good beginning had been made, for some 150 of them had been assisted to either temporary or permanent work. Mr. C. G. Kekewich considered that if only an old-fashioned prejudice could be got over women might temporarily fill the places in business houses of men who had gone to the front. On the other hand, Miss Mary MacArthur expressed the hope that unemployed elder men with families would be preferred to women in these cases. There was always the tendency at these times to substitute women at very low remuneration for men who would be paid a proper salary. Mr. Brinsley Harper, Chairman of the Central (Unemployed) Body, mentioned that the Mansion House Committee were about to start workrooms for 200 women in a large building in Bridewell-place belonging to the Corporation, where they hoped to train some of these typists and others, and pay them a small wage during this period of unemployment; and the Hon. Maud Pauncefote said the Agents-General of Australia had made the Queen an offer to take out to Australia a large number of unemployed women under twenty-four years of age at very reduced rates on their agreeing to enter and remain at least twelve months in domestic service. On the motion of Mr. Alderman Hanson, a small subcommittee was appointed to assist the Lord Mayor in bringing these matters to the attention of the City banking and mercantile community.

GLASGOW LABOUR EXCHANGE.

INCREASED FACILITIES.

In connection with the transference which is to take place in May next from Glasgow to Edinburgh of the Scottish and Northern Divisional Office for Labour Exchanges and Unemployment Insurance it is pointed out that the office at 29 College Street will continue to be occupied as the principal Glasgow Labour Exchange, the manager of which is Mr J. M. Cramond. The removal of the divisional office section to Edinburgh will provide the Glasgow Labour Exchange with room for expansion. The needs of employers and workpeople in the city will continue to be catered for as in the past; in fact, much better Labour Exchange facilities are about to be provided. Largely as the result of representations made to the Divisional Office for Labour Exchanges by the Lord Provost's Committee in connection with the Prince of Wales's Relief Fund, the Board of Trade are to open, at 104 West George Street, a special office for the registration of women such as shop assistants, milliners, dressmakers, typists, clerkesses, etc. Lady Arthur will open this new office on the afternoon of Wednesday, December 2, at three o'clock. A special office for women will be opened at an early date in Dumbarton Road, Partick, pending the Department securing suitable permanent premises in the district, in which the women's work can be taken along with the other sections; and an extension of the Parkhead Exchange is expected to be completed within the next two or three weeks, which will permit of a separate section in that office being opened for women.

WORKLESS WOMEN.

OFFER FROM AUSTRALIA.

In connection with the movement to provide work for women thrown out of employment owing to the war, for the support of which the Queen's Fund was inaugurated, four Australian States—New South Wales, Victoria, Queensland, and Western Australia—have offered to find employment as home helps and domestic servants, not only for girls trained in this work, but for typists, dressmakers, and other business girls. New South Wales also invites young widows with not more than two children. The girls will be taken to Australia for £1 down, the rest of the greatly reduced passage money to be paid in monthly instalments after arrival. This would be £2 in the case of three States, and £4 for those going to New South Wales. The only condition is that the girls remain in domestic work for one year.

The Queen is greatly interested in this offer, and has herself appointed a sub-committee of the Queen Mary's Work for Women Collecting Committee to inquire as to how far advantage can be taken of it. The following conditions laid down by the Central Committee on Women's Employment will apply: (1) That in no case should the refusal to emigrate affect the individual's right to receive relief of any other kind; (2) that arrangements should be made in Australia at convenient centres for homes to which the girls might go when out of employment; (3) that all women and girls should be employed at not less than the rates of pay current in the district to which they go.

A grant of £1,100 has been obtained from the Queen's Fund, which will pay the registration fee of £1 for 550 girls, and give each one £1 in cash on landing. In addition, complete outfits are to be provided for the emigrants. These are being made in the women's work-rooms, or given out to firms which need work for their women employés.

Girls emigrating would be paid a minimum wage of 8s to 10s per week, with board and lodging, if untrained, and as much as 18s to 20s if a competent household worker. Thirty girls have already decided to go, and as soon as ships can be found to take them they will sail.

Those who desire to avail themselves of the offer should apply to the British Women's Emigration Association, Imperial Institute, who with the Central Unemployed Body is making the selection. The age is fixed at 18 to 35 by three States, and 17 to 35 by Queensland. For girls who have not been in domestic service before New South Wales makes the age limit of 24 and Victoria of 21. Two good references are required as to character, health, and capability for domestic service. A medical certificate is necessary, and the parents' consent if the girls are under 21 years.

A tea party is being arranged by the council of the British Women's Emigration Association for typists, dressmakers, and other business girls, at the Imperial Institute, to-morrow, so that the offer may be discussed.

UNEMPLOYED CITY TYPISTS.

WORK-ROOMS TO BE STARTED.

Yesterday a conference of City men was held at the Mansion House regarding the distress now prevailing among lady-typists and secretaries owing to the war.

The Lord Mayor, who presided, said it was estimated that over 2,000 of these young women had lost their situations.

Miss Mary McArthur said while she was strongly in favour of the employment of women wherever it could be suitably provided, she hoped unemployed elder men with families would be preferred to women in these cases. There was always the tendency at these times to substitute women at very low remuneration for men who would be paid a proper salary.

The Hon. Maud Pauncefote said the Agent-General of Australia had made the Queen an offer to take out to Australia a large number of unemployed women under 24 years of age at very reduced rates, on their agreeing to enter and remain at least twelve months in domestic service. Surely some of the inexperienced and younger typists out of work could accept this offer and give Colonial life and service a year's trial.

Eventually, on the motion of Mr. Alderman Hanson, a small sub-committee was appointed to assist the Lord Mayor in bringing these matters to the attention of the City banking and mercantile community.

POSITION OF THE TAILORING TRADE.

Glasgow, Nov. 24.

Sir,—"B. H. W." says in your issue of 19th inst. that a journeyman tailor would be satisfied with £2 per week. I should think he would be; but that is the grievance, as he is not getting the fourth of that sum just now. He advises him to try the factory, but your correspondent should know that the factories do not want the journeyman tailor; they want women and girls, for the simple reason that they are cheaper labour. There are a few men employed, but very few in comparison to the women and girls. As to his proposal to raise the contract prices 100 per cent., I expect he means that if the factories got 6s per suit the tailor would require 12s. If that is what he means, that is quite true; but the value on the production would be there. Therefore, why not raise the price, as I understand is done in other trades. When a labourer touches Government contracts in the locomotive workshops, his wages rise in many instances 4s to 5s per week; and all the other trades that I know of get their trade union rate of wages on either municipal or Government contracts. Then why is it impossible for the tailoring trade? The only reason I can give is that the journeyman tailor has been far to quiet on these and other matters concerning his trade.—I am, etc.,

Richmond Unemployed Women.

EMPLOYMENT WANTED FOR SKILLED WORKERS.

During the past week materials, to be made up by unemployed women, have been received through Miss Chree from Mrs. Evans and Miss Robe. Mr. W. B. Maxwell has sent flannel to be made up into shirts for French soldiers, and through Mrs. Sandover and Miss Cockburn other materials have also been received. Some warm frocks are being made, and the scraps of good army flannel left over after cutting shirts are being stitched together to make warm bodices for little girls. Twenty-four army shirts have been sent to the Richmond Hospital, and there will be a considerable number at the disposal of the emergency committee when it meets.

The Committee of Organised Women appeals for more materials. Anyone who wishes a particular kind of garment made up for giving away to charities or for the troops is invited to send materials and instructions to Mrs. Swanwick at the Town Hall. The committee is particularly anxious to get some of its better workers into regular employment, and therefore urges Richmond ladies to apply at the Town Hall for dressmakers, seamstresses, milliners, and daily cooks and charwomen.

Preston Herald, November 28th. 1914.

FOR UNEMPLOYED PRESTON WOMEN.

SCHEME APPROVED BY RELIEF COMMITTEE.

A Step-Cleaning Scheme that Failed.

The Preston Relief Committee recently appointed a special sub-committee to take into consideration the question of the provision of employment for women affected by the war. The result of its deliberations was drawn up and presented to the relief committee on Wednesday, by the chairman, Mrs. Megahy, and unanimously adopted. The scheme as presented is subjoined.

Mrs. Megahy pointed out that the sub-committee had made enquiries in systems adopted in other centres. They themselves had seen the flourishing scheme adopted at Southport, and the Town Clerk (Mr. A. Howarth) had obtained particulars from other towns. But these cases were for the most part useless in Preston, since they had a different kind of people to deal with. In many of these other centres the women were for the most part dressmakers and others skilled in the use of their fingers, and in some cases so flourishing were the relief works established that they seemed to want only a capitalist to come along and make the schemes permanent assets to the nation.

In Preston they had to deal with a class of women and girls who were probably in work one week and out the next, and they had thought it better to take up a scheme to provide classes for training these women in sick nursing, cookery, and other things in which a woman ought to be well trained. In this way it would not matter, since each lesson would be independent to itself, whether the women attended regularly or not. It was felt that a scheme would, by the end of the war, prove an asset to the women, to the town, and to the country. The sub-committee wanted to know how much distress there was in the town.

STEP-CLEANING SCHEME.

Mrs. Megahy also mentioned that there had been an amateur scheme of step-cleaning adopted locally, which, had it been fully worked, would have been a success. A number of voluntary workers went round a number of roads, where the householders probably did their own house-work, or employed one servant, and would, therefore, probably be glad to have their steps cleaned, and they got a number of orders. Unfortunately, the scheme was not placed on a proper business footing, when one of the ladies prominently connected with it sprained her ankle, and another left the town, difficulties crept into the working, and if the scheme had not been dropped altogether, it had not been working as it ought to be worked. She thought that this could be taken up by the ladies, and put on a proper footing.

Mr. W. Parker thought the matter could very well be left in the hands of the ladies. He did not see how the gentlemen could enter into it at all. The employment of women locally was growing; more works were running, but there were still several stopped. He mentioned a letter which had been received from a chaplain at the front, respecting two of the Preston regiments at the front, in which it was stated that they were suffering very much, in spite of what had been done. These poor men were standing in the water. Might not something further be done in the direction of making suitable garments for these men? The chaplain wrote: "We don't want pianos in the trenches. We want men, and we want warm garments."

The Rev. Mr. Crago said that one great difficulty in that respect was that in many cases in which garments were sent for the men at the front, they were not receiving them. He knew two cases in which warm garments had been sent to men by relatives, and never received. They might continue to send such things, but if the men did not receive them they would not do them much good in the trenches or elsewhere. He thought something should be done to waken the authorities to see that these things were delivered.

Mr. Parker thought that if they were forwarded to the commanding officer, the staffs would see that they went where they were most wanted.

WHAT THE LADIES HAVE DONE.

The Mayor said that the ladies of Preston had sent out 2,000 socks, 800 belts, and many other things.

Mr. Parker said that about the same number had been sent from Bamber Bridge, where close upon 140 women had been at work. He was not depreciating what had been done, but pointing out that there was room for more to be done.

Mr. Jackson thought that such work should be left to those whose usual occupation was manufacturing these things, and who were most skilful at it. In any undertaking to provide employment for those who were in want, they ought not to trespass, if it could be avoided, on the ordinary employment of other artisans. He did not see why the step-cleaning should not be taken in hand, if the interests of domestic servants could be safeguarded.

A letter was read from the Rev. A. A. L. Gedge, army chaplain at Fulwood, in which he mentioned that any wives of soldiers, or pensioners' wives or widows, were entitled to have army shirts to make. They got 7½d per shirt, and for that they had only to sew the pieces together. The majority of the 85 women so employed at present were making 16s a week. He gave the work out every Wednesday morning from 10 to 12 o'clock, at the schoolroom, Fulwood.

The scheme for the provision of work for women approved by the committee is as follows:—

THE SCHEME.

(1) That a workroom be opened at which garments could be re-made, altered, and mended. Payment to be at the minimum relief rate, except in the case of skilled workers, such as dressmakers. This scheme was suggested, as more than half the women registering at the Labour Exchange during the last three weeks have been charwomen or general servants, who, in default of their own work, would not find it easy to acquire skill in another trade. Moreover, the cost of materials would be very little, as old clothes would be willingly given, and the women could bring their own to mend or alter.

HOUSEWIFERY CLASSES.

(2) That classes in housewifery (simple cooking), sewing, nursing, should be held for the younger women and girls under 16 (as has been done in several other towns), attendance, if satisfactory, to be paid at the minimum relief rate. As each lesson is as a rule complete in itself, absence for a week in the case of work being resumed at the mills, does not seriously handicap attendance subsequently.

Both these schemes are in accordance with the recommendations of the Central Committee on Women's Unemployment.

ROOM PROMISED.

It has been ascertained that a room at the Friends' Meeting-house in Friargate will be lent for use as a workroom, if it fulfils all requirements; the Ladies' Central Relief Committee will probably lend a sewing machine, and the Preston Gas Company will lend the apparatus for cooking, though the fittings would not be free of charge.

Gifts of old clothes to be re-modelled, and material to be made up, have been promised.

The number of women unemployed registered at the Labour Exchange during the last three weeks has been 121, 121, and 91.

Yorkshire Post,
Nov: 28th. 1914.

Employment in London is wonderfully good. It is, indeed, getting better, and the amount of short time being worked is said to be rapidly lessening. Probably the class suffering most acutely is that of girl typists, but of their distress not very much is heard, because they are mostly girls who live with their parents. But all the tests usually applied with regard to distress show that there is nothing abnormal, and nothing so bad as might have been expected in a bad winter in peace time. Of course, the fact that about a quarter of a million young men have been taken out of the labour market for military service has had an effect in releasing employment for others, and London is also very busy in places with making war equipment of one sort and another. The port likewise is still busy, and promises to remain so. The quantity of foodstuffs imported during the last three months is enormous. Some of it was not consigned to London, but to the other side of the North Sea.

The Queen, November 28th. 1914.

IN THAT STATE OF LIFE.

By MRS MARGARET HEITLAND.

TO-DAY ONE of the great puzzles is the maintenance of people in a state of work and being which shall resemble that in which they were a year ago. We know that people cannot pos ibly be kept upon the same level of wealth and employment in 1914-1915 as in the working s ason of 1913-1914. There must be a general descent of a notch or several notches on the ladder of prosperity. Here and there a man, owing to his great military or naval services, or his labours in the field of statesmanship will rise, but women, with scarcely an exception, will have to come down, and the vast majority of men likewise. But the ta k which lies before the governing powers of the nation is to make the descent as gentle as possible, and prevent it from b ing a heavy and irrecoverable fall.

As the German invasion and devastation of Western Europe began when professional and industrial workers were trying to take their holidays it was hardly possible to realise how far employment conditions were changed at the outbreak of the war. But now that we are well into the winter working months a stocktaking of our position becomes much easier.

Everyone's local knowledge of employment conditions reveals the fact that there is a good deal more unemployment than usual, and that the trouble falls most severely on women. In this matter things have hardly gone as we had expected at the outbreak of the war. I admit for one that my own expectation in August was to see this country almost denuded of its active, wage-earning men. I expected to see the clerical departments of the Government offices, the post offices, the shops, the trams, the omnibuses, and taxi-cabs run by women with the help of some elderly men. I imagined that there would be a call for the services of women to an enormous extent and in quite new directions. And I believed that women would respond to it—handsomely, generously, and without wishing to make "a good thing" out of it at the expense of the men who were so splendidly doing their citizens' part in the field, and I scarcely think that I was over-imaginative or alone in my anticipations; but nothing of the kind has happened. If one stands on any of the London bridges for ten minutes one can count scores of young men obviously existing on "business as usual" principles. The streets of most provincial towns are filled with young men occupied in their accustomed civilian work, although, of course, there are many others marching and drilling with fine spirit. It would lead me too far perhaps to discuss the conflicts of duties in men's minds (primarily the conflict between duty to the family and duty to the nation) to which this state of things is due. I only record that it is there, and that it is not the state of things which four months ago I could have imagined would be.

I know that in this as in many other surprises of life I must allow a good deal for the "personal equation." It is part of a journalistic or even of the literary temperament always to expect the events of life to be much more complete and dramatic than they are. For my own part I certainly always expect a meeting to be bigger, a crowd more demons rative than I actually find them. The events of life which are to be tremendous, unmistakable, generally turn out to be ambiguous, disappointingly half-and-half. And so it may have been I who was wrong and over-expecting in assuming that the call to arms would have left few strong young men uncalled.

Meantime we may calm the overheated imagination in the pages and figures which the Board of Trade Labour Gazette has published this month. Here we find quite clearly that unemployment is pressing most severely on women. One fact is that the number of women in uninsured trades on the register of the Labour Exchanges is greater by some 9000 than the number of men. After deducting those for whom the exchanges have found employment (though in very many cases for less than a week) there remained 34,800 women on the register and 25,717 men. If we look at the figures of employment for the five weeks ending Oct. 16 we find similarly that more women and girls in the uninsured trades registered than men and boys, whereas a year ago the men and boys were slightly in the majority. The vacancies offered to males are in excess of those for females, and in the figures of vacancies filled there is a marked disproportion which works out further to the disadvantage of women and girls. For the same period last year, however, men filled a few more vacancies than women in these trades. The insured trades I leave out of account because in these the immense majority of the workers are men.

The labour exchanges, it may be said, are being used by a much larger number of people now than before the war owing to the fact that workers needing help from any of the relief committees are urged to register at these exchanges. Still this circumstance need not alter the relative proportions of unemployment as between men and women. But, indeed, the same tale of women's want of wage-earning work comes from many quarters. Looking at the totals of unemployed women revealed by the reports of eleven employment bureaux for women in London and other parts of the kingdom, we find a rise in the number of women registered of nearly 50 per cent. by comparison with the figures for October of last year. More than four times as many dress makers and milliners have applied for work at these bureaux than last year, and there has been a considerable increase in the number of applications from secretaries, clerks, and typists, and from domestic servants. It is true that these bureaux have been fortunate enough to increase the number of their "suitings," but by no means proportionately. Reverting to the records of the Labour Exchanges we find that in London there were on a date at the middle of October over a thousand women clerks, nearly twelve hundred dressmakers, and nearly 2500 daily servants waiting for work. The number of dress makers had gone up from 151 in October of last year to 1198 for the same month of the dreadful year 1914.

The strange and dismaying fact about these war conditions is that some of the most skilled workers suffer as much as or more than the less skilled. The very finished, highly specialised servants are dismissed when employers lose income; the Court dressmakers who can make the most ethereal of evening gowns suffer before the fashioners of everyday suits.

But there are also hundreds of cruelly impoverished women whose names appear under no employment heading, unless it be "Miscellaneous." They are all the women who have lived somehow on the surface of the London social sea—have lived, if you choose to say so, more or less parasitically. But they have made things a little easier or pleasanter or more amusing for other people who had plenty of money. There are highly gifted women among them—musicians, artists, performers of all sorts—as well as scores of indifferently educated, happy-go-lucky individuals who have fe ched and carried or effaced themselves according to the whims of their patrons. And now for them comes blank poverty. Their pa rons will presently become aware of the incre sing weight of income tax. To the present rather hot mood of generosity and of willingness to share last crusts, a cold fit will certainly succeed.

What, then is to be done? A good deal is being done—though none too much—for those women to whom 10s. a week has meant prosperity. But for women who have been accustomed to earn one, two, or more guineas a week there is at present little help offered. The Central Committee on Women's Employment has been slow in evolving schemes for women above the 10s. a week level, and now a new committee has been formed to try its hand at the task of helping the professional classes generally. Their business will certainly not be an easy one.

To me there appears to be no way out of the difficulty which will not involve the expenditure (and perhaps on a large scale) of national money, and to effect this there must eventually be further taxation. Something no doubt may be done by adjustments and efforts towards equalisation. Employers and workers may be helped to make some change in their plan of procedure which will enable them to supply what the world in time of war demands instead of the peace products. The plan of spreading orders over a large number of loca ities and firms, though not a convenient or economical one, lessens suffering and unemployment.

One step the Government should certainly be pressed to take, and this is to carry out the recommendations of the Royal Commission on the Civil Service by employing women clerks more largely in the various departments of the State and by opening to women as freely as to men all the roads which lead to important administrative positions. In the midst of much which is uncertain and debatable this reform is manifestly safe, desirable, and urgently needed. There can be no reason why women whose equal citizenship with men is unquestioned when taxation is carried out should be unequally treated in regard to the conditions of civil employment.

It is worth considering also whether anything could be done by the establishment of credit banks to carry professional people of acknowledged capacity over the present difficult period. We have a public trustee, why not a public money-lender? Is it beyond the abilities of financial experts to devise some scheme of money lending more elastic than that of the banks and less open to fraud than that of the private lender, which would tide people of real earning power over a time of stress?

All kinds of services other than military or medical are just now going cheap, and in dealing with impoverished professional people the choice would seem to be between giving them positive charitable grants or paying them to work for others. A professional person in receipt of any kind of unemployment benefit could not be allowed to work for payment, and would soon lose skill and energy; but if he were employed by the State for the benefit of poor people or children his sense of value as well as his skill would be maintained. For these reasons one way out of our present difficulty would appear to be to plan schemes for the public utilisation of talents which private citizens cannot afford to engage on their own behalf. We might get out-of-work artists to decorate the elementary schools, musicians to give cheerful public concerts, and tail to make clothes for invalided soldiers returning to private li Something might be done on these lines.

There will remain a good many helpless sufferers for whom the State can do little in war time. There are ladies who take out other ladies' dogs. There are persons of high position who are longing to be paid to launch us in society. I do not quite know what the State will do with all these. Perhaps it may be forgiven for disregarding them in the face of our great realities.

Birmingham Post, November 1911.

THE WAR AND TRADE.

ACTIVITY IN LOCAL TRADES.

REVIVAL IN SEVERAL DIRECTIONS.

The monthly report presented to the Birmingham Citizens' Executive Committee by Professor W. J. Ashley, the Intelligence Officer, is of a very hopeful character. It states that employment in the city has continued to improve since his report of October 29, and this has been due not only to Government orders, but also to a slow but steady revival of trade in several directions. As to Government work, its range extends far beyond munitions of war: it provides abundant employment for all the competent workers of several trades, and, indeed, in many of the principal branches, there is a positive dearth of suitable workpeople; it gives occupation to an increasing number of men from depressed trades, such as the furniture and jewellery industries; and even where men themselves for various reasons remain out of work, it offers employment in many cases to their wives and daughters. But the improvement is not limited to Government work. Other trades are showing the effect of growing public confidence. The ordinary motor-car and motor-cycle trades are said to be recovering. The pen and small metal goods trades are reported to have got on to two-thirds time. The better class of jewellery trade has picked up very distinctly during November; in fact, though still considerably behind what it was a year ago, the sales in some lines have been almost twice as large in November as in September and October. And in the cocoa and chocolate trade, short time has almost disappeared at Bournville, and a good deal of overtime is being worked.

Marked Prosperity.

It is difficult, says Professor Ashley, to sum up briefly the present position. Some industries are still depressed, and the employment which those have obtained who have left them for the time and gone into the war material trades is often not as remunerative as they have been accustomed to. There is still a good deal of short time, though it is steadily diminishing. On the other hand, probably a larger number of workpeople are working overtime than ever before in Birmingham; and on the whole, with the gloomy patches before indicated, the condition of Birmingham, so far as employment is concerned, may be said to be one of marked prosperity.

The group of manufacturing concerns (employing some 25,000 persons, of whom three-fourths are men, and engaged largely in the iron and steel manufactures), which furnished figures for September, has since sent in similar figures for October. It appears that, comparing the last pay-days of October, 1913 and 1914, firms normally employing about 400 workpeople had experienced no change: firms employing about 10,400 had reduced their force by about 9%, with practically no change in the hours of work; while firms normally employing about 15,000 now gave work to 38% more men, and as they paid them 68% more wages (at the old rates) they must obviously have been working a great deal of overtime. Comparing October with the previous month, it would appear that in September the group of concerns, taken as a whole, employed (when deduction is made for the men enlisted) 13% more than in the previous year, and in October 18%.

Interesting Statistics.

For November, the best available evidence at present is that furnished by the Medical Officer of Health. The health visitors enter some three to four hundred houses daily in the performance of their duties, and since the war began they have made enquiries as to the employment of the members of the several families. From the returns furnished Professor Ashley has calculated that while in the middle of October they found between five and six men unemployed in every 100 houses, in the week ended November 21 they found about

This raises the very interesting question as to the resources available for further reinforcements in, say, a year's time. It almost seems as though Germany had touched the fringe of her utmost resources, and that her failure to secure a decisive victory east and west in the spring of next year will mean the collapse of the whole fabric of German resistance. The Main Headquarters admit that the sacrifices have been very great, even in securing the triumphs which it describes. How much greater must those sacrifices have been in the second period of the battle about the Bzura, when the legions of the Czar, enormously reinforced, took the offensive and poured back irresistibly upon the weakened army commanded by General Mackensen?

What Germany has done in the matter of securing the necessary reinforcements will be best understood if I take the analogy of Kitchener's Army to illustrate the situation. It is as though, after the first month or so of war in the North of France, the newly-raised battalions of the new army had been sent to the front and absorbed, had been found inadequate to check the German advance, and that new levies taken from men who ordinarily would not have been accepted for service had been raised, quickly drilled for a week or two, and sent out to bear the hardships and the sufferings which a winter campaign entails. Contrast the careful, thorough, and searching preparation to which the new armies of England are being subjected. Contrast the standard of weight and age, and the physical qualities of Kitchener's armies, and remember that this million which is now growing into military shape is composed of the flower of Britain's manhood. Contrast these, I say, with the hastily-assembled recruits which Germany is putting into the field, and you will see how inevitable it is that when the new German supplies are exhausted the new British army must be the deciding factor in the war. This is the only country in the world that could possibly raise a volunteer army composed of men in the prime of youth, the only country that could throw into the scale such decisive weight.

The men of France are working in even more of a mist than our own soldiers, about the secrecy of whose doings we complain so much. Recently the French Government appointed an official "eye-witness," and I think it would be an excellent scheme if a British officer were appointed to the French Headquarters to retail events on the French side for the benefit of English readers. Naturally the point of view of the British officer would be even more interesting than that of the official reporter of France. We might reciprocate by inviting the French Government to appoint an officer to our Headquarters to fulfil the same useful

THE SHORTAGE OF WIREWORKERS.

GOVERNMENT CONCESSIONS FOR YOUNG EMPLOYEES.

Sir John Harmood Banner had asked the Home Secretary whether, in view of the enlistment of men engaged in the wire trade, and consequent reduction of production, he would consider the propriety of giving special permission for the employment of young persons at night in the process of continuous wire-drawing, it being impossible, in view of the course of manufacture, to employ hands in the day whose employment was forbidden at night, and consequently difficulty was created in supplying Government and other trade orders.

The Home Secretary, in a printed reply, states that this matter is at present receiving consideration, and adds: "I may mention that several wireworks have been granted orders under section 150 of the Factory and Workshop Act, 1901, permitting them to employ male young persons temporarily on night-shifts in the process of continuous wire-drawing for the purpose of accelerating the work being done under Admiralty and War Office contracts, and I am prepared to entertain further applications for such orders in any similar cases."

Birmingham and the War.

In another column we publish a summary of Professor Ashley's monthly review of economic conditions in Birmingham. On the whole, the past month gives ground for real and solid satisfaction. In one or two respects, it may be, Professor Ashley is too optimistic. Thus, his statement that "the better class of jewellery trade has picked up very distinctly during November" has to be read in conjunction with the report of the officer in charge of the Women's Department of the Labour Exchanges, who tells us that "the jewellery trade shows but little change." But, all things considered, we may "thank God and take courage." The general conclusions of the report are not to be controverted. In the first place, the state of employment has continued to improve. Valuable testimony to this effect is given by the officers of the Public Health Department, whose lot it is to visit some hundreds of houses daily. In mid-October these officers calculated that in every hundred houses visited there were five or six men unemployed, and sixteen or seventeen on short time. In mid-November the corresponding figures were four unemployed and eleven or twelve on short time. Other evidence points in the same direction. At the Labour Exchanges the registrations of men—both in insured and uninsured trades—are less than were before the war. The figures for women are still above the peace level, but they are declining. The relieving agencies tell the same story—"free breakfasts," for example, are going down "hundreds a week." It is significant, too, that in one women's provident society withdrawals are going down and deposits rising to something like a normal balance. That, then, is the first point—there is no serious general distress. A second point is equally important. It is not merely owing to Government orders that the wolf is being kept from the door. It is true that these orders—directly and indirectly—are having an important effect. But quite apart from them, things are looking brighter. Professor Ashley quotes the motor trade and the "better-class jewellery trade" as cases in point. That brings us to a third generalisation. It is to be noted that luxuries, as well as necessities, are recovering from the shock of war. Leaving jewellery out of the account, the improvement in the motor trade, in the chocolate trade, and in retail tailoring, all point to the progress towards normal conditions. The truth is that Birmingham is singularly fortunate. The variety of our industries and the adaptability of our workers and employers have tempered the hard times to us. Employment in what may be called essential industries has remained relatively good. As a consequence there has not been the sharp and sudden decline in the demand for unessential articles which so many towns have recorded. For the rest, it is as well to remember that the prosperity is relative. There is still—and must continue to be—a good deal of distress. Women, more particularly, find their earnings seriously diminished. Certainly Professor Ashley's review does not justify a slackening in charitable and philanthropic activity. What it does suggest is that the social problem is quite within the capacity of the city. Given the spirit of fellowship, given the wisdom necessary to make the most of that fellowship, Birmingham can make sure that on no one of her citizens will the burden of the war press over-heavily. It is to that end that we must now concentrate all our efforts.

WORK FOR UNEMPLOYED WOMEN.

Leeds Scheme in Operation.

(To the Editor of the "Yorkshire Evening News.")

Sir,—The Committee for Women's Employment have now opened a workroom for unemployed women in a room kindly lent by the Council of the Salem Institute, Leeds. This early start has been made possible by the generosity of the Leeds branch of the National Union of Women's Suffrage Societies, who have placed a sum of £82 at the disposal of the Committee.

Under the supervision of a skilled forewoman, about 20 women are busily engaged in knitting comforts for the soldiers, altering and renovating old garments and making new clothing from materials which have been given.

These women have all lost their employment owing to the war, and for various reasons cannot enter the factories and workshops, nor can the Labour Exchange find them employment. While they remain self-supporting they are helping others, as the garments made will be distributed through the Lady Mayoress's Clothing Committee to those who are not in a position to buy them for themselves. A hot dinner is provided daily, for which 2d. is charged, and during the winter weather this has been much appreciated.

Generous gifts of bales of cloth have been received from Alderman Kinder and Mr. David Dixon, and others have also sent goods, but in order that the money collected may be entirely used for wages, further gifts of materials and old clothing are urgently needed. Short lengths, "damages," and oddments of all sorts will be used to the best advantage, but the greatest want is material for making underclothing of all descriptions.

All over the kingdom similar work is going on, and is proving a godsend to hundreds of women who have lost their employment owing to the war, and who are asking for means to support themselves, and not for charity. We, therefore, appeal to those who are lucky enough to retain their work undisturbed by the war to help less fortunate fellow-workers by subscribing to the Queen's Work for Women Fund.

Gifts in kind or money should be sent to Miss B. Kitson, Lady Mayoress's Office, 1, East Parade, Leeds.—Yours, etc.,

LESS UNEMPLOYMENT.

Employment in London is wonderfully good. It is, indeed, getting better, and the amount of short time being worked is said to be rapidly lessening. Probably the class suffering most acutely is that of girl typists, but of their distress not very much is heard, because they are mostly girls who live with their parents. But all the tests usually applied with regard to distress show that there is nothing abnormal, and nothing so bad as might have been expected in a bad winter in peace time. Of course, the fact that about a quarter of a million young men have been taken out of the labour market for military service has had an effect in releasing employment for others, and London is also very busy in places with making war equipment of one sort and another. The port likewise is still busy, and promises to remain so.

WORK FOR LIVERPOOL WOMEN.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE COURIER.

Sir,—May we appeal through your columns, on behalf of the Liverpool Women's Industrial Council, for work materials for the new sewing rooms which the Distress Committee is shortly opening in Oakes-street. The women who will be employed in these rooms are those who have lost their work through the war and are sent to the committee by one of the recognised relief organisations.

As Liverpool friends have already been so kind in supplying garments, etc., for the existing workrooms in Shaw-street, we particularly invite contributions from the surrounding neighbourhood and from Wirral, and will arrange to collect parcels if the donors cannot conveniently send them. We urgently need old sheets, pillow cases, towels, tablecloths, blankets, flannel, and pieces of material of any description. UNEMPLOYED WOMEN.

An unfortunate divergence of view as regards the method of assisting unemployed women in London exists between those who are administrating Queen Mary's Fund, and the Central Unemployed Body for London. The former consider that enquiries ought not to be made regarding the women seeking employment, but that their statements should be accepted without going to their employers, while the latter deem investigation necessary when public money is spent. Both are right in theory, and wrong in practice. To make no inquiry is certain to open the way to imposture, but the inquisition to which poor women are sometimes subjected by officious, and, often, not very sympathetic persons is to many sensitive women worse than the poverty and hunger they are enduring. It will be to the public advantage if the dispute between the two bodies leads to a correction of the method of inquiry.

WOMEN'S SELF-HELP.

La Belle Alliance has been chosen as the name of a workroom at 2, Boyle-street, Savile-row, established to enable professional women of all classes to earn a living during the war without having to apply to any of the charitable funds. The workers—painters, writers, actresses, and the like—will design and make various garments which will be sold at a moderate profit.

STATE OF EMPLOYMENT.

A White Paper was issued last night dealing with the state of employment in the United Kingdom during the month of October. The report is based on returns received from over 20,000 industrial firms, employing over 4,000,000 workpeople, that is about 43 per cent. of the whole industrial population. The abrupt curtailment of production which occurred in the second and third weeks in August did not result in so great lack of employment as might otherwise have occurred owing to the action of many employers in putting their people on half time. It also soon became apparent that the restriction of ordinary industrial activities by the war would be much less serious than supposed owing largely to the continuance of our oversea commerce. Industries providing material for war have been very fully occupied. The total reduction in the number of male workpeople employed as between July and October is 10.7 per cent., which is almost precisely equal to the percentage of workmen who have joined the Army and the Navy. Consequently in the aggregate there has been no net increase in the unemployment of males. The proportion working short time has been considerable, though this percentage has fallen from 26 in September to 17.3 in October. As regards women the reduction in number employed has been 6.2 per cent., which is net displacement of labour. The percentage of women working short time has been high, but has fallen from 36 in September to 26 in October. The high figures are largely due to the condition of the cotton trade.

Newcastle Chronicle, December 1st. 1914.

WOMEN WORKERS.

One of the things we shall remember in connection with the present war will be the great demand it caused for female labour. Hundreds of young girls and women have been snapped up at the Armstrong-Whitworth works at Elswick, and I learn that other Tyneside factories are engaging numbers of them also. When the young men are being called on to serve their King and country, there is necessarily a shortage of male labour, and these girls are being employed to do much of the lighter work formerly entrusted to the men. One result of this is that morning and day girls are not obtainable. They are earning good wages at "the factory," and for the time being at least domestic employment has no attraction for them.

Daily Telegraph, Dec. 1st. 1914. 654

WAR AND EMPLOYMENT

LAST MONTH'S RECOVERY.

EFFECT OF RECRUITING.

A report issued last night by the Board of Trade on the state of employment in the United Kingdom during October furnishes gratifying evidence of the comparatively small effect of the war so far on the trade and industry of the country. It has been compiled from returns received from nearly 10,000 large and 10,600 small industrial firms, employing over 4,000,000 persons. The total number occupied in the trades in which these 4,000,000 persons were engaged amounted, according to the census of 1911, to nearly 9,250,000, so that the investigati[on] about 43 per cent. of the industrial popula[tion].

According to the September returns war reduction in employment of 10½ per cent case of males, and 8½ per cent. in the case of These are figures which are only equalled severest of industrial depressions; but, in of males, enlistment and the calling up of reservists reduced this contraction to the comparatively small proportion of 1½ per cent. In the following month, moreover, the steady recovery of confidence at home, the increase of export trade, and above all the immense industrial activity induced by the placing of large war contracts, both for his Majesty's Government and for our Allies, caused a continued improvement except in one or two trades. By the middle of October, the progress of recruiting had equalled the reduction of employment of males due to the war, while the contraction of employment in the case of females was appreciably less than in September.

These changes are clearly shown in the following table, in which the state of employment in September and October is compared with employment before the war:

	September.		October.
	Males.	Females.	Males.	Females.
	Per cent.		Per cent.
Employment in July ...	100	100	100	100
Still on full time	60·2	53·5	66·8	61·9
On overtime	3·6	2·1	5·2	5·9
On short time	26·0	36·0	17·3	26·0
Contraction of employment.	10·2	8·4	10·7	6·2
Known by employers to have joined the forces	8·8	—	10·6	—
Net displacement (−) or replacement (+)	−1·4		−0·1

Thus, while overtime had increased slightly, the proportion on short time fell by about 8 per cent. in the case of males and by 10 per cent. in the case of females. The high proportion of females on short time is largely due to the cotton trade, which, it should be noted, was already working short time to a considerable extent before the war.

An idea of the dimensions of the changes which this table implies may be gathered from actual numbers. Applying these percentages to the numbers occupied (7,000,000 males and 2,250,000 females) in industrial occupations, according to the Census of 1911, we get the following approximate totals:

	September.		October.
	Males.	Females.	Males.	Females.
Still on full time... ...	4,214,000	1,203,750	4,676,000	1,392,750
On overtime...	252,000	47,250	364,000	132,75
On short time.	1,820,000	810,000	1,211,000	585,000
Contraction of employment	714,000	189,000	749,000	139,500
Known to have joined the forces ...	616,000	—	742,000	—
Net displacement(−)or replacement(+)	−98,000	—	−7,000	—

These figures show that unemployment was appreciably less in October than in September, and that lack of employment among males has been almost completely met by recruiting, calling up of reservists, &c.—the debit balance being only 7,000 persons.

COTTON TRADE DEPRESSION.

In the case of women the displacement figure is still high, owing chiefly to the bad state of affairs in Lancashire, and to a less extent to unemployment among women in London. Lancashire is, in fact, the chief exception to the general improvement during the month.

Statistics for various industries show that the trades most affected are the cotton trade and the furniture trade, which is an important London industry. The relative contraction of employment in the latter (21.4 per cent. among males and 13.2 per cent. among females) is greater than in cotton (17.1 per cent. in the case of males and 14.2 per cent. for females); but short time, a very serious matter in both industries, is more marked in the case of cotton, 40 per cent. of males and 42.3 per cent. of females in large firms, and 40.3 per cent. of males and 45.5 per cent of females in small firms being on short time.

Other trades showing a great contraction of 10 per cent. or more among the males employed are: Cycle, motor, and carriage, 17.8 per cent.; brick, stone, &c., 13.7; building, 14; "other" metals (copper, brass, precious metals, &c.), 12; engineering, 10; explosives, 11.7; paper and printing, 11.7; glass works, &c., 11.3; "other" textile industries in knitting comforts for the soldiers, altering and renovating old garments and making new clothing from materials which have been given.

These women have all lost their employment owing to the war, and for various reasons cannot enter the factories and workshops, nor can the Labour Exchange find them employment. While they remain self-supporting they are helping others, as the garments made will be distributed through the Lady Mayoress's Clothing Committee to those who are not in a position to buy them for themselves. THE WAR AND THE WAGE-EARNERS.

Signs of Trade Revival.

BOARD OF TRADE REPORT.

Increase of Unemployed Balanced by Enlistments.

POSITION IN THE NORTH

Iron, Steel, & Engineering Almost Normal.

An exhaustive examination of the effects of the war on employment in the United Kingdom is made in a special report issued by the Board of Trade last night. The period dealt with is chiefly October, but in his prefatory remarks, Sir H. Llewellyn Smith takes a broader survey, reviewing the period July-October.

The return has been compiled from returns received from nearly 10,000 large firms (each employing more than 100 hands) and from 10,600 small firms each employing less than 100 hands. The total numbers occupied in the trades concerned amounted to 9,250,000 persons, and the investigation, therefore, covers about 43 per cent. of the industrial populaltion.

The first effect of the war, it is pointed out, was an abrupt and considerable curtailment of production. By September, however, the situation had become clearer, and though in a few trades employes were dismissed after being on short time for a few weeks, in a much larger number of cases the factories resumed their normal working. The reduction of employment in that month amounted to 10¼ per cent. in the case of males, and 8½ per cent. in the case of females.

Trades Most Affected.

"These are figures which are only equalled in the severest of industrial depressions," says the report, "but in the case of males enlistment and the calling up of reservists reduced this contraction to the comparatively small proportion of 1½ per cent. In the following month, moreover, the steady recovery of confidence at home, the increase of export trade and, above all, the immense industrial activity induced by the placing of large war contracts both for his Majesty's Government and for our Allies, caused a continued improvement, except in one or two trades.

"By the middle of October the progress of recruiting had equalled the reduction of employment of males due to the war, while the contraction of employment in the case of females was appreciably less than in September."

The statistics for various industries show that the trades most affected are the cotton trade and the furniture trade, which is an important London industry. The relative contraction of employment in the latter (21.4 per cent. among males and 13.2 per cent. among females) is greater than in cotton (17.1 per cent. in the case of males and 14.2 per cent. for females); but short time, a very serious matter in both industries, is more marked in the case of cotton, 40.0 per cent. of males and 42.3 per cent. of females in large firms, and 40.3 per cent. of males and 45.5 per cent. of females in small firms, being on short time in the cotton industry in Lancashire and Cheshire. Cotton is indeed the more important in that it affects nearly double the number of males and twenty times the number of females employed in the furniture trade.

In Lancashire and Cheshire.

It would be a mistake, of course, says the report, to attribute to the war anything like the whole of the unemployment and short time prevalent in the cotton trade. Bad times were expected in any case in Lancashire, and as is well known the spinners of American cotton had decided previously to the war to curtail production by 16⅔ hours between July and September.

But the cotton trade depends more than any other important industry on foreign markets, and it has therefore been particularly affected by the various obstacles which the war has placed in the way of export. Moreover, although there has been an embarrassing over-supply rather than a shortage of raw cotton, the industry has been affected by lack of some materials, such as dyes and colours, previously imported from abroad.

In a local report from the North-Western division (which includes Lancashire and Cheshire) it is stated that there was in October a gross contraction in the case of males of 12.6 per cent., while 9.3 per cent. have joined the forces, leaving a net contraction of 3.3 per cent. The corresponding figures for September were: Gross contraction, 11.3 per cent.; known to have joined the forces, 7.9 per cent.; net contraction, 3.4 per cent. The contraction in female employment was 12 per cent., compared with 12.1 per cent. in September.

The depression in the cotton trade, it is added, is still serious, but some of the smaller industries are, on the whole, more flourishing than might be expected. The number of employed persons has declined since July by far more than the number of men who have joined the forces, but this is mainly attributable to the cotton trade.

In a tabular analysis of the position the following cotton trade figures are given:—

Cotton Trade Figures.

MALE POPULATION ENGAGED, 209,500.

	Per cent.
Large firms working short time	40.0
Working overtime	0.3
Contraction of employment	18.0
Known to have joined forces	6.7
Net displacement	11.3
Small firms on short time	40.3
Overtime	0.5
Contraction	19.0
Enlistments	8.4
Displacement	10.6

FEMALE POPULATION ENGAGED, 336,800.

	Per cent.
Large firms on short time	42.3
Overtime	0.4
Contraction of employment	16.5
Small firms on short time	45.5
Overtime	nil.
Contraction	10.2

Enlistment from Government offices has been heavy, while as to employment by local bodies, returns from 365 authorities show over 7,000 persons have been taken on to fill the places of 10,300 who have joined the colours.

Regarding the traffic departments of the railway companies, the number enlisted or sent abroad for railway work is understood to have been 58,000 in the middle of October. Unemployment information respecting docks, cartage, shop assistants, and other callings is given, the whole showing that the condition of employment in excluded trades is certainly no worse than in industry, and, though in special professions serious difficulties are being experienced, the position of wage earners on the whole is very favourable.

In a summary of the condition in the various districts it is pointed out that in Yorkshire employment continues good on the whole, with abnormal activity in certain branches of industry. Iron, steel, and engineering are, on the whole, almost normal, and most of the men discharged from the cotton mills are reported to have found work in the woollen industry.

In Manchester, complaints are made of the dearth of unskilled labour owing to the big increase of employment at the port. In Wales, Admiralty orders are keeping the coal mines busy, and owing to enlistment there is a difficulty in getting sufficient labour.

VICTIMS OF THE WAR.

Hopeless Plight of the Shabby Genteel.

PATHETIC STORIES.

Work for Which the Public Has at Present No Need.

There is perhaps no harder case in these days than that of the poor gentlewoman. The clergyman's daughter, the doctor's daughter, the daughter of the army or naval officer, who in normal times is in that position politely alluded to as "reduced circumstances," is in a pitiable plight indeed just now.

There are many such in Manchester—gentlewomen by birth and education, some of whom have suddenly slidden down the social scale from homes full of refinement and even luxury to an existence which is full of privation and soul-destroying poverty. These people, usually spinsters, a little elderly, a little faded, often with blighted hopes and shattered illusions about the world, are not the type which parades its poverty. Rather it seeks to hide it, to cover it up with shabby gentility, and it sometimes makes a pretence of undreamed of affluence in order to escape the embarrassing offer of assistance resembling charity.

The war has dealt a cruel blow at Manchester's shabby genteel—those who are trying to keep up an "appearance," as it is called, on nothing. Such as added to their scanty means by leather-work and needlework of the finer sorts have found a great dearth of orders, and others who eked out a living by taking lodgers are suffering from the effects of recruiting which has taken the young men from their "diggings" to the barracks.

Saved from Starvation.

The drab lives of these people are their real necessity is somewhat overshadowed by the claims on public sympathy on behalf of others whose needs are more closely concerned with the war.

Miss M. C. Child, secretary of the Gentlewomen's Employment Association and Ladies' Work Society, Manchester, and Mrs. Buck, the superintendent of the Work Society, told a Daily Dispatch representative yesterday that although there was without doubt a great deal of undiscovered genteel poverty in Manchester, their society was in touch with sufficient for them to be able to say without exaggeration that poor gentlefolk were suffering as much as any class in the community at the present moment. But for the efforts of the society many ladies would be actually starving.

"Some of the ladies on our books," said Miss Child, "are entirely dependent on what they make with their hands, and which we sell for them. As our annual report shows, one worker last year sold goods to the value of £90, and another to the value of £77, while twenty-six received payments varying from £30 to £50. Much of the work done by them is of a very beautiful character, but the war has sadly interfered with the sales, especially of the little pretty things, such as sachets, photo frames, and bridge-markers.

Lady of 78 with £5 a Year.

"We come across many pathetic cases. One lady of 78 years of age has to do work in order to support herself, and another has only an annuity of £5 apart from what she earns by selling her needlework. In a third case three sisters living together have to exist, except for the money they get by disposing of work through us, on an income which is never more than £60 a year. How they manage to do it and keep up a position of respectability goodness only knows. One or two of the ladies on our register have been clothed and provided with almost an entire wardrobe through the medium of the society.

"Our work," concluded Miss Child, "concerning as it does only the daughters, widows, and wives of professional men, calls for the exercise of great tact, as may be imagined. A person whom you know to be in very urgent need will cheerfully tell you that she would rather not—that there must be so many others who are worse situated. A number are living in lodgings where there is precious little comfort, and the circumstances of their lives make cheerfulness a virtue most difficult to retain."

WAR AND TRADE.

NO NET INCREASE IN UNEMPLOYMENT.

Confidence Restored.

POSITION OF WAGE-EARNERS VERY FAVOURABLE.

A White Paper was issued last night giving the Board of Trade's report on the state of employment in the United Kingdom during October.

In his prefatory remarks, H. Llewellyn Smith says returns were received from over 20,000 firms, employing altogether over four million workpeople, or about 43 per cent. of the whole industrial population. The total reduction shown in the number of male employees as between July and October is 10.7 per cent., almost precisely equal to the percentage shown by the statistics of those who have joined the military and naval forces. Consequently it would appear that in the aggregate there has been no net increase in unemployment of male workpeople, though certain employments have fallen off, while others have absorbed additional labour.

The percentage of those working short time, though considerable, has fallen from 26 per cent. in September to 17.3.

Female Workers.

The total reduction in the number of women employed has been 6.2 per cent., and as this contraction has not been counteracted by enlistment, there has been a net displacement of labour. The percentage of women working short time has also been high, though it has fallen from 36 per cent. in September to 26 per cent. in October, the high figures being largely due to the condition of the cotton trade.

Dealing with the general industrial results, the report says the returns for September, when it became clearer in many industries how far markets were likely to be restricted by war, showed a reduction amounting to 10¼ per cent. in the case of males and 8¼ in the case of females. These were figures only equalled in the severest of industrial depressions, but as regards males enlistment and calling up of reservists reduced the contraction to the comparatively small proportion of 1½ per cent. In the following month the steady recovery of confidence at home, increase of export trade, and immense activity induced by the placing of war contracts, caused a continued improvement, except in one or two trades.

By the middle of October the progress of recruiting had equalled the reduction of male employment, due to war, while the contraction as affected females became appreciably less.

The Cotton Industry.

Statistics for various industries show that the trades most adversely affected are the cotton and furniture industries, the latter an important London industry. Though the relative contraction of employment is greater in the latter than in the former, short time is a very serious matter in both, and is more marked in the case of cotton. Though the war could not be held responsible for the whole conditions in the cotton trade it had much aggravated them.

The relative contraction in cotton employment had been 17.1 per cent. in the case of males and 14.2 per cent. in the case of females; while the figures for short time were over 40 per cent. in both large and small firms. Besides export obstacles placed by war, and the difficulty experienced over the supply of raw cotton, the trade had been affected by the lack of imported dyes and colours.

Statistics are presented showing that the woollen and worsted trades of Yorkshire had been relieved more than any other industry by Government war contracts.

Enlistment from Government offices has been heavy, while as to employment by local bodies, returns from 365 authorities show that over 7000 persons have been taken on to fill the places of 10,300 who have joined the colours.

Railway Employees.

Regarding the traffic departments of Railway Companies, the number enlisted or sent abroad for railway work is understood to have been 58,000. In the middle of October unemployment information respecting docks, cartage, shop assistants, and other callings is given, showing that the condition of employment in excluded trades is certainly no worse than in industry, and though, in special professions, serious difficulties are being experienced the position of wage-earners, on the whole, is very favourable.

A summary of the conditions in various districts is appended. In London the building trade has had a revival of activity, many large firms employing more men than before the war, though not so many as a year ago; while carpenters and bricklayers have benefited by the demand for army and hospital huts.

The cabinet trade is still badly reduced, but the clothing trades are now very busy in all branches capable of doing military work.

The position of sugar and confectionery trades is also appreciably better than in the preceding months.

Government Orders.

In the south-eastern division, including Oxfordshire, Bedfordshire, and East Anglia, employment has also been greatly influenced by orders for military equipment, and in the leather industries some firms could employ additional hands, but find it difficult to obtain them.

In the engineering trade, firms with Government orders are working overtime, but others are affected by the curtailment of the export trade. Paper and printing trades were considerably affected by curtailment of demand.

In the South-Western Counties, the most marked characteristic is that in nearly every trade more men have enlisted than have been put out of employment. In the boot and shoe industry orders have been booked from the French Government, and increased activity is reported in the fruit preserving trade.

In the West Midland district contraction in employment in the iron and steel trades and cycle and motor industries is due to enlistment, but the list of industries showing a marked falling off are the metal trades, which are of great importance in the Birmingham district.

The feature of the East Midlands divis' returns is the boom in hosiery through Government orders, which benefits women employees; but, except for satisfactory statistics for boot manufacture, the returns are of a mixed character. Nottingham is not doing so well as was expected, seeing that German competition in the lace trade has ceased.

Position Normal.

Employment in Yorkshire continues good on the whole, with abnormal activity in certain branches of industry. Iron, steel, and engineering are on the whole almost normal, and most of the men discharged from the cotton mills are reported to have found work in the woollen industry.

The feature of information regarding the northern division is the amount of short time in the coal trade, which is still adversely affected by export difficulties. The north-western division is mainly affected by the cotton and worsted industries, references to which have been already made.

In Bolton trade is said to be declining slowly, and in Manchester complaints are made of the dearth of unskilled labour owing to the big increase of employment.

In the Wales division Admiralty orders are keeping the coal mines very busy, and owing to enlistment there is difficulty in getting sufficient labour. The anthracite trade has improved with the revival in Near European markets, but in the tinplate trade employment is rather slack.

Irish Industries.

Irish industries have not been greatly injured by the war. The majority are reported as normal or but slightly depressed, while others have benefited by Government orders—as, for instance, the shipbuilding industry. In the small woollen and worsted industry most firms are working full time, and an increase in the number of hands is likely through Government work.

The number of employed in the linen industry is normal, but scarcity of raw material from Russia necessitates short time in many cases. The Belfast hem-stitching trade and fancy linen and embroidery trades are slackening. The majority of the firms in the former are going on half-time and reducing their staffs. On the whole, Irish trades are not seriously affected, the chief abnormal feature being the short time in the linen trades.

THE FLAG DAY QUESTION.

Some discussion arose on a letter from Mr William Martin, 34 West George Street, Glasgow, pointing out that the date up to which appeals might be made on behalf of H.R.H. the Princess Mary's Fund had been extended to 19th December, and trusting that it might be possible to fix a date for a flag day appeal in Edinburgh.

The Lord Provost said he thought this matter should be carefully considered before their patronage was given. Some of them thought there were too many flag days. His Lordship expressed the view that they were doing all they could through the Committee over which Mr Inman presided.

Mr Robertson moved that the matter be remitted to the Lord Provost's Committee. He disagreed, he said, with the Lord Provost's remarks, and did not think they should have been made. He did not think the Scottish flag day or any other flag day had been to their detriment.

The Lord Provost said he did not refer to the Scottish flag day.

Bailie Buchan seconded, and Mr Robertson's proposal was agreed to.

EMPLOYMENT IN THE PRINTING TRADE.

A letter was read from the secretary of the Edinburgh Master Printers' Association calling attention to the state of the printing trade in Edinburgh on account of the war, and asking that a deputation should be heard. It was agreed to hear the deputation, which consisted of Dr W. B. Blaikie and Mr R. W. Hanson, representing the Master Printers' Association, and Mr Robert Allan and Mr John Mullen, representing the men's Trade Union.

Dr Blaikie said that since the war began the printing trade, which employed 12,000 persons, had suffered greatly. The Imperial market was one of their staples, and the houses whose chief business it was to print books were gradually drying up. Of the members of the trade, 16 per cent. had joined the colours. What was more interesting was that 50 per cent. of the men of military age had enlisted. (Hear, hear.) This materially reduced unemployment, but they were approaching what was ordinarily their slack time, and the female workers, the bookfolders, and the bookbinders were, and would be, particularly affected. As a practical suggestion, Mr Blaikie asked the Council to consider the printing of the Valuation Roll. This was done by almost all large Corporations. Other public Boards might take the same view of matters, and do anything that could be done in the way of printing by hurrying on orders. This would assist the trade enormously. The object of the employers was to give employment rather than to make profits.

In reply to the Lord Provost, Dr Blaikie said the printing of the Valuation Roll would give employment to a very considerable number of men for eight weeks.

Mr Mullen said there were about 5000 girls employed in the trade, but their work was mostly dependent on the men working, and if there was a reduction in the number of men employed the girls would suffer. Most of them were now on half-time. Referring to assistance from the National Relief Fund, he said that some of the girls were so humiliated with insulting inquiries and statements that they were determined to persuade other girls not to apply. The matter would come before the Central Committee of the National Relief Fund at the proper time.

Bailie Rose pointed out that this matter had been before the Relief Fund Committee already, and a sub-committee had been appointed for the special purpose of finding suitable work for the men.

On his suggestion, the deputation agreed to send in the names of two representatives to meet the sub-committee of the Relief Fund Committee.

The Lord Provost, addressing the deputation, said that the interest of the Corporation was to see there was as little unemployment in the city as possible, and the deputation might rely that the would do their very best for them.

The deputation, having thanked the Corporation for receiving them, withdrew.

HASTINGS CENTRAL AID COUNCIL.

The fact that a large number of ladies and gentlemen faced the elements in order to be present at its annual meeting, on Monday evening, was eloquent testimony to the splendid work carried on by the Hastings Central Aid Council. The meeting, which was held at the Town Hall, was presided over by the Mayor (Councillor E. Armitage Hocking). An excellent Report, dealing with the work of the past year, was presented, and this, together with a satisfactory Report on the homes for the aged poor, was adopted. The members of the Executive Committee who retired by rotation were all re-elected. Miss M. Phillips gave an interesting address on the scheme for the employment of women. She mentioned that since the war large numbers of women had been thrown out of work, and others were only working half-time. She spoke also of the Queen's Work for Women Fund, and what was being done for unemployed female workers.

Local Administration.

SPECIAL ARRANGEMENTS DURING WAR TIME.

INSTRUCTION FOR THE UNEMPLOYED.

Local education authorities are faced with many new problems in these days of stress; and many new demands, requiring in most cases instant attention, are being made upon them. Circular after circular, necessitated by the changed conditions, has been issued, both by the Board of Education and by the Board of Agriculture, many of them containing suggestions and proposals for new schemes of work to be organized for the benefit of one class or other of the community. The national conscience and the national sense of responsibility towards less fortunate fellow-citizens have developed rapidly in recent years, with the result that, now as never before, every member of the community is anxious that everything possible shall be done to mitigate, to some extent, the distress necessarily caused to so many people by the partial dislocation of trade and industry, and by the absence, on military or naval service, of so many of our men. Hence the many social and educational schemes now being advocated; and, although the distress so far has been less than was anticipated, it still has been and is acute amongst certain sections of the people. Want of occupation at this particular time is harmful for both sexes from many points of view, and local authorities in various parts of the Kingdom are preparing themselves to meet any emergency that may arise.

The Leeds Scheme.

The Leeds Education Committee have drawn up a comprehensive memorandum as to the action which has been or may be taken to prevent unemployment or to provide employment for men, women, and girls. All men out of employment are required to register at the Labour Exchange and at the Corporation Employment Bureau, and specially urgent cases are given preference for corporation work, whilst a small grant-in-aid is being given in absolutely necessitous cases. All work included in the estimates of the corporation for the current financial year has been hurried forward, and other schemes are being expedited as fast as circumstances will allow. Employers of labour have been interviewed and asked to keep their works open and to apportion the work in such a manner as to provide, if possible, employment for the whole of their employees on at least three days a week. The result has been gratifying; but there still remains a considerable amount of unemployment, and a much larger amount of under-employment, in the city. For young men out of employment, for whom no suitable work can be provided, day courses are to be organized as necessity arises, in subjects of general education and instruction applicable to the industries of the district, in order to fit the young men to take up jobs of a more or less skilled nature as opportunity occurs. The subjects to be included are practical mathematics and mechanics, technical drawing, and workshop practice, with English and drill. The aim of the instruction will be to teach the principles underlying industry in general and to secure the all-round development of the students in a thoroughly practical manner.

Women and girls out of employment are also required to register at the Labour Exchange and at the Corporation office; and an arrangement has been made with the Leeds Wholesale Clothiers' Association for the opening of a bureau by them to act as a clearing-house for all labour required by the clothing factories. Single women out of employment are receiving a grant of 7s. 6d. a week, conditional on their attendance at a concentrated course of training for lower skilled positions, for which there is a demand in the city. The trades in which such training is to be given are boot and shoe machinery, for which there is equipment at the Central Technical School, blouse-making, women's underclothing, costume and mantle making, and laundrywork. In this way it is hoped to convert the unskilled single worker into a more or less skilled worker, to the permanent benefit both of herself and of her employer.

Grants to married women and widows are only to be made on their undertaking to work satisfactorily through courses in artisan cookery, in simple methods of making, renovating, and repairing of garments, and in the elementary principles of hygiene and home management, so that they may learn how to conduce in an artisan's way to the best advantage of the family as a whole. [illegible] cost of these classes for the present financial year is from £2,000 to £3,000.

The holding of extra classes has been authorized by the Birmingham Education Committee at the Victoria-street School for Jewellers and Silversmiths, a school which forms a special feature of the Birmingham educational system. The additional classes are intended for the use of workpeople in the jewelry and allied trades who, owing to the war, are either out of employment or in part-time employment only. It has been decided to open the school on five, instead of on three, afternoons a week from 2.30 to 4.30 and again from 5 p.m. to 7 p.m. It is anticipated that the evening session—from 7 p.m. to 9 p.m.—may not be required; and, in order to meet any emergency in the trade, and in the best interests of the employers, full discretionary power to vary the times of instruction has been given to the chairman of the School of Art Sub-Committee, in consultation with the headmaster and the Birmingham Jewellers' and Silversmiths' Association. Special technical courses have been arranged, and endeavours will be made to meet particular requirements. The maximum extra cost involved in these additional classes is estimated at £13 11s. 6d. per week, and it has been decided that students shall be admitted to any number of classes for a fee of 3s. 6d. The fees hitherto charged were 3s. 6d. for five or less evenings, and 7s. 6d. for three or less afternoons a week.

Arrangements in Other Areas.

Shortly after the outbreak of war, the Cheshire Education Committee appointed a sub-committee to deal with the question of providing special day classes for young women out of employment; and conferences were held with members of the distress relief committees and others to ascertain the amount of unemployment prevailing in the various districts in the county, and to discuss the kind of instruction which might be organized as and where required. It was decided to form special day classes in cookery, laundry-work, sewing, and sick nursing in any places where a fairly general state of unemployment was found to be prevailing, these being the subjects most generally useful and at the same time those recommended for such cases by the Board of Education, who are encouraging and supporting all schemes for the improvement of the technical qualifications of workers during any enforced leisure consequent upon the war.

Similar action has been taken in Exeter, where a deputation from the Exeter War Relief Committee conferred with the Higher Education Sub-Committee as to the advisability of establishing classes to unemployed girls. The Relief Committee considered that the granting of relief should be conditional upon attendance at such classes, and the Education Committee decided to arrange for the giving of instruction in domestic subjects to unemployed girls. In Ipswich also the Education Committee has been approached by the committee of the Mayoress's Work for Women Fund with the request that they would arrange classes for girls who are now partially or wholly unemployed, in such subjects as would be useful to them in their future occupations, having particular regard to domestic employment, preparation for which should include instruction in cookery, laundry-work, and general housewifery. The chairman of the Education Committee was deputed to confer with the Mayoress's Committee and to make such arrangements as seemed advisable in the circumstances. Action of this sort, if taken wherever there is any large measure of unemployment, either for men or for women, should result in the better technical training of many unskilled workers; and, the habit once formed of attending classes with a view to improving their qualifications, it is at least hopeful that some will continue to attend after the present compulsion is removed.

Classes for Territorials in London.

In consequence of the issue of the circular of the Board of Education relating to the provision of classes for soldiers in their spare time, the London Education Committee discussed early in November a scheme for giving instruction to the 8,000 Territorials now in training at the White City. As the men will probably not be there longer than six weeks it was decided, with the full approval of the commanding officer, to take immediate steps to arrange for the holding of a series of lectures and classes, including courses in simple French and German conversation and health hints; weekly lectures on the history and geography of the war area; weekly vocal music lessons; and lessons in sewing and darning, drawing and sketching, woodcarving, repoussé work, leather work, and camp cookery, all of which subjects were likely to be appreciated by the men in training. The estimated gross cost of the classes for a period of six weeks is £300, and the expenditure has already been more than justified judging by the results. Thoroughly efficient teachers were provided, and the classes have proved extremely popular and have been well attended by the men, who have much appreciated the opportunities offered, as is shown by the fact that nearly 1,700 have enrolled for one or other of the classes.

Since the opening of these classes at the White City an application has been received from the classes for the troops stationed at Halton, where a considerable number of the men were found to be willing to avail themselves of any facilities for systematic instruction. The committee hope, before long, to be able to make suitable arrangements for the instruction of the men stationed at Aylesbury.

In the West Riding of Yorkshire similar classes have been provided by the education committee at various centres; and the Lancashire Committee also are arranging for courses for men stationed in the area under their control.

as never before, every member of the community is anxious that everything possible shall be done to mitigate, to some extent, the distress necessarily caused to so many people by the partial dislocation of trade and industry, and by the absence, on military or naval service, of so many of our men. Hence the many social and educational schemes now being advocated; and, although the distress so far has been less than was anticipated, it still has been and is acute amongst certain sections of the people. Advice will also be given as to food values and the best ways of utilizing small incomes, and an attempt will be made to combat the use of tinned foods, so common in artisan families owing to the ignorance of the mothers.

Classes in London and Birmingham.

The Emergency Committee of the London County Council, acting during the recess, considered the question of the formation of educational classes for young persons thrown out of employment on account of the war, suggested by the Board of Education circular on the subject, and authorized the opening of classes during the daytime in ten centres, five for boys and five for girls. It was necessary to negotiate for the holding of these classes in non-Council premises, as Council buildings are all fully occupied during the day; and arrangements were made by which the use of suitable rooms was granted free of charge, the Council to provide out-of-pocket expenses, such as fuel, lighting, and cleaning. In some cases apparatus and furniture had to be lent by the Council, in other cases it was provided by the trustees of the buildings. The estimated per week, and it has been decided that students shall be admitted to any number of classes for a fee of 3s. 6d. The fees hitherto charged were 3s. 6d. for five or less evenings, and 7s. 6d. for three or less afternoons a week.

Classes for Territorials in London.

In consequence of the issue of the circular of the Board of Education relating to the provision of classes for soldiers in their spare time, the London Education Committee discussed early in November a scheme for giving instruction to the 8,000 Territorials now in training at the White City. As the men will probably not be there longer than six weeks it was decided, with the full approval of the commanding officer, to take immediate steps to arrange for the holding of a series of lectures and classes, including courses in simple French and German conversation and health hints; weekly lectures on the history and geography of the war area; weekly vocal music lessons; and lessons in sewing and darning, drawing and sketching, woodcarving, repoussé work, leather work, and camp cookery, all of which subjects were likely to be appreciated by the men in training. The estimated gross cost of the classes for a period of six weeks is £300, and the expenditure has already been more than justified judging by the results. Thoroughly efficient teachers were provided, and the classes have proved extremely popular and have been well attended by the men, who have much appreciated the opportunities offered, as is shown by the fact that nearly 1,700 have enrolled for one or other of the classes.

Since the opening of these classes at the White City, an application has been received from the garrison adjutant of his Majesty's troops stationed at Woolwich, asking that arrangements may be made for the giving to his men of a series of lectures on the history and geography of the war, and the holding of a vocal music class. The request has been granted, classes have already been formed, and the expenditure up to Christmas of this year is estimated at £20.

Some Schemes for other Counties.

In other parts of the country also arrangements have been made to provide instruction for recruits in the various camps. The West Sussex and Chichester Joint Education Committee, in consultation with the military authorities, have provided classes for the soldiers at Shoreham Camp in first aid, ambulance work, and cookery, and also in the French, German, and Flemish languages. Men attending courses in the first three of these subjects are excused from night duty during their course, a sign that the military authorities approve of the arrangements made. Then, too, the Buckinghamshire Education Committee have provided evening

UNEMPLOYED WOMEN.

A New Experience for Factory Girls.

At Work on the Land. How They Live.

"WHY don't you put us to work on the land?" The suggestion came from a factory girl at the beginning of the war when the question of employment for the unemployed factory girl was raised. It was wise advice and the Central Committee on Women's Employment took it.

Thirty girls were sent into training as market gardeners and fruit growers on land which was lent for the purpose, and a grant was obtained to pay the girls' wages for one year.

Girls of Spirit.

Twenty-two girls are now at work. It is extraordinary to see an actual bit of East London transplanted to the country—and liking it. No one could mistake the girls who are now busily planting trees for anything but factory girls. The way they do their hair, the high tone in which they talk, their general "breeziness" belong entirely to the East-end factory girl. Probably no other type of London girl would have had the spirit to tackle this absolutely different work in the way these girls are doing.

"I'm going to stick it through the winter if I can," is the general expression of opinion, and the girls refer to the weather, not to the work. They took to digging like lucks to the water. No one knew how to handle a spade, but these girls are very quick, and they do not need to be told twice.

The majority have been packers and bottle-washers employed in a confectionery factory, and there are two dressmakers and a typist. They all find digging and planting an interesting employment.

They are working on twenty acres of land and have already planted one field with 10,000 cabbages; on the other side they are putting 1,500 currant trees, and two long beds separating the fields are planted out with daffodils and narcissi. They will be planting trees for some time and they are to grow every kind of vegetable for their own use.

Two of the girls are going to Australia at the end of the year if they like the work.

They begin in the morning at 7.30, a break comes at 11 o'clock, when milk and bread and butter are dispensed, then they work till dinner-time at 12.30. A hot meal is provided for fourpence each, and they work again in the fields until 5 o'clock.

Fares Paid by Sweethearts.

For a 48-hour week they are paid 12s. and extra for overtime. Board and lodging costs from 7s. to 9s. a week, and they nearly all want to send something home to their mothers.

They are quite near enough to go up to London for the week-end, but their wages would not cover the expense. The girls do go, however, for their "boys" send the money for their fares. The same "boys" come down to visit them.

The difficulty is to keep them amused when they are not working. Overtime—making pickles and chutney—occupies them for a little while in the evening, and it is hoped that two basket-makers will presently join the community who will be able to teach their fellows to make the baskets which are used in the outdoor work. The girls may also be able to make their own punnets for the fruit.

Poultry-Rearing Taught.

Once a week there are talks led by the two lady superintendents on gardening or poultry-rearing. The latter is to be taught practically.

Eleven of the girls live together in a house adjoining their own land, which has been rented by the committee. The others lodge in the village or in cottages near by.

If the girls do not care to go on living at the house, they can give a week's notice and find lodgings. Even those living in the house buy their own food, with the exception of dinner, because they think they can do it cheaper. The shopping also gives them an additional interest.

Singing in the Fields.

For further recreation they play the piano and dance and sing. They are always singing. When the day's work is over you hear them coming back singing across the fields. Even when sitting with tears running down their cheeks from peeling onions they are still singing. And they dance. As soon as dinner is over they are waltzing or two-stepping round the room.

The only great want they have is for boots—strong boots. Ordinary town boots are of no use, and as the girls explained "once your feet get wet you're done." They have been advised to work bare-footed, but they will not entertain this idea, as they say they would look like niggers!

POSITION OF DRESSMAKERS.

November 29.

Sir,—Please allow me to bring before your lady readers at this time a clamant need for their kindly thought and practical help. Amidst all the numerous schemes for helping sufferers through the war there is a class which is now suffering severely and whose plight is being overlooked. I refer to the dressmakers. I am safe in saying there are very few who are now earning a full day's pay, just because ladies' energies and sympathies are engaged in other directions. All dances, balls, card parties, dinners, and other social functions are in abeyance. This is always one of the busiest periods of the year, and it is, unfortunately, true that there is scarcely any orders being taken for afternoon or evening gowns in any of the high-class establishments. Can the ladies of Glasgow and district not see their way to revive social functions in some measure? Card parties, dinners, concerts, and social evenings could be organised with the object of helping the various funds, and be of ultimate benefit to the workers. This is a meritorious field for the energies of some of our benevolent ladies of society, who can always be depended on when a deserving appeal is made to their kind hearts and unflagging energy in welldoing. I trust this appeal may receive some support from other and more influential patrons of a hard-working section of our city.—I am, etc.,

UNEMPLOYED WOMEN IN GOVAN.

City Chambers, December 2.

Sir,—I have been asked by the Govan District Relief Committee to appeal, through your columns, to the unemployed women and girls in Govan who have not registered themselves at the Labour Exchange to do so at the earliest opportunity, as the committee are anxious to get exact information as to the extent of female unemployment in the district. The information is necessary to support our campaign for the establishment of a workroom in Govan for unemployed women. The Labour Exchange is at 55 Helen Street, and the hours of registration are from 9 a.m. to 4 p.m. Every assistance to those registering will be given by the woman in charge.—I am, etc.,

St. Margaret's Hall

The scheme inaugurated in the early days by Mrs. Acworth at St. Margaret's Hall, Highroad, Kilburn, for the benefit of women and girls affected by the war has developed into a most important work. It will stand as an monument of what can be achieved by personal effort, and as an example which may with advantage be followed by the authorities in every other district. The premises themselves are ideal, and the workers are busily employed in making garments of various kinds, all of which are intended to directly relieve the distress of women and children in the Willesden district who are in need of help.

Mrs. Acworth, not only lent the premises (formerly known as The Kilburn Athenæum, which she recently acquired) for Women's Employment, but she financed the scheme, pending arrangements with Queen Mary's National Relief Fund, and during the past weeks she has expended a very large sum of money in wages and in meeting other expenses. Now on the recommendation of the Government Committee, the National Relief Fund has forwarded a cheque for £360 in respect of work being carried on for the next four weeks, and it is expected that this grant will be continued, and also that repayment of some of the money already expended will be made.

The supplies of clothing made may be obtained through the Belgian Relief Fund for Belgian refugees, through the Soldiers' and Sailors' Aid Association for the benefit of children of the troops, through the Distress Committee for those in need, and through any other recognized authority, to assist those in trouble. Without going into detail, we may state that the work is done under skilled supervision that it is of excellent quality and in abundance, and that in every detail St. Margaret's Hall, with its vast ramifications, is a centre of a great work, with wide influences, having its benefactions spreading to the utmost confines of the parish. Willesden is indeed favoured by being privileged to have within its borders at this time of national crisis so valuable and so complete a centre for the Employment of Women as Mrs. Acworth's St. Margaret's Hall.

She is now developing a further scheme for training indoor domestic workers, who will further add to the efficiency of St. Margaret's by furnishing dinners for the sewing women.

EMPLOYMENT OF WOMEN.

NEW EXCHANGE OPENED IN GLASGOW.

A new Labour Exchange for women and girls, established by the Board of Trade, was opened at 104 West George Street, Glasgow, yesterday by Lady Arthur. Mr Francis Henderson presided, and among those present were Sir A. H. Pettigrew, Miss Blackie, Miss Younger, Mr James Paterson, Mr Anderson, and Mr J. M. Cramond.

The Chairman said that some time ago, when a desire arose in the city that something should be done to mitigate the unemployment which existed among women on account of the war, it was suggested that there should be established a central women's office in Glasgow for helping those who had been thrown out of work. A number of ladies who were engaged in work among women in the city, and some who though outside the city were interested in the matter, agreed to help, with the result that a central office had been established. They were so impressed with the central situation of the offices and the admirable work that was being done that they recommended to the Board of Trade that it should be made the central exchange for women and girls. It was possible that an extension of the scheme so as to include business men and boys might be considered at some future date.

Lady Arthur, in declaring the Exchange open, said she was sure it would meet the need that had been felt in the city. She did not think that at the present time there could be any scheme more useful than that which enabled capable women to find posts for which they were fitted.

Sir A. H. Pettigrew said he was sure that when the Exchange became better known in Glasgow employers would regard it with confidence as a place to which they could turn, when vacancies occurred, for lists of applicants to fill these posts.

UNEMPLOYED WOMEN IN BRADFORD.

To the Editor of The Yorkshire Post.

Sir,—May we make an appeal through your paper on behalf of the work of our Committee which receives a constant succession of applicants, most of whom, after investigation, are admitted to our workrooms for a shorter or longer period, until they get back to their regular work? One of our difficulties is the provision of material to keep them all busy on garments to be given to the needy. We beg, therefore, to remind your readers that gifts of fents and pieces of material will be gladly received at our rooms at the Friends' Meeting House, Fountain Street, and to ask them to continue to keep up the supply of worn clothing which has been not only an aid in this difficulty, but also of great value in the training of unskilled workers.—Yours, etc.,

Unemployment.

It is bad news that industrial depression still prevails in Lancashire, for the textile industries are of great national importance. Industrial unemployment among men has been almost completely met by recruiting, but among women it is acute in Lancashire and parts of London. There are also a very large number of women, as well as many men, in the cotton industry, working on short time. The figures given by the Board of Trade are not complete, as they are compiled from returns from firms employing about 4,000,000 persons out of a total of 9,250,000. Still, the inquiry is fairly representative, and it shows only about 7,000 men as against 139,000 women out of work in October.

The Daily Telegraph, Dec: 4th. 1914.

WORK FOR WOMEN.

CHRISTMAS ACTIVITY.

It has been one of the surprises of the war that there has not been a far greater percentage of unemployment among women. Of course, certain trades have suffered. The dressmaker catering for extravagant and fashion-in-advance wearers has found this class of custom has stopped short and has had to dismiss her staff. The City agency selling German and Austrian goods has closed its doors, and its slenderly-paid clerks and typists have lost their situations. The luxury trades, as in floral bouquets, table decorations, and many little accessories of dress, have been hardly hit.

But, on the other hand, there have been compensations. If big establishments have reduced the number of their servants, boarding-houses, hotels, and restaurants have lost their German and Austrian waiters and have had to replace them by English girls. If dressmaking is suffering, never has there been such a call for tailoresses, and the younger and more adaptable women have set themselves to learn the special requirements of factory work. The demands for flannel shirts, caps, and other garments for the new Army have opened up new fields of industry. These are facts patent and plain, even though official information on the conditions of the women's labour market will, as far as possible, be withheld from the ordinary inquirer.

SEASON'S CASUAL DEMANDS.

Christmastide is a season when quite an appreciable number of girls hope to earn a little money in connection with its special demands. There is always a number of young women ready to come into more or less casual employ. In the summer they are probably attendants at stalls or kiosques at the exhibitions. They may find an odd job in August or September at some seaside bazaar or show. With the spring there may be the sending out of masses of circulars calling attention to some new enterprise or other, and somehow they manage to pick up in one way or another the few shillings a week which represent so much to them.

In a normal year Christmas presents several possibilities. There may be the chance of joining that miscellaneous crowd that come on to the stage in a suburban pantomime as amazons or onlookers at Cinderella's ball, or lasses at Jack and Jill's country fête. The "bazaars" which are so popular a feature at many of the shops call for numbers of additional assistants. Small shops are specially opened for the sale of Christmas cards and cheap little knicknacks, and require help at their counters. At the provision and sweet stores additional cashiers may be needed, and there are many opportunities in various directions.

The present season, it is to be feared, will see curtailment of some of these possibilities. A much-reduced list of pantomimes is to be expected, and at the shops, though business is much better than many would have dared to predict two months ago, the general volume of trade cannot be expected to reach the great totals of twelve months or two years ago. Still, there are obviously many hopeful believers that the season's pleasant observances will be maintained as far as possible, and by the brightness and gaiety of the bazaars in so many of the shops the utmost is being done to attract the customer. Thoughtful people, too, are realising that they are rendering good service in the economic position by supporting industry and trade.

THE CAPABLE WORKER.

Whatever suffering and hardship this season may bring to the casual woman worker of this order it will only tend to emphasise the oft-recognised fact that it is the unskilled and the feebly incompetent who in any crisis are the first to go to the wall. The highly-trained and capable woman in any calling or vocation finds her work wanted. Who, for instance, a decade ago even, would have said that the demand for medical women was likely in the present generation to be far in excess of the supply? Yet such is the fact, and at this moment when there are over 4 thousand women doctors upon the medical register, more are being called for in all directions. Only to cite a single instance, it may be mentioned that at the Treloar Cripples' Home at Alton two assistant lady surgeons at good salaries have been wanted for weeks past, and the posts cannot be filled.

It is one of the most useful lessons that have emerged out of the many organisations and committees that have called themselves into being in recent months to have realised how valuable any form of specialised training is. Some whom it seemed impossible to help in the ordinary channels have been set to learn an industry calling for technical skill, and have thus obtained a means of future livelihood. In fact, the close of the war may well see some in better positions than they would ever otherwise have known.

For, as the Labour Bureaus know well, there are always industries in which the workers are too few. It takes time to learn the expert touches that are essential, and too frequently the girl who might be taught them wants to begin to earn a slender wage at once. At the present time training is being given by the Queen's Work for Women Fund in some of those less popular vocations, and with grants for maintenance while learning some few of these who would otherwise be among those casually employed at the moment are thus improving the time. Considering how all trade and industry appeared likely to be dislocated at the outset of the war, it is a matter for real satisfaction that the position is as good as it is, and that with the brighter hopes for Christmas some at least, if not all those who look to the season for a certain share of the benefits it brings will not be disappointed.

THE CITY SCHEME TO TRAIN "HOME HELPERS."

The Government Committee on the Prevention and Relief of Distress have passed schemes for training centres submitted by the City of London Committee of the Prince of Wales's Fund, and grants for carrying on the centres have been received from the Fund. Immediate steps are being taken to put the schemes in operation. The Committee hope that the training centres will be opened in the course of a week or 10 days.

The schemes comprise training in commercial subjects, dressmaking, &c., for unemployed women secretaries, shorthand-typists, and others ordinarily engaged in commercial occupations; training in domestic economy for industrial women, and the training of industrial women as "home helpers." It is proposed to pay the commercial women a maintenance grant of 10s. a week, and the industrial women 3d. per hour, with a maximum of 10s. per week.

Persons desiring to enter the training centres should register at the Employment Bureau, St. Bride Institute, Bride-lane, Fleet-street, E.C. Only those out of employment due to the war and previously employed in the City of London are eligible.

PROFESSIONAL WAGE-EARNERS.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE TIMES.

Sir,—Some time ago there appeared in your paper a proposal that the administrators of the Prince of Wales's Fund should put aside a sum to be used in loans to professional men and women whose earnings were affected by the war. As far as I know this proposal has not been taken up, and I am sure that many anxious eyes must be watching to see if no help of this kind is to be made possible for them. The class whose earnings have been most entirely annihilated by the war are the artists. I will not speak of musicians and actors, for attention has already been drawn to their difficulties. It is rather for architects, painters and sculptors, designers, and handicraftsmen of all kinds that I would plead. No one nowadays is having houses built or decorated; no one is buying pictures or statues, or even small objects for wedding presents. Already many minor artists—principally women—have had to earn thankfully a few shillings by toy-making, and the like, through the help of benevolent agencies. But what is to become of the men, many of them of widely acknowledged talent and apparently of assured position, who find themselves not only with families, but even with skilled assistants dependent on them, and not only with houses but with studios or offices—taxable property—which they cannot sell? Art is a precarious profession at the best, and there must be many of these men who have never been able to save. The only kind of help that they could endure to accept would be a loan. Fairly substantial sums, lent without interest, to be repaid by instalments over a considerable period, would now save many whose talents are among the most valuable assets of the nation from absolute ruin and despair.

A small committee of distinguished professional men might be formed to receive applications and to deal with them in strict confidence. It may be said, what would be done with the money when returned? Well, no doubt most of it would be returned. But in the struggling years that are to come it is certain that some, perhaps not the least talented, would be found to be irretrievably ruined. The money returned by their more fortunate brethren could be used for their permanent benefit. If there were any surplus it could be devoted to some of those public charities which are certain to be found to have suffered by the war.

I remain, Sir, yours faithfully,

MARY LOVELACE.

SOUTHPORT NATIONAL AID COMMITTEE WOMEN'S EMPLOYMENT BUREAU.

During the week the Southport National Aid Committee Women's Employment Bureau at the Friends' Meeting House, Portland-street, has found work for 30 women and girls. Several have been found work in their own trade during the week, and consequently the number employed at the Bureau is diminishing, which is a very satisfactory state of affairs. The Bureau will be closed for the Christmas holidays from December 23rd, 1914, to January 4th, 1915. The orders for toys for the Christmas trade still come in, and the toy department is very busy getting these executed. The Committee hope there will be many visiters on Friday afternoon at the Friends' Meeting House, Portland-street, to buy garments for giving away for Christmas gifts to those in need. More shirts are still wanted for the troops, and the Committee are very glad to receive orders for these to be made by the workers. Orders by post are promptly attended to, and the office is open each morning from 10 to 12 (except Saturdays) to take orders or give information. Remnants suitable for children's frocks or coats are very acceptable, and the Committee wish to thank those who have kindly sent pieces.

PUBLIC WORK AND WOMEN'S EMPLOYMENT.

RULES FOR THIS DEPARTMENT.

1. Letters of enquiry should be accompanied by the Public Work and Women's Employment Coupon, which will be found in the advertisement pages. The coupon must be duly filled up, and the letter be addressed to the Public Work and Women's Employment Editor, Queen Office, Bream's Buildings, London, E.C.

2. The Editor does not undertake to forward letters from one correspondent to another, but will endeavour to do so when the letter to be forwarded is sufficiently stamped, bears the pseudonym or initials of the addressee, and is enclosed under a separate cover addressed to the Public Work and Women's Employment Editor. Letters cannot be forwarded when more than a fortnight has elapsed since the publication of the Queen containing the pseudonym or initials of the addressee. An exception to this rule is only made on behalf of correspondents living at places more than a week's journey by post from London.

3. The Editor of this department does not send addresses or engage (save under circumstances which the Editor may deem exceptional) in private correspondence.

4. Difficulties which may be solved by advertising cannot be dealt with. The Editor, however, will gladly advise in all other matters connected with the subject in which guidance may be desired—such, e.g., as general education, special profession or technical training, conditions of tuition, and apprenticeship, openings for particular kinds of work, and where and how to set up in business.

5. Correspondents who forward trustworthy information respecting opportunities for women's public and voluntary work or remunerative employment will confer a benefit upon applicants to this department, for which the Editor will be much obliged.

TO CORRESPONDENTS.

Co. Cork.—Domestic service.—If you know of no good servants' registry or Labour Exchange in your part of Ireland, we would recommend you to apply to the Young Women's Christian Association, 3, Sidney-place, Cork; the Y.W.C.A. Employment Agency and Home, 22, Ely-place, Dublin; or the Girls' Friendly Society, 18, Dyke-parade, Cork. Owing to the war the demand for domestic servants in England is considerably lessened, and we think you had better seek a first place in Ireland, and so gain the experience which would help you later.

Mrs P.—Knitting machine.—We are sure that our former enquirer, "L. S. D.," will be very much obliged for the information you kindly give us. We note that you received a communication from the Automatic Knitting Machine Company some months ago, in which they stated that their address was 57, Blackett-street, Newcastle-on-Tyne. You mention that you have one of the automatic machines yourself, and that you so thoroughly understand the working of it that you feel able to give lessons to anyone in it, and could help our correspondent to put her machine together. As you live on the south coast and "L. S. D." wrote from Oxfordshire, it seems as though a meeting might possibly be arranged. Anyhow, we shall be happy to forward correspondence if postage is prepaid.

G T. S.—Employment wanted.—We do not undertake employment registry work, but are always pleased to advise correspondents on the choice of an occupation and the most appropriate training for it. Enquirers should enclose a coupon for this department when writing. Your strongest qualification appears to be a knowledge of modern languages. If to this you could add a good training in shorthand, typing, and secretarial work, you might later be able to get a post in the office of some firm or society. The present is, of course, an unpropitious moment for earning money, but the time should be utilised in getting such a thorough business training as would enable you to secure a well-paid post when better times come. If you speak French very well it is just possible that you might be of service to one of the Belgian hospitality committies which are working in some of the chief towns of Great Britain. But the securing of such employment depends much on acquaintanceship with the persons who are running the committees.

H. M. W.—Advertising.—In London a few women act as advertisement agents, working on their own account. Others (and perhaps a larger number) do subordinate advertisement work as the employees of certain firms of publishers. The publishers in question take over all the business in connection with the production of periodicals and magazines other than the literary and editorial work. They do the printing (or get it done), and they receive the advertisements, help advertisers to have them attractively displayed, and so forth. It is in this advertisement collecting and displaying that the talents of women are sometimes employed. A woman with natural commercial ability, who is clever in the handling and treatment of advertisements, is often very valuable to a publishing firm. She helps her employers to get more business, such as the publication of illustrated catalogues, many of which are, of course, beautifully and elaborately produced. In these and many other varieties of advertisement work there are certainly considerable opportunities for women with talents of the right order. A good training in shorthand, typewriting, and office work, added to a fairly good education of the "extensve" rather than "intensive" character is the best preparation for this sort of occupation. It is work in which natural quickness and observation of ordinary human nature tell more than book learning. If you wish we could put you in communication with the Association of Advertising Women, a body which has been formed of late to promote the interests of women engaged in the business.

MOSTLY WOMEN.

By MRS MARGARET HEITLAND.

WE ARE ALL HOLDING OUR BREATH, waiting for what is to happen. We wait for to-morrow's news. We wait to see the great, decisive change of events which next week must certainly bring. We busy ourselves, while we wait, with the duties that seem to us to be the most manifest, the most pressing. And so the winter is going by. We are making no great plans for the years ahead.

While we work we might be thinking. Mothers of daughters, in particular, should think. Contrary to the impression which is conveyed to us by almost everything that is printed or said, the majority of the population of the United Kingdom is female. We are mostly women now. A minute of horrible tragedy such as that of the Bulwark makes the truth still more lamentably clear. The heroes among our men are going. Thousands of women must carry on the business of the world alone.

For those women who are now young, and many of whom will in all probability live to a very great age, it is surely worth while to plan with considerable forethought. The objection that marriage may make the expenditure of time and money on training not worth while is now pretty generally seen to have little weight. Fathers whose sons have interrupted profitable careers to volunteer for military service might say that the money they had spent on training had been wasted. But they are not in the least likely to say anything of the sort. They not only feel that a sacrifice is valuable in proportion to its magnitude, but that the trained and able man is more useful for military service and for any other kind of work than the man whose capacities have never been developed. Rather differently applied, the same truth is valid in the case of women. The sacrificial element ought not to be so much emphasised, for if a marriage is a great sacrifice it is almost certainly a great failure. But the other side of the truth—the value of professional training for life of any kind, married or single—is equally applicable.

So that even now, amidst the clash and uncertainties of war, parents ought to be taking long views with regard to the shaping of their daughters' future lives. At present they are very busy taking short views and I am for [illegible] public bodies quite as much as it now is the preoccupation of individuals, there will be a demand for the services of trained medical women to look after the health of women and children. Here the war does not complicate matters by creating the appearance of a demand which may be really only transient. The demand is there, and all the tendencies of public affairs prove that it must increase. There cannot, then, be a doubt that the most promising profession for which a girl can now be trained is that of medicine. She needs, of course, to be the right kind of girl. She must have a good deal of solid ability, a pleasant, sympathetic manner, and steady, even temper and health. With these and a genuine interest in the mysteries of natural science, she is well worth the expenditure of £1000 or perhaps £2000 on her medical training and equipment. Once fairly started, she is started for life; she can always gain her living, and each year of practice makes her position better.

In the regulations and conditions of the nursing profession some changes are, I think, urgently needed. The number of trained nurses is insufficient at all times, and terribly inadequate now. For the past ten years many hospitals have experienced a difficulty in getting probationers of the educated upper middle class. They put obstacles in their own way by making the age of entry as high as twenty-three or twenty-four, by the extreme lowness of the remuneration for fully-trained nurses and sisters, and by the depressing prospects which they offer to women when past middle age. Educated girls who wish to take to nursing have to "muddle through" the years from eighteen to twenty-three as best they can, or give up the idea of entering a general hospital and take training in an infirmary. The latter plan is now being followed by many who find that they can get an excellent training in some of the big London and provincial infirmaries, and can start upon the course at the age of twenty-one. But the supply of trained nurses of the best stamp would be very much larger if the terms offered to trained women were more adequate and the entry of women at an earlier age were facilitated. Also young women in provincial towns of 50,000 to 70,000 inhabitants would often take infirmary training were it not that these towns are frequently unable to give it, having no resident infirmary medical officer.

Speaking generally, all the branches of health service, but especially the medical and nursing professions, offer good chances for women, and there is little excuse for parents who neglect their daughters' opportunities.

The demand for women as elementary teachers was cogently put by a writer in the Queen last week. In London the opportunities are interesting and good; but in some parts of the country the salaries and increments offered are so inadequate for the laborious character of the work that the entry of women into the profession has been checked. Here, again, the country will in the immediate future find itself obliged to rely much more than formerly on the services of women, and to get those services of the highest quality it must pay for them.

When social legislation becomes possible after the war, an extension of unemployment insurance is one of the objects for which women would do well to press. Large numbers of girls at present are employed nominally as extra hands, in order that their dismissal at any moment may not look to the general public to be so great an hardship as it actually is. They may be employed for many months together at a regular wage; and then, when business slackens—possibly in mid-winter—they are suddenly thrown back upon the hands of parents who are probably specially pinched at the moment. It is idle to assert that such girls ought to put by in their times of moderate prosperity. Among the very poor there are no times when the expenditure of money may not seem to be a more urgent family duty than putting into the Post Office Savings Bank; and if provision is to be made for the periods of seasonal dismissal (which in some businesses are of regular yearly occurrence) such provision must be made compulsorily. At present women are the worst sufferers from seasonal conditions of trade; their labour is used as the extra margin of productive power, to be utilised or discarded as circumstances direct. But this discarded women's labour becomes the cause of endless social and economic troubles. Girls in seasonal trades need to have several trades if they are to support themselves all the year round. Probably they cannot become very highly skilled in any. There are gaps of time between leaving one job and finding another. Then there are difficulties in moving about the country to follow the demand for workers. As yet there are few working-women's hostels, though where such institutions do exist their value is soon proved. Only the other day a number of out-of-work girls, unemployed from war causes, were enabled to take well-paid work at Leeds in the making of khaki uniforms (work, by the way, which was utterly strange to them), and were not afraid to leave their homes and go to the North because in Leeds there is a hostel where they could stay. If other towns would help to counteract the difficulties of mobilisation by establishing hostels—preferably several small ones in different parts of each town—a long step would have been taken towards improving the industrial condition of women. In localities where women are ill paid people complain of the want of ambition displayed by the hapless female workers. But what is the use of cherishing ambition when there is no goal towards which ambition may strive? If, however, a girl knew that in some distant town there was not only well-paid work for her, but that she would find a working-women's hostel open to her, and the companionship of young people like herself, mobilisation would have no fears for her. But at present she feels tied to her parents' home by the poorness of her wage, and she is paid a poor wage because she isis half-dependent on her family. Her ignorance and poverty make her shy of moving, and she is kept poor because she dare not move.

These double-locked arguments appear at first as though they could never be unlocked. But if bits of the lock are unscrewed, the whole may easily come to pieces. This is certainly the case with the arguments which state that women must not be put to a good profession because they may marry or because they ought to be induced to marry, and must not be paid a good wage because they can live in their parents' home or because they ought to be compelled to live in that home. Give the good professional training, offer the decent wage, and show the way to earn it, and all the old argumentation crumbles away, and nobody troubles to pick up the pieces.

A MODEL WOMEN'S LODGING HOUSE.

War, which stimulates trade in some parts of the country and depresses it in others, has suddenly emphasised the need for homes for women and girls who have to move about in search of work. But while the women in many places are only now realising this need, the women of the Hull branch of the National Union of Women Workers, with the active cooperation of members of the local branch of the National Union of Women's Suffrage Societies, have been busily meeting the need. They have in a brief year left no stone unturned until [illegible] expenses. The execution of the whole project was rendered possible by the generosity of a committee member who purchased the property on the understanding that it should be transferred to the National Union of Women Workers as soon as the money had been raised. The home offers working women of the poorer class a night's lodging for 4d. or 6d. There are thirty beds. Lodgers can cook their own meals in the large kitchen, and there is a comfortable general sitting-room. The women further have the use of a good wash-house, supplied with hot and cold water, and a drying cupboard, and can have a locker for their clothes by paying a small sum on deposit. The president of the committee is Dr Mary Murdoch, and Mrs F. Richardson is the treasurer. Visitors to Hull will like to inspect the house with a view to the establishment of similar homes in towns which are as yet unprovided.

An Interesting Suggestion.

A correspondent, writing over the pseudonym "Flegg Hundred," offers a suggestion which she thinks might be utilised for the benefit of our soldiers at the front, and of the poor women in workrooms now employed in making comforts for them.

"It is clear," says this lady, "that our soldiers want something that keeps out the cold winds and wet, as wool alone does not. Fur and leather are too dear. But my Swiss governess tells me that her brothers in the Swiss army wore under their great-coats a garment with sleeves made of American cloth (toile cirée) and lined with flannel. This was light, warm, water and wind proof. I know that American cloth, if rubbed with beeswax, keeps waterproof a long time, even when roughly handled. I think these coats were always worn under something else, so that the American cloth did not get rubbed or cut too quickly. If a competent person would design such a garment, I think it could be easily and cheaply copied, and might be a great boon, but it ought to be on the market at once. The idea may be worthless, but I send it with the best intentions."

The only comment we have to make is that the American cloth ought to be well ventilated in those parts of the coat where rain and wind are least likely to penetrate, otherwise, like leather, it would be injurious from its extreme imperviousness to air, but the suggestion in itself appears to us to be capable of being turned to very good account.

RULES FOR THIS DEPARTMENT.

1. Letters of enquiry should be accompanied by the Public Work and Women's Employment Coupon, which will be found in the advertisement pages. The coupon must be duly filled up, and the letter be addressed to the Public Work and Women's Employment Editor, Queen Office, Bream's Buildings, London, E.C.

2. The Editor does not undertake to forward letters from one correspondent to another, but will endeavour to do so when the letter to be forwarded is sufficiently stamped, bears the pseudonym or initials of the addressee, and is enclosed under a separate cover addressed to the Public Work and Women's Employment Editor. Letters cannot be forwarded when more than a fortnight has elapsed since the publication of the Queen containing the pseudonym or initials of the addressee. An exception to this rule is only made on behalf of correspondents living at places more than a week's journey by post from London.

3. The Editor of this department does not send addresses or engage (save under circumstances which the Editor may deem exceptional) in private correspondence.

4. Difficulties which may be solved by advertising cannot be dealt with. The Editor, however, will gladly advise in all other matters connected with the subject in which guidance may be desired—such, e.g., as general education, special profession or technical training, conditions of tuition, and apprenticeship, openings for particular kinds of work, and where and how to set up in business.

5. Correspondents who forward trustworthy information respecting opportunities for women's public and voluntary work or remunerative employment will confer a benefit upon applicants to this department, for which the Editor will be much obliged.

TO CORRESPONDENTS.

Co. Cork.—Domestic service.—If you know of no good servants' registry or Labour Exchange in your part of Ireland, we would recommend you to apply to the Young Women's Christian Association, 3, Sidney-place, Cork; the Y.W.C.A. Employment Agency and Home, 22, Ely-place, Dublin; or the Girls' Friendly Society, 18, Dyke-parade, Cork. Owing to the war the demand for domestic servants in England is considerably lessened, and we think you had better seek a first place in Ireland, and so gain the experience which would help you later.

Mrs P.—Knitting machine.—We are sure that our former enquirer, "L. S. D.," will be very much obliged for the information you kindly give us. We note that you received a communication from the Automatic Knitting Machine Company some months ago, in which they stated that their address was 57, Blackett-street, Newcastle-on-Tyne. You mention that you have one of the automatic machines yourself, and that you so thoroughly understand the working of it that you feel able to give lessons to anyone in it, and could help our correspondent to put her machine together. As you live on the south coast and "L. S. D." wrote from Oxfordshire, it seems as though a meeting might possibly be arranged. Anyhow, we shall be happy to forward correspondence if postage is prepaid.

G T. S.—Employment wanted.—We do not undertake employment registry work, but are always pleased to advise correspondents on the choice of an occupation and the most appropriate training for it. Enquirers should enclose a coupon for this department when writing. Your strongest qualification appears to be a knowledge of modern languages. If to this you could add a good training in shorthand, typing, and secretarial work, you might later be able to get a post in the office of some firm or society. The present is, of course, an unpropitious moment for earning money, but the time should be utilised in getting such a thorough business training as would enable you to secure a well-paid post when better times come. If you speak French very well it is just possible that you might be of service to one of the Belgian hospitality committies which are working in some of the chief towns of Great Britain. But the securing of such employment depends much on acquaintanceship with the persons who are running the committees.

H. M. W.—Advertising.—In London a few women act as advertisement agents, working on their own account. Others (and perhaps a larger number) do subordinate advertisement work as the employees of certain firms of publishers. The publishers in question take over all the business in connection with the production of periodicals and magazines other than the literary and editorial work. They do the printing (or get it done), and they receive the advertisements, help advertisers to have them attractively displayed, and so forth It is in this advertisement collecting and displaying that the talents of women are sometimes employed. A woman with natural commercial ability, who is clever in the handling and treatment of advertisements, is often very valuable to a publishing firm. She helps her employers to get more business, such as the publication of illustrated catalogues, many of which are, of course, beautifully and elaborately produced. In these and many other varieties of advertisement work there are certainly considerable opportunities for women with talents of the right order. A good training in shorthand, typewriting, and office work, added to a fairly good education of the "extensve" rather than "intensive" character is the best preparation for this sort of occupation. It is work in which natural quickness and observation of ordinary human nature tell more than book learning. If you wish we could put you in communication with the Association of Advertising Women, a body which has been formed of late to promote the interests of women engaged in the business.

MOSTLY WOMEN.

By MRS MARGARET HEITLAND.

WE ARE ALL HOLDING OUR BREATH, waiting for what is to happen. We wait for to-morrow's news. We wait to see the great, decisive change of events which next week must certainly bring. We busy ourselves, while we wait, with the duties that seem to us to be the most manifest, the most pressing. And so the winter is going by. We are making no great plans for the years ahead.

While we work we might be thinking. Mothers of daughters, in particular, should think. Contrary to the impression which is conveyed to us by almost everything that is printed or said, the majority of the population of the United Kingdom is female. We are mostly women now. A minute of horrible tragedy such as that of the Bulwark makes the truth still more lamentably clear. The heroes among our men are going. Thousands of women must carry on the business of the world alone.

For those women who are now young, and many of whom will in all probability live to a very great age, it is surely worth while to plan with considerable forethought. The objection that marriage may make the expenditure of time and money on training not worth while is now pretty generally seen to have little weight. Fathers whose sons have interrupted profitable careers to volunteer for military service might say that the money they had spent on training had been wasted. But they are not in the least likely to say anything of the sort. They not only feel that a sacrifice is valuable in proportion to its magnitude, but that the trained and able man is more useful for military service and for any other kind of work than the man whose capacities have never been developed. Rather differently applied, the some truth is valid in the case of women. The sacrificial element ought not to be so much emphasised, for if a marriage is a great sacrifice it is almost certainly a great failure. But the other side of the truth the value of professional training for life of any kind, married or single is equally applicable.

So that even now, amidst the clash and uncertainties of war, parents ought to be taking long views with regard to the shaping of their daughters' future lives. At present they are very busy taking short views; and I am far from saying that some of the short programmes may not serve as introductions to larger schemes. The courses of training which girls are taking in ambulance work and first aid are undoubtedly giving just the preliminary insight into medical and nursing work which will draw the pupils later into one or other of these professions. In medicine there are many present gaps as well as future opportunities. More and more, as the care of the nation's health becomes the care of transient. The demand is there, and all the tendencies of public affairs prove that it must increase. There cannot, then, be a doubt that the most promising profession for which a girl can now be trained is that of medicine. She needs, of course, to be the right kind of girl. She must have a good deal of solid ability, a pleasant, sympathetic manner, and steady, even temper and health. With these and a genuine interest in the mysteries of natural science, she is well worth the expenditure of £1000 or perhaps £2000 on her medical training and equipment. Once fairly started, she is started for life; she can always gain her living, and each year of practice makes her position better.

In the regulations and conditions of the nursing profession some changes are, I think, urgently needed. The number of trained nurses is insufficient at all times, and terribly inadequate now. For the past ten years many hospitals have experienced a difficulty in getting probationers of the educated upper middle class. They put obstacles in their own way by making the age of entry as high as twenty-three or twenty-four, by the extreme lowness of the remuneration for fully-trained nurses and sisters, and by the depressing prospects which they offer to women when past middle age. Educated girls who wish to take to nursing have to "muddle through" the years from eighteen to twenty-three as best they can, or give up the idea of entering a general hospital and take training in an infirmary. The latter plan is now being followed by many who find that they can get an excellent training in some of the big London and provincial infirmaries, and can start upon the course at the age of twenty-one. But the supply of trained nurses of the best stamp would be very much larger if the terms offered to trained women were more adequate and the entry of women at an earlier age were facilitated. Also young women in provincial towns of 50,000 to 70,000 inhabitants would often take infirmary training were it not that these towns are frequently unable to give it, having no resident infirmary medical officer.

Speaking generally, all the branches of health service, but especially the medical and nursing professions, offer good chances for women, and there is little excuse for parents who neglect their daughters' opportunities.

The demand for women as elementary teachers was cogently put by a writer in the Queen last week. In London the opportunities are interesting and good; but in some parts of the country the salaries and increments offered are so inadequate for the laborious character of the work that the entry of women into the profession has been checked. They have in a literal sense left no stone unturned until at 72, Lister-street, Hessle-road, Hull, there stands to-day an excellent lodging house for women. They determined to start it free of debt, and they accomplished their object, as people generally do when they have made up their mind. With the aid of some big donations from Sir James and Lady Reckitt, the Right Hon. T. H. Ferens and Mrs Ferens, and Mr Joseph Rank, and contributions from many of the men and women closely associated with public movements in Hull, a sum of £850 was raised, which enabled the committee to take the house, alter, and furnish it, and start with £100 towards the first year's working their own meals in the large kitchen, and there is a comfortable general sitting-room. The women further have the use of a good wash-house, supplied with hot and cold water, and a drying cupboard, and can have a locker for their clothes by paying a small sum on deposit. A PLEA ON BEHALF OF WORK-WOMEN.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE "EXPRESS"

SIR,—I should like to make an earnest appeal through your influential paper to the many ladies who are employing workwomen to make shirts, clothes, &c., for our soldiers and sailors and the Belgian Refugees, that they do pay these women at a fair and proper rate. I know that many of these ladies are giving freely and generously of their money and of their time in many directions, and I think the hardship and unfairness that I want to draw attention to is often the result of ignorance, want of imagination, and of a feeling that as it is "charity work" it ought to be done for less than other work; but why? Is the poor workwoman to be compelled to give in charity what she can ill afford? It is useless to say she could refuse to do it. She cannot get better paid work for the asking, and, as there is no trade union among these home workers, if one refuses another will take the work, perhaps even for less, if she is very badly off. Then, too, there always comes in this fact—which does not occur among menworkers — the competition of the woman whose sewing is her sole livelihood and the woman who only works to make a little pocket money, or to supplement a husband's wages. I have lately come across cases in which 1s. each is paid for the entire making and cutting out of women's night dresses, and this because they were to be given away in charity, which simply means that the poor woman is helping the lady with 6d. or 1s. on each garment, for which "gift" she gets no credit—on the contrary, she has to sit up half the night working to earn barely sufficient to keep body and soul together. Another woman (not in London), I hear, is being paid 7½d. each for soldiers' shirts (cut out). Even 10d. or 1s. for the entire making of a shirt is a starvation wage. Is not this sweating in its worst form? And much of it just now is done in the cause of charity. I fear we women are the worst offenders; but, after all, the matter is in our hands and needs no committees or associations or Acts of Parliament to rectify. Can we not see to it that at any rate when we give out charity work we do not under-pay and lower the wages of poor workwomen and small dressmakers, especially just now, when food is going up in price and everything is more expensive? I appeal, therefore, to the many well-to-do ladies who employ these women to consider this point and at least to pay them a fair wage, even if it means giving away fewer garments.—Yours, &c.,

Unemployed Girls.

Some tentative and reluctant criticism is being offered in relation to some of the entirely well-meant schemes which have been adopted for the provision of work for unemployed women and girls. One of the latest, and on the face of it one of the most admirable, schemes is one which deals with the case of girls under 16 years of age who have lost their work. In many such cases the work is not permanently lost, and the present need is to find some substitute for it. Technical training in the girl's own trade, where it is a skilled trade, is a good way of filling up the gap. The proposal to provide such training or instruction in other useful arts and a weekly allowance for maintenance is excellent from the point of view of the girls. It is pointed out that there is a danger, however, of giving people who are unemployed opportunities which are actually larger than those which present themselves to people who are working regularly in the ordinary way. It may be hoped that since the scheme is being helped by the Board of Education—who recommend education authorities to remit fees for the classes—the risk of such defects should be guarded against. A rather similar defect has shown itself in relation to the public workrooms. In many districts money earned in the workrooms has not been reckoned as part of the income of the household to which the woman belongs, and there has been no reduction in grants from the Relief Fund on account of it. It would seem to be quite proper to count it as income, and it should be easy to stipulate that applicants for relief should show that they have been unable to get work either in the regular way or in the workrooms.

Twickenham Employment Bureau.

AN APPEAL FOR ORDERS.

An opportunity will again be given to view the useful work being done by the women employed by the Twickenham Employment Bureau. Through the interest taken by Mr. Thomas the garments will be on view in his shop window during the early part of the week previous to their being dispatched to H.M.S. Black Prince, which has been recalled from warm waters, and whose crew are in need of comforts.

Miss Griffiths appeals to those who are intending to send presents to our soldiers and sailors for Christmas to place their orders with the Employment Bureau, thereby securing a double purpose, and enabling more women to obtain employment. The garments will be found well made, of good material, and moderate in price.

Those who have any spare bits of felt, carpet, thick serge, or any old blind curtains, no matter how small, are asked to send them to the Employment Bureau at the Town Hall. They are urgently needed for making slippers for our sick and wounded soldiers in hospitals. Also pieces of waterproof for making seats for the soldiers in the trenches. Gifts of mittens, socks, belts, gloves, scarves, and surgical bed-jackets have been gratefully received by Miss Griffiths, Mrs. E. Huntingford, Mrs. E. Rogers, Miss May Saunders, Miss Buckle, Miss Lorraine, and Miss Phyllis Lewis.

THE GLASS TRADE.

SHORTAGE OF LABOUR AT ST. HELENS

"WAR-BONUS" FOR WORKPEOPLE

Referring to our article a few days ago on the general position of the glass trade, a St. Helens correspondent writes:—Among those trades which have received distinct benefit from the war is the glassmaking industry. Owing to foreign competition in the past, and especially to scientific "dumping" on the part of competitors in Protectionist countries, the British makers of glass have been sadly reduced in number. One of the principal, if not actually the foremost, strongholds of the industry is St. Helens, Lancashire, where Messrs. Pilkington Bros. employ many thousands of hands in making plate and sheet glass, and where there are also several substantial firms engaged in the manufacture of bottles, &c. St. Helens has for years found fairly steady employment in glass manufacture, but the war has now produced there an unprecedented boom. The cost of glass has gone up in some cases about 50 per cent., if not more, and large stocks in extensive warehouses are being quickly depleted. The men in Messrs. Pilkington's employ are receiving an addition of 2s. a week in their wages, while women, girls, and boys are getting 1s. extra, as also are the labourers. This is described by the firm as a war bonus.

There is a considerable shortage of both skilled and unskilled labour in the town, due in part, no doubt, to the fact that so many men have gone to the war. At one time there used to be in St. Helens a not inconsiderable flint glass trade, but this is practically non-existent, and notwithstanding that there is now no German competition for the time being, there seems to be no local tendency to take advantage of the situation. Considering the enormous trade in lamp glasses, chimneys, &c., done by Germany and Austria, in this country, this seems singular. A local gentleman with intimate knowledge of the subject, however, informed the writer that the fault lay with the trade unions, who would not allow flint glass to be made in moulds. Until this restriction was removed, it was hopeless to rehabilitate the industry to any great extent.

Blackburn Weekly Telegraph
Dec 5th. 1914.

The current number of "Women's Employment" has much that is of interest to girls seeking guidance as to future work. Miss Fox, the matron of the Prince of Wales's Hospital at Tottenham, writing on "Institutional Housekeeping," shows that hospitals offer a wide field of most useful work to good housekeepers, and she mentions as two of the most essential qualifications towards success "adaptability and training." With hospitals springing up all round us, the domesticated woman will do well to consider the suitability of this employment, for good salaries are apparently to be obtained by the right kind of worker.

In the course of an interesting address in Oxford in connection with the information bureau for girls educated in secondary schools, Mrs W. L. Courtney emphasised the necessity for trying to fix early the choice of a career for girls—as early as 18 or 14, if possible. Otherwise, if the decision were too long delayed, girls drifted into a profession or calling not because it was suitable for them, but because they could not think of anything else. The present, Mrs Courtney proceeded, had been a testing time for the work of women. It had shown what work was necessary and what work was superfluous. Literature and journalism did not furnish favourable openings. The work which women did for newspapers tumbled to the ground at once during a crisis. On the other hand the public service, especially in reference to inspectors, was much more promising, and it was work in which they were likely to succeed. Nursing also was strongly recommended. In the largest of all occupations for women—clerical and secretarial work—there was great need for specific training and real competence.

It is quite true, as Mrs Courtney said, that journalistic literature, or literary journalism, is liable to tumble to the ground in certain circumstances—such as the present war, for instance. Many women, as well as men, are feeling its ill-effects and wishing that they had embarked upon a calling less sensitive to national alarms. But all women cannot be inspectors and nurses, thank goodness, and since risks have to be taken, journalism and literature counts women in its ranks. The prizes are few and the disappointments and discouragements many; and to brave these and keep pegging away requires both courage and enthusiasm.

Unemployment Among Women.

The scheme for dealing with the very extensive unemployment among London women is now complete, and I learn at St. Bride's Institute that there is no doubt about the number of applications for help being quite up to the capacity of the committee. The details have been worked out by the City of London Committee of the Prince of Wales's Fund, and the Government Committee has now approved them and granted the necessary funds. When the training centres are opened, in the course of the next ten days, there will be a considerable number of unemployed women under training, and it will no doubt be found necessary to extend the scope of the movement in time. The subjects taken range from dressmaking to shorthand and typewriting, but I understand that a special feature of the work will be the training of "home helpers." The question of payment has been very carefully considered. The centres are open only to women thrown out of employment by the war, and the committee felt that they must be regarded as relief agencies and not employment in the ordinary sense. It has been decided, therefore, that ten shillings a week shall be maximum amount paid. The women going commercial training will sum every week, and [illegible] to be paid [illegible] maxim[illegible]

UNEMPLOYED STEPNEY WOMEN.

In the current issue of "The Toynbee Record" appears a very striking article by Eldred F. Hitchcock on "Uemployment amongst women in Stepney." In the course of this the writer remarks "It has been shown that the economic dislocation owing to the war has caused in London a much larger amount of unemployment amongst women than amongst men. The effect has probably been felt more in Stepney than in any other London Borough. It may, therefore, be of interest to consider the nature and extent of the problem in the Borough of Stepney and the methods adopted to deal with it.

"In the first place it should be noted that over one-third of the women-workers living in Stepney are normally occupied in of various kinds. If dislocation occurs in these occupations, 15,300 women are likely to be affected in addition to 16,500 men.

"Wholesale bespoke, ready-made, and export work is machined by power machinery in the factories of wholesalers, or contracted out to small East End employers who in most cases are too poor to employ power or machinery to any great extent. Both large and small employers give the work out to be "finished" by women who work in their own homes. The total number of homeworkers engaged in tailoring in Stepney is about 4,000.

The better-class tailoring is mostly done in private workshops in connection with retail shops and some small amount of homework is given out.

"Military tailoring (at any rate the coats) is a specialised branch of the trade, and of the hundreds of ordinary small tailoring employers in East London, known as sub-contractors, probably not more than half-a-dozen care to undertake this work.

"At the commencement of the war, the

PUBLIC BEGAN TO ECONOMISE

and consequently wholesale bespoke and better-class bespoke orders diminished considerably. The export trade was to a large extent discontinued and wholesalers found little inducement to manufacture for stock. Hence during the first weeks of the war unemployment figures in the tailoring trade commenced to rise, and for a period trade went from bad to worse. At this time there was very little work at the docks and wharves, and this factor, together with the effects upon carmen of the commandeering of horses for military purposes, caused much distress amongst transport workers. The wives of many of these men were employed as tailoresses or in jam and preserve factories in the district, which, owing to the shortage of sugar, were compelled to put their workers on short time or to close down altogether. Some employers sold out their stocks of sugar when the price was very high, with the result they netted a considerable profit themselves and discharged their employees. Other firms, especially the larger ones, retained all their sugar stocks and deliberately put their workpeople on short time in order to spread employment over as long a period as possible. Since then the sugar stocks in the country have been augmented, and employment in this trade, though still below the normal, is somewhat better. The temporary coincidence of unemployment in tailoring, jam preserving, and transport caused chronic and widespread distress during August. Luxury trades and such trades as millinery and ladies' and children's fancy boot and shoe making soon began to decline, and generally at the beginning of the war was extremely serious, both for men and women.

THE ECONOMIC OUTLOOK FOR STEPNEY

"The general distress was unhappily augmented by the unfortunate fact that for several weeks at the commencement of the war many wives of soldiers received no allowance. The seriousness of this state of affairs was by no means minimised when later they were presented with comparatively large sums of gold.

"From about the third week of the war tailoring began to revive. Employment in the tailoring trade, from being very slack, became extremely brisk, especially in factories. It must for a few weeks as learners on power machines, paying them during the learning period 10s. a week, and then engaging them as ordinary employees on piece rates.

"It is a mistake to regard the workroom as a permanent institution or to judge it by the normal tests applied to ordinary industrial concerns.

"The wage given—3d. an hour—is purposely fixed at a low figure, so that the women may not be tempted to stay on at the workroom rather than seek regular employment. Already cases have occured where women have refused other employment at higher wages, preferring the gentle discipline and congenial surroundings of the workroom. The wages are paid and the material supplied from the Queen's Work for Women Fund, and no attempt is made to compete with ordinary industry. The garments made are distributed freely through such agencies as the East End Lying-In Hospital to poor people who would otherwise be unable to obtain them. They are stamped before distribution, to prevent their being disposed of to pawnbrokers.

"The workroom relieves women workers who from causes just as much outside their own control as of ours are unable to obtain work .

ITS INFLUENCE IS EDUCATIVE,

both in as far as it gives definite training, and also in that it is felt in those things, incalculable though fundamental upon which the care and cheeriness of a home depend. The vases of flowers which it is the pride of some of the women to arrange on the diningroom tables each day are symbolic.

The total accommodation of the workroom is 200. Since its opening 245 women have been given work. Up to November 10th, 68 had obtained regular work and 12 had left from other causes.

During the first few months of the war, unemployment amongst girls from 14 to 16 years of age was considerable. The normal earnings of these girls are 3s. to 4s. per week or less as apprentices, and because of this it was difficult to fit them into the experimental workroom scheme. For other reasons also it was felt undesirable for them to work with adult women in the workroom. Several private efforts were made to cope with the problem, though nothing of an official nature was attempted. At one point the problem, presenting as it does peculiar aspects, assumed somewhat alarming proportions. Meanwhile, the Local Representation Committee of the Prince of Wales' Fund, realising the seriousness of the question decided to increase up to 4s. the relief given to girls under 16 who attended certain "instructional centres" which had been established by private individuals and were already dying for want of funds. Happily, however, trade became very much better during the third month of the war, and employers regained confidence, and the majority of girls soon regained employment. The headmistress of a large school in Mile End recently questioned her girls as to how many of their elder sisters under 16 years of age were unemployed. Out of 350 families, only eight girls, mostly high-class dressmakers, were apparently out of work. The experience of the After Care Committees seems to confirm this state of things.

"Much doubt exists in the minds of a number of people as to whether the Prince of Wales' and Queen Mary's Funds should be used for aliens. Anyone knowing Stepney realises that thousands of the majority Russian Poles, have not taken out naturalisation papers, having always regarded them as expensive luxuries. Many of these people have lived here for many years, secure in the sense of freedom and liberty often denied to them in their own country. Only lawyers could regard them as aliens, and no scheme for the relief of distress in Stepney is adequate which excludes them by some rigidly worded definition. The Jewish Board of Guardians does excellent work, but it cannot be expected to deal with every marginal case which arises, and these are frequent. The Jewish Society for the protection of Women and Girls has particularly cared for the protection of alien girls. At first the Society admitted any unemployed single women to its workroom, and during the first weeks of the war its rooms were inconveniently crowded. Since then it has taken in only alien girls, but during the last few weeks many of them have found work, and the problem is assuming smaller proportions.

"Besides the official workroom, 14 others have been opened, all run on a voluntary basis. Four of them give work out to homeworkers. Three are for girls under 16 years of age. One admits only wives of soldiers and sailors and is more in the nature of a club. Two deal solely with Jewesses, alien and refugee women and girls, and the others admit as far as possible any women who is in distress. Two of the

Helping Young Girls.

EXCELLENT WORK OF THE CLAPHAM TRAINING COLLEGE.

Among the efforts made by women to do some useful work at this time of stress and difficulty, one deserving special mention was represented last Friday evening at a concert given at the Broomwood Secondary School.

When war was declared in August, the students and friends of the L.C.C. Clapham Day Training College, Cedars Road, considering what they could do to help things along, found an outlet for their energy in helping some of the working girls in Battersea. They discovered, on inquiry at the Labour Exchange, that there were some 300 young girl workers on the register wanting employment. The question thus presented itself: Can anything be done to remedy this state of things? An attempt was made to find employment for some of these girls as domestic helpers, or "daily girls," as they are called. The results have more than justified the experiment. No fewer than 102 girls have been found employment as daily girls. Twelve of that number have become "living in" servants.

The Principal of the College, Miss Brackenbury, M.A., on behalf of the students and friends, put these facts before the audience on Friday evening, and appealed for help, that this good work might continue. Miss Brackenbury, who was addressing an audience largely composed of women, prefaced a speech of much lucidity, sound sense, and womanly sympathy, by remarking that there were two professions which were open to women in which, so long as they could work, they could continue to live decently and earn their livelihood. One was the great profession of teaching, and the other the equally important vocation of domestic service. They had taken up the work of helping young girls in Battersea, in the belief that they were helping them to help themselves in a practical, enduring way. They had found the work strenuous and difficult. It had been necessary, in some cases, to provide clothing for the girls. All this had been done by the students and friends. The labour and correspondence in getting the girls placed was considerable. Sometimes it became necessary to place the same girl two or three times over. The ages of the girls ranged from 14 to 16, and the wages from 2s. 6d. per week. Miss Brackenbury pleaded with any who might take one of these girls into her household to exercise patience, forbearance, and sympathy. It was the intention of the College friends to continue this work till next March, the time of the removal of the College to its new home at Furzedown. But whether or not it became permanent, they all wished to see the good work grow for the present. They had every reason to feel glad that this work had come their way. She felt that the profession of domestic service was one that was worth taking trouble over, and [illegible] to raise it to a higher level of respect. She wished very much that any woman wanting a girl would apply to the College, where Miss Russell, the hon. secretary of the scheme, would be glad to arrange interviews with employers and girls. She would remind the former that they might, if they were lucky, find treasures. Those who found themselves face to face with the task of training a young girl, she hoped would be rewarded by eventually securing a good and faithful servant. Miss Brackenbury, continuing, explained that so desirous were the College students and friends of helping this good work that the whole cost of the evening's entertainment would be met by them. The entire proceeds, secured by the sale of programmes at 6d. each, would go to the funds.

The concert was given by present and past students of the College. It provided a most enjoyable evening for a large and appreciative audience, and consisted of songs, dances, trios, and quartettes. Miss Obray, an old student, gained much popularity with her violin solos; Miss Bird and Miss Davies divided honours for some excellent singing, and Miss Wilcockson was a sympathetic accompanist. The patriotic event ended with the singing of the National Anthem.

was extremely serious, both for men and women.

"The general distress was unhappily augmented by the unfortunate fact that for several weeks at the commencement of the war many wives of soldiers received no allowance. The seriousness of this state of affairs was by no means minimised when later they were presented with comparatively large sums of gold.

"From about the third week of the war tailoring began to revive. Employment in the tailoring trade, from being very slack, became extremely brisk, especially in factories. It must, however, be remembered that some classes of tailoring, the workers in which attain considerable skill, are still affected, and it is not always easy or desirable for such workers to change their trade. A substantial amount of overtime is being worked, and one hears that to a considerable extent.

"Almost from the beginning the serious condition of women's employment has been recognised, and efforts have been made, apart from the Prince of Wales's Fund, to deal with the problem. The Central Committee on Women's Employment was set up by the Cabinet Committee to devise schemes for women's work, and very soon, inco-operation with the Stepney Labour Investigation Committee (a sub-committee of the Local Representation Committee), it set to work to establish an experimental workroom for British women resident in Stepney who had lost their employment directly owing to the war. An empty London County Council school in Cannon Street Road was rented and equipped as workrooms for making baby outfits and as a kitchen for teaching women plain cookery and incidentally providing a substantial dinner and tea (at a total charge of 3d.) for the women employed. No girls under 16 years of age wer admitted. Arrangements are being made to obtain an L.C.C. cookery mistress to give extra instruction on two afternoons a week. The baby outfits are of a very practical pattern, and include ingenious cradles made out of banana crates. Later on a separate scheme, working in with the cookery training scheme, was started to teach cutting-out and the making of old clothes into new ones. Each department of the work-room is in charge of a competent forewoman and assistant.

"The women employed are not taken n direct at the workroom itself, but re recommended by the local Relief ub-committees of which there are five Stepney, having regard to the normal rnings of the applicant and the povy of the family as a whole. A family ome of over 24s. a week is usually arded as an indication of opulence.
e women receive 3d. per hour, and ne majority work for 40 hours per week, save those in the cookery and making-up departments, whose hours are from 30 to 35 per week. In some cases, where the circumstances justify it, they are put on part time, as it is a principle of the workroom to employ as many suitable women as possible in proportion to their need.

"The work-room, however, is intended as nothing more than a TEMPORARY SHELTER AND STOP-GAP.

Its aim is to give employment instead of doles to women, who, though unable to obtain work owing to the war, are normally wage-earners, and incidentally to train them in the cutting out and making up of useful garments, as well as in plain cookery. The ignorance discoveed has been amazing, though the progress made has been very satisfactory. It is the aim of those organising the workroom to utilise every possibility of finding suitable work at reasonable and recognised rates for the women as soon as possible. In some instances manufacturing clothiers have taken on women and during the first weeks of the war its rooms were inconveniently crowded. Since then it has taken in only alien girls, but during the last few weeks many of them have found work, and the problem is asuming smaller proportions.

"Besides the official workroom, 14 others have been opened, all run on a voluntary basis. Four of them give work out to homeworkers. Three are for girls under 16 years of age. One admits only wives of soldiers and sailors and is more in the nature of a club. Two deal solely with Jewesses and alien and refugee women and girls, and the others admit as far as possible any women who is in distress. Two of the workrooms have creches attached. All make clothing of some description, mainly underclothing, shirts, Red Cross and soldiers' and sailors' clothing. The conditions of admitting applicants vary very much. On November 10 the total number of women receiving work, whole or part-time, was 513.

"Very soon, some of these workrooms will have to close down owing to the inability of those responsible for them to bear the financial strain for a prolonged period. More official help is needed, though it must not be assumed that all the workrooms are run in such a manner as to warrant their being subsidised. Some of them are founded on principles which are economically fallacious, and the sooner this is realised the better. In some cases women who have not been out of work before are being provided with work because their husbands are unemployed. This seems to offer hardly a satisfactory solution.

"In the beginning of November the Stepney Distress Committee opened its register for single women, girls of 16 years and upwards, married women with incapacitated husbands, and widows. No local workroom has been opened by the Committee, the nearest ones being situated in Bow and Bermondsey, to which 34 women have deen drafted from Stepney.

"In some respects the problems which we have had to face during the last few weeks in connection with women's employment are those which normally exist. After the war women will have to seek work in order to supplement the casual earnings of their husbands in much the same way as during the war. Homework will still destroy the home life of a thousand homes. Many wives and mothers will still be ignorant of cooking and plain sewing and of those things which go to make a home. The East End, and especially the Docks, will continue to be to a great extent

AN INDUSTRIALLY UNORGANISED MOB.

"In many ways this crisis has produced a greater sense of our collective responsibility; and we are able to regard unprecedented things with equanimity. Many of us from one reason and another are unable to go to the front, but our sense of national unity is quickened. We talk of our national civilisation—cannot we do something of a permanent character to make it a reality to the wives and mothers of those who in various ways serve the cause of their country? These problems await solution, they await those who will collect the necessary information without which efforts are too often doomed to failure. The present situation has provided the necessary stimulus to induce people to extend personal help to women workers where otherwise it might not have been given. They have had an opportunity of realising in some small measure what the problems are. We only hope they will not desert us when the war is over.

"But underlying most of the problems of women's work in East London is the larger one of men's employment. Unemployment and underemployment of men, low wages and bad social conditions, all conspire to oempel the women to accept even lower industrial conditions. Why not set up a Central Committee on Men s Employment? We shall need it to cope with unemployment arising out of Peace."

WOMEN TO DO MEN'S WORK.

How Labour Problem Could be Solved.

EMPLOYMENT FOR EVERY-ONE.

(By a Special Correspondent.)

Lord Kitchener wants another million men. After that he may want a third million. Where are they to come from? The number of unemployed is almost insignificant when we begin to count in millions. Assuming that they were fit, they could all be absorbed by the Army in a week or so without materially affecting the situation. Moreover, trade is improving and unemployment is steadily decreasing.

Men are urgently wanted on Tyneside, hundreds of them, skilled and unskilled. Hundreds of workpeople are required in the heavy woollen district of Yorkshire. Lord Kitchener's intimation that the man who is working on War Office contracts at home is serving the country as usefully as if he were in the trenches, has had to be posted up in the clothing factories of Leeds to persuade the men to resist the call of the bugle. Carpenters are wanted to build huts. The boot and leather centres are very active. This is all due directly to the demand for war material of one kind or another; but in branches of trade that have not benefited by the war a gradual improvement is taking place.

Men are wanted in Flanders in ever increasing numbers, and in a much lesser degree workpeople are wanted at home in ever increasing numbers. That Lord Kitchener will get his millions is not in the least doubtful. He will get as many men as he thinks necessary, and they will go smiling and with a song on their lips.

Untapped Sources of Labour.

The creation of soldiers must be the nation's first thought. But the withdrawal of millions of healthy young men from industry, glorious and necessary though it be, will have a disturbing effect on the labour market, and there is no good reason why some attempt should not be made to ease the consequences. The adjustment should not be left to chance.

The general solution is, on the face of it, simple. If we are to carry on our trade to the limit of our capacity, and if the supply of men falls short, women must be brought in to take their places. There are many unemployed women, but unemployment among women is also decreasing, and it is problematical if the number of women accustomed to work, but now idle, would suffice. It may be necessary to make drafts on the large number of women and girls living at home, whose day is daintily filled with shopping and afternoon calls. Many of them, of course, are now doing very useful work out of sight towards making the Army comfortable, but our untapped resources of labour lie there if anywhere.

There are many occupations for which women are quite well suited. They might collect tram fares. They might do many things they have not hitherto been allowed to do, and objection that might be advanced in normal times could not be advanced to-day, or to-morrow. Many women and girls, who have hitherto regarded participation in business as beneath their dignity, would take a pride in filling positions vacated by men, and so doing what they could publicly to keep the country going smoothly.

Women in all Industries.

Before that point may be reached, a real system of exchanging male labour or of utilising female labour could be instituted. Adaptability will have to be studiously cultivated. Already there has been a good deal of it among women. In some parts of Lancashire there is said to be a scarcity of big piecers and women are being tried on that work. Dressmakers are being utilised in clothing factories. It is said that no woman who can work a sewing machine and run a straight seam need be out of employment.

If, as Lord Kitchener is reported to have said, the war will go on for three years, there will be a steady drain on our resources, and some system of co-ordinating labour will be necessary. The fundamental need will not be so much for soldiers and sailors, for the spinners and weavers, for clerks and seamstresses, but for men and women, the valuable raw material of labour.

The spectacle of women in branches of industry and in the transport services, which might at other times have been regarded with mixed feelings, would be regarded now with pride and satisfaction. They would remind us continually of the [illegible] engaged in real man's work and [illegible] all of the [illegible] of that [illegible] person upon.

Reynolds's Newspaper, Dec: 6th 1914.

WOMEN SUFFER MOST.

The net result of the Board of Trade inquiry in October, which covers about forty-three per cent. of the industrial population, shows that there is little abnormal unemployment. In September the contraction of employment of men was ten and a quarter per cent., and as regards women eight and a half per cent., a figure which has been equalled only in the severest industrial depression. In October immense industrial activity, induced by the placing of large War Office contracts, caused improvement. By the middle of October the progress of recruiting had equalled the reduction of employment of men, but in the case of women the displacement figure was still high.

PROFESSIONAL WAGE-EARNERS.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE TIMES.

Sir,—Under this heading, Lady Lovelace has addressed to you a letter on the subject of the distress which undoubtedly largely exists among the professional classes, as the result of the war. It affects, as she rightly says, not musicians and actors only, but architects, painters, sculptors, designers, handicraftsmen of all kinds, doctors, solicitors, engineers, and others.

Lady Lovelace suggests the formation of a committee of professional men to deal with the problems involved. Such a committee has been formed some weeks ago, under the title of "The Professional Classes War Relief Council." The president is the Lord Mayor and the Archbishop of Canterbury and Cardinal Bourne are vice-presidents. The council is formed of representatives of nearly every one of the leading professional benevolent associations and societies organizing relief in connexion with the war. Committees are now at work dealing with the various methods by which relief may be given; such as employment, training, education, &c. Mr. Pierpont Morgan has generously given the council the use of his houses 13 and 14, Princes-gate, the lower part of which is used as offices, and the upper part as a maternity home.

The chief function of the council is to bring together the various existing professional benevolent associations, so as to avoid overlapping; to work in loyal cooperation with them all, and not as a rival in competition with them.

Financial support is urgently needed, and a meeting to raise funds will be held at the Mansion House, under the presidency of the Lord Mayor, early in next year. Meanwhile, subscriptions may be sent to the treasurer at 13, Princes-gate.

The rapidly increasing demands upon the council are practical proofs of the need of our organization. We are, Sir, your obedient servants,

LEONARD DARWIN, Chairman of the Council.
SAMUEL WEST, Chairman of the Executive Committee.

WOMEN AND THEIR WORK.

Some time ago there appeared in this column a report of the opening of a Central Office at 104 George Street to deal with unemployment among professional and business women who were suffering from the effects of the war. In the time that has elapsed since the opening of this bureau it has been working in full harmony with the Labour Exchange, and has had the advice of Mrs Elizabeth Ross and Mr Cramond. More recently the conclusion was reached that the work of such an office could best be done as a branch of the Exchange, with the result that it was formally taken over last Wednesday as the Central Office for Women's Unemployment under the Board of Trade. Practically this is a new development of the work, though there is a similar department in London. Meantime the Advisory Committee will remain at West George Street, and we may expect an important development of this side of the work as it will enable some kind of record to be kept of superior girls and women out of employment, and will bring necessitous cases into touch with channels which can give them assistance without lowering their high standard of independence and self-respect.

Daily Dispatch. 654. Dec: 7th 1914.

OUT INTO THE WORLD.

Girls Obliged to Earn a Living.

SUITABLE CALLINGS.

War's Strain on Middle-class Families.

Social workers who are in closest touch with middle-class life in Manchester declare that no section of the community has felt the pinch of the war so much as the professional class.

One feature of the financial stress of to-day is specially remarked upon. Numbers of young women, the daughters of professional men, have recently found themselves under the stern necessity of going out into the world to earn their own livelihood.

"These girls," said the secretary of a Manchester employment bureau to a Daily Dispatch representative, "usually come to us without even so much as an idea of what profession they wish to enter. In almost every case they are possessed of precious little capacity and simply don't know how to set about earning a living. We have to select the work they appear to be best suited for and put them in the way of getting a proper training. In these days training means everything to a woman."

Among the callings selected by girls who have found themselves thus compelled to go into business life may be mentioned secretarial work, physical culture instruction, massage and electrolysis, the various branches of the nursing profession, secondary school teaching, domestic science instruction, kindergarten work, and public health inspection.

"Many young ladies," continued our informant, "become lady helps. There has been an improvement in the salaries obtainable for this class of work. A few years ago £25 a year was the maximum, but a lady help, if she is efficient, can now command £30. There is far more demand, however, for nursery nurses, either trained or untrained. In the case of the former the salary goes up to £40 or even £50 a year, according to the degree of training and ability, and untrained girls of good birth can get as much as £30. There is not much difficulty, either, in securing these posts, and the duties are such as appeal to almost every nice girl and woman."

Glasgow Evg. Times, Dec: 7th 1914.

So far as Glasgow is concerned, the opening of the Central Office for Women and Girls, under the auspices of the Labour Exchange, is a new departure, and one which, in the hackneyed phrase, must fill a long-felt want. Particularly at this time many of those who have come into intimate touch with the results of the war have realised how hardly these have pressed upon the better class of women workers, dressmakers, young ladies in business offices and in shops, who have lost their employment, and how difficult it is to get into touch with this class of worker. Some time ago the Central Office for Women was opened with a view to registering business and professional women and girls out of work, and at the same time a Consultative Committee was formed to advise applicants, and when necessary to put them into the proper channels for obtaining assistance. Miss Marion B. Blackie was president of this committee, and the conveners were Mrs Thomas Johnston and Miss A. R. MacLehose. Among the members of the committee were Mrs Elizabeth Ross and Mr J. M. Cramond of the Labour Exchange, under whose expert advice, along with the Consultative Committee, the work was carried on. It was decided ultimately that the scope of the work would be extended by this being carried on under the auspices of the Labour Exchange, and the other afternoon Lady Arthur formally opened the Central Office as the Labour Exchange City Office for Women and Girls. The advantages of such a registration bureau are obvious, and as the Labour Exchanges are in touch with work of every kind all over the country, it must be greatly to the benefit of the bureau and of those consulting it to be affiliated in this way to headquarters. It has, however, wisely been decided that the Consultative Committee of the ladies should remain and carry on their side of the work in the same office, along with the Board of Trade Labour Exchanges.

UNEMPLOYED WOMEN AT GOVAN.

TO THE EDITOR.

I have been asked by the Govan District Relief Committee to appeal, through your columns, to the unemployed women and girls who have not registered themselves at a Labour Exchange to do so at the earliest opportunity, as the committee are anxious to get exact information as to the extent of female unemployment in that district. The information is necessary to suggest our campaign for the establishment of a workroom in Govan for unemployed women. The Labour Exchange is at 55 Helen Street, and the hours of registration are from 9 a.m. to 4 p.m. Every assistance to those registering will be given by the woman in charge.

TOPICAL LOCAL JOTTINGS.

Hard as many people have been hit by the war, it is a matter for consolation that those who have been reduced to the depths of destitution are receiving from various sources assistance far beyond anticipation. It is gratifying to find that the Mayor of Finsbury (Mr. W. R. Corke, J.P.), realising the large amount of distress which calls for relief from the four corners of the borough, has exercised his good offices in securing a consignment of cheese weighing 4,000lbs., which represents a gift from the Dominions. His Worship having discharged the important function of acquiring the cheese, the Mayoress, with that characteristic interest in the welfare of poor people which has endeared her to all classes, is superintending its distribution. I think it will be conceded that in the cutting up of huge quantities of cheese amateurs generally "cut" a sorry figure. The Mayor realised that experts were necessary for the successful performance of this operation, and readily accepted the proferred help of Mr. and Mrs. Jones, of Perceval-street, and Mr. Wyatt, of Meredith-street. Tickets were supplied by the Ward Relief Committees to people who as a result of the war have had to resort to charitable assistance. The cheese is dispensed to the ticket holders at 21, City-road, where through the agency of the Queen's Work for Women Fund, a hive of industry has recently sprung up. The Mayor, I understand, has the promise of further gifts coming to this country from Canada, a large quantity of salmon and several tons of potatoes being expected any day. Mrs. Lauzun-Brown and other ladies have volunteered their services to expedite the work of distribution.

UNEMPLOYED WOMEN.

DISTRESS IN GLASGOW.

The question of unemployment among women in Glasgow was raised at a meeting of the Burgh Distress Committee—Councillor Alex. M'Clure presiding—in the City Chambers yesterday.

Mr John Stewart complained about the inactivity of the committee, declaring that it was deliberately neglecting the duty laid upon it by Act of Parliament. The distress was abnormal, and already 500 or 600 women had registered themselves as unemployed. Many women were on the borders of starvation, and the committee did nothing but recommend the appointment of a deputation to the Local Government Board.

The Chairman claimed the committee had done everything they could. The committee, however, could not move without sanction of the Local Government Board.

Mr Stewart thought the committee had been singularly negligent, leaving voluntary agencies to cover the work for which the committee was responsible

Mr Turner attributed the entire blame to the ocal Government Board. The Board had ritten a letter to the committee requesting that deputation be sent to Edinburgh, and after a pecialist from the Board was sent to Glasgow report the committee would be allowed to ... He confessed himself tired of the Local vernment Board and its specialists.

iss Irwin said there was serious distress ong women. There were many young girls ...g in lodgings earning 9s or 10s a week, and scarcity of employment reduced that class to a very serious state indeed. In view of the uation the organisation with which she was nected had, in face of absurd opposition and ...cted criticism, established a workroom ...h steady employment was given to 100 ...d women. She was rather tired of talk overlapping, declaring that 20 workrooms ...sgow would not be too many at the time. They had received 800 or 900 ...ions from women for work. UNEMPLOYMENT AMONG LEITH WOMEN. — At a meeting of Leith School Board yesterday—Rev. J. M. Scott presiding—a letter was read from the Local Committee of the National Relief Fund, regarding a proposed scheme for the employment and training of women and girls who might be thrown out of employment in consequence of the war. The co-operation of the Board was asked in the matter of training, and it was agreed to remit to the Continuation Classes and Employment Agency Committee to consider the question.

HOW LONDON FACES THE WAR!

THE UNEMPLOYMENT AMONG WOMEN.

London faces the war in a sombre spirit. Her electric standards are blackened and throw small circles of light into a dense surrounding darkness. The shopkeepers can hardly get permission to display their wares under sufficient illumination when the shades of evening come on. Trafalgar-square is drained of its water. The National Gallery is bereft of some of the noblest of its masterpieces. People walking about the streets at dusk seem to gaze up at the air in a nervous, apprehensive kind of fashion.

Yet things might have been far worse than they are! There is no doubt whatever that in the earlier days of this great campaign the Government had budgeted for a much more severe crisis in the Metropolitan City than that which has actually come upon us. A few of the Metropolitan Mayors met the President of the Local Government Board, and it is an open secret that Mr. Herbert Samuel led them to believe that over £10,000,000 might be necessary to tide London over its crisis of unemployment before Christmas. Up to the present time the gloomiest of these forecasts have not been verified by facts, and that they have not is a measure of the greater staying power possessed by our own native land.

The outstanding fact about unemployment in London at the present time is that it has much more seriously affected the women than the men. Taking the latest returns of the Central (Unemployed) Body for London, it appears that up to the 21st November there had registered since the war 6,902 men and 10,406 women. During the corresponding period last year there registered 4,509 men and 586 women. So that while the numbers of the men had gone up by the sufficiently significant amount of 35 per cent. the numbers of the women had increased beyond all bounds from 586 last year to 10,406 in the year of war.

Of course, so far as the men are concerned, these figures don't prove quite enough as to the actual distress. All about the City of London there are men who are not actually unemployed, but who are working half time or with pay very much reduced from what it was before the war. These men would be looked upon as in their normal conditions so far as the available statistics are concerned, and yet it cannot be denied that amongst this fairly numerous class of the population there is a vast amount of genteel poverty.

A RAID ON GERMAN WAITERS.

Taking actual employment in London, it is to be noticed that there is just at the present time a growing slackness in the building trade. Just as the war commenced the great strike which had been going on for many months was suddenly and temporarily settled. This made it possible to start work on many jobs which had been held up during the days of discussion and dispute. In addition, there were trenches to be made for the troops in view of a possible German invasion, and this provided many labourers with a large amount of temporary employment. But now these special jobs are over, and in the West End of London, especially, the trade is exceedingly slack.

The clothing and furnishing trades are better to-day than they have ever been since the beginning of the war. Special attention was devoted to them by the Government Sub-Committee, which sat under the presidency of Mr. John Burns, and the result is that Government orders and contracts have been so distributed as to preserve a more equal volume of employment over a larger period of time. To the exertions of this very able committee is also very largely due the fact that at the docks and wharves more men are employed than there were last year, and that the casual docker is, in fact, very much in demand.

One of the trades, however, which has been very hard hit is the restaurant trade in London. One well-known place in the West End has had to discharge no less than 200 men. The much more sombre spirit induced by the war has disinclined men to banquetings and feastings, and as there is no work for the men to do their masters have been unable to retain them in their service. On the other hand, waiters who are not of German and Austrian nationality are having the opportunity of their lives. Wherever an enemy's natural is found serving in restaurant or hotel he is generally discharged and his place filled by waiters of Dutch, Italian, and Swiss nationalities.

So far as the publicans are concerned, there is no doubt that the restrictions as to hours and the serving of women has had its effect on the licensed premises of London. At the meetings of the rating authorities there are constantly coming up applications for relief from a pre-war assessment by reason of a decreased volume of business. It is, of course, impossible for the rating authorities to entertain any of these applications; but there may shortly be some general conference of the different Metropolitan authorities to decide on some common policy which should be followed in the very exceptional circumstances.

TRAINING IN TOY-MAKING.

Work for the women still remains, however, the need of the moment in London. The Central (Unemployed) Body for London are providing work for 900 women, at a cost of £650 per week. The Central Committee on Women's Employment are providing work for 710 women, at a cost of £325 a week. The London Mayors in twenty-two Metropolitan boroughs employ 1,320 women, at a cost of £910 a week. In all 2,930 women are employed throughout the capital city, at a total cost of £1,885 per week.

Surely this is a remarkable result, and when it is remembered that in addition to the public agencies there are all kinds of private societies helping in the general work of relief, it shows that, at any rate, London has not been found altogether wanting in the severe time of crisis, which has not now by any means spent its force. It is not simply the number, but the nature of these schemes which compels our attention. Queen Mary a few days ago paid a visit to St. Pancras, where one of the most promising of these experiments is in actual operation. In one of the rooms of the public baths connected with this enterprising borough there are about 160 unemployed women at work on plain needlework, underclothing, children's dresses, and baby outfits. Besides this there is another smaller room, an additional workroom, where girls are taught to re-make and remodel old clothes, and from the general air of alertness and activity about the establishment when Her Majesty paid her visit, it may be guessed that the experiment is turning out a great and a memorable success.

No sufficient progress, however, has yet been able in opening up opportunities in new trades which have been hitherto monopolised by Germany. Toy-making, for example, has figured largely in all Board of Trade reports and in the plans of anxious administrators; and one or two toy-making work-rooms were at once opened in London for the unemployed. Up to the present, however, their success has not been exactly encouraging. There is a large amount of ipertia in the Anglo-Saxon mind, both male and female, and the unemployed appear to prefer to keep to the old lines, instead of embracing fresh opportunities in a new and developing trade.

Yet, with all its drawbacks, the work in London has furnished the opportunity for many able organisers. Zeppelins may raid in the air, but they will find our searchlights shining. War may dislocate our economic machinery, but London will be found ready for the work of repair.

UNEMPLOYED WOMEN IN GLASGOW.

At a meeting yesterday of Glasgow Burgh Distress Committee, Mr John Stewart alleged inactivity on the part of the Committee in regard to providing work for unemployed women. The Committee, he said, were avoiding the duty laid upon them by Act of Parliament. There were, he said, between 500 and 600 women who were on the borders of starvation. All that was to be done apparently was to send a deputation to the Local Government Board.

The Chairman (Councillor Maclure) denied that the Distress Committee had been neglectful of their duty, but the Committee could not take action without the sanction of the Board.

Miss Irwin said the distress among women in Glasgow was acute. The workroom established by her own organisation gave employment for 100 girls and women. She was tired of the talk about overlapping; if twenty workrooms were opened in Glasgow there would be need for them. There was great distress among charwomen, and she threw out the suggestion that a municipal corps of charwomen should be formed for cleaning stairs and closes, their wages being paid out of the funds of the Distress Committee.

It was agreed to send a deputation to the Local Government Board.

UNDER-EMPLOYMENT

WOMEN ON SHORT TIME IN DUNDEE.

Dundee Distress Committee yesterday received a deputation from a local organisation interested in working women, with the view to assistance being given in cases of under-employment.

Mr James Thomson and Rev. A. C. Mackenzie spoke on behalf of the deputation. They stated that they had come to the Distress Committee because they knew that at present there was a considerable number of women under-employed, and they had reason to believe that after the New Year that number would be increased. They wished to know what the Distress Committee could do to help those women. Mr Mackenzie said he believed that distress, or the name of it in any shape or form, had a very injurious effect on recruiting. If the ordinary man got it into his head that there was danger of his relatives being left in distress he might not join the army.

Mr J. H. Martin, who presided, explained that the Distress Committee only dealt with unemployment, either of men or women. They had opened a bureau in Overgate, where any unemployed person could register. Up to the present time 63 had registered, two of whom were in the textile trade. The greater number of them were masons, who are usually idle at this time of the year. The Committee did not relieve distress of any kind except by giving employment. They did not distribute funds, except in wages for work done. Up to now they had not provided work for women in Dundee. None of the cases referred to of women working short time would come within the scope of the Act. Their work was concerned with unemployed persons. If they found that there was a considerable amount of unemployment in the city they would apply to the Town Council for work.

The deputation thanked the Committee for the information given them.

Relieving Distress.

At a meeting of the Sub-Committee of the Executive Relief Committee subsequently, five applications for relief were disposed of.

Dr Turner, Inspector of Relief Work in Glasgow, attended, and, for the guidance of the Committee, explained that in Glasgow the following maximum weekly scale had been adopted, and had, during the last three months, worked very satisfactorily. For one adult, 7s; two adults, 12s; each additional adult, 4s; and each child, 2s, no family to get more than 20s a week. The meeting adopted the Glasgow scale, and the cases were dealt with on that basis.

RELIEF WORK IN SALFORD.

UNEMPLOYMENT DECREASING.

The Executive Committee of the Salford Local Representative Relief Committee yesterday approved of the recommendations of a sub-committee which proposes to gradually eliminate from the ranks of the men receiving weekly relief those who are undeserving, and to find employment for those who, in the opinion of the Sub-committee, ought to work.

A similar proposal is also made with reference to the 177 women who are receiving weekly relief. But as the Sub-committee consists wholly of men it was decided to recommend the formation of a Women's Unemployment Sub-committee to deal with the matter.

The question of the scale to be adopted for free medical attendance and drugs was discussed. The Sub-committee recommended that free medical attendance and drugs should be given only to those whose total income does not exceed—for a wife, 15s. per week, a wife and one child, 19s.; a wife and two children, 22s.; a wife and three children, 24s. 6d.; and a wife and four or more children, 26s. 6d. per week.

It was stated that a portion of the foodstuffs for the alleviation of distress in this country, which has been sent by the Sydney Chamber of Commerce would be allotted to Salford, and the Committee agreed to pay the cost of delivery. The foodstuffs are to be distributed to distressed poor, hospitals in which provision is made for wounded soldiers, and Belgian refugees.

The Committee have been able to find work in various ways for an average of about 20 men and a similar number of women each week since the war broke out. Reports from the Labour Exchange state that the number of applicants for work is steadily decreasing, as is also the amount of unemployed benefit paid under the Insurance Act.

ACCRINGTON SCHEME FOR GIRLS OUT OF EMPLOYMENT.

Last night, at a meeting of the Accrington Trades Council, a letter was read from the Accrington Branch of the Women's Labour League outlining a scheme for the employment of women and girls displaced through the war and advising that girls out of employment should register at the Labour Bureau. The scheme was that wages should not be less than threepence per hour nor more than 10s. per week.

Mr. J. R. Emmett, who moved that action be taken on the lines suggested, said the articles sewn and knitted would have to be given away. It had been tried with success in some Lancashire towns, and if the Trades Council fell in with it he would introduce the matter at a meeting of the Accrington Distress Committee.

Mr. T. Simmons seconded. The pay, he said, might not be much, but they were living under trying circumstances, and 10s. a week earned was better than that 3s. 6d. or 4s. 6d. a week should be handed over in the name of charity.

Mr. Edwards moved an amendment that the pay be at least fourpence an hour, as in Blackburn, and this was seconded.

Mr. Emmett's motion was carried.

WORK FOR WOMEN.

Subscriptions to Local Fund.

A sub-committee has been formed under the chairmanship of the Mayoress of Newport to undertake the provision of work for women who may be out of employment in consequence of the war, and, as far as possible, to prevent unemployment among women.

Subscriptions towards the local fund are earnestly asked for to enable the work to be successfuly carried on, and may be sent to Mr. W. T. Duke Williams, National Provincial Bank of England, Newport, hon. treasurer; or to Mr. G. P. Mitchell Innes, Town Hall, Newport, hon. secretary.

Orders for work and gifts of material will be a great assistance in achieving the objects of the sub-committee, and may be sent to the hon. secretary. All subscriptions will be acknowledged in the Press.

AVOIDANCE OF TRADE DISPUTES DURING THE WAR.

WHERE EMPLOYERS STAND.

By RUPERT.

The workers of this country are just now experiencing what is perhaps a flattering sensation, and that is the concern with which the Government is evidently watching any movement on their part which is at all likely to lead to a rupture of harmonious relations between them and their employers. The Government are said to be extremely desirous that no labour disputes should get so far as to endanger the peace of any particular trade, and that a policy of conciliation should imbue all concerned to the end that amicable settlements should be arrived at. The powers that be need be under no apprehension that strikes will be entered into by the operatives from sheer love of them, as it is well known no affection is cherished for this form of settling disputes by any responsible body or leader of workers.

But what impresses me in regard to the desire to avoid any cessation of work through disputes at this particular juncture is the one-sided manner in which it works. Disputes as to wages and on questions which endanger principles long since conceded are not likely to arise just now, but with regard to conditions of work there is ample evidence that the natural reluctance on the part of operatives to push matters to a conclusion and the desire to assist the Government by every means in their power, works out very much to the advantage of the employer.

In the cotton trade, for example, though there is a great deal of short time being worked and workers are losing considerably thereby, the conditions of work in numerous cases are such as would not be tolerated for a moment if the country's affairs were in a normal state. The national interest demands that a policy of forbearance should be exercised all round, but does this only mean that the operatives are to put up with work which they would refuse to grapple with in ordinary times?

A Fair Question.

Is it not quite as open to the interpretation that the employers should provide a quality of material which is rather better than is usually given to the operatives and so remove a cause of irritation which is a prolific source of trouble? It is their duty to provide good material in peace time; and in time of war, when it is everybody's duty to avoid anything likely to cause trouble to the authorities, it is still more their duty to rid the trade of any possibility of disputes of this nature. It does not seem to me to be at all reasonable to expect that the whole of the sacrifices should be borne by the worker. It is quite as easy to have good work as bad, and the only reason for the existence of the latter is the desire for profit.

And in regard to other matters it is a common argument when workers demand some slight rectification of a wrong they are suffering from to have it flung in their teeth that at a time like this they ought not to press or unduly harass employers by insisting on anything like a strict reading of any agreement bearing on the point in dispute. Again we see that it is the worker who must not press for his rights; it is the worker who must forego his just claims. There is no suggestion that the employer should extend the application of any principle favouring the operatives, but simply that any such principle should be restricted in its operation, and narrowed down to its smallest compass because there is a serious war in progress. In short, the encroachment must always be made on the preserves of the rank and file.

Surely in such circumstances—to change the metaphor—it should be the top dog that should relax his hold and not pin the bottom dog down still higher. But this is, in fact, what is happening at the present moment. Workers are being asked to endure without complaining abuses that would [illegible] for an instant at a less critical period, corresponding spirit on the other side is difficult to discover. No principles are being foregone by employers, no inroads are being made into any agreement which favours them, and it does not appear equitable or just that this self-denying ordinance imposed by the war should be confined altogether to one side.

Employers Copy!

In the textile trades particularly the workers have suffered severely since the war began, and have displayed a spirit of self-abnegation which is deserving of emulation in other spheres. These trade unions have also reduced the spirit of their women under-employed, and they had reason to believe that after the New Year that number would be increased. They wished to know what the Distress Committee could do to help those women. Employers Copy!

In the textile trades particularly the workers have suffered severely since this war began, and have displayed a spirit of self-abnegation which is deserving of emulation in other spheres. Their trade unions have also reflected the spirit of their members, and have refrained from pressing cases where a difference of opinion was likely to be met with, and it is not an unreasonable thing to ask that it should not be the operatives every time who are called upon to part company with principles dear to them, or to inaugurate systems which are contrary to long usage and custom, especially when the need is not clearly established.

We have been assured by the Government with regard to certain trades that the workers therein are doing good services by simply working and turning out the utmost production possible and they are loyally doing their best in this direction. They have to a great extent sunk their objections to overtime working, and have not pressed to any undue extent the question of overtime rates of pay. Evidence is also forced upon us on the other hand that the employers in these trades are having the best of their lives, but are they making any special efforts to remove all cause for complaint that the workers may have in regard to conditions of work and remuneration which in ordinary times might have precipitated a conflict ere now? In other words, are they meeting their operatives half way on these questions? In the main and other chemical industries in this country may gain useful light from an article in a recent number of Die Umschau. From a summary which has been sent us by a Copenhagen correspondent, we learn that as regards the manufacture of sulphuric acid, which is based on Spanish and Portuguese ores, substitutes for these can be obtained from Norway and elsewhere, and there are also home supplies. The nitric acid industry, it is said, can carry on for a long time on stocks of Chili saltpetre imported for use as manure, and the farmers must use home-manufactured substitutes. The production of salt, kali, soda and potash is said to be perfectly secure; England cannot even disturb it, as Germany is richer in salt than any other country in the world, and her position as the only large producer of kali substances enables her even to inconvenience her enemies materially during the war. The electrolytic handling of the alkali chlorides is only affected, like all other industries, by the war. The large installations of the Badische aniline and soda factory in the synthetic ammonia manufacture offer sufficient guarantee, the German writer thinks, for the supply of ammonia commodities, however long the war may last. There will be no lack of phosphates for the farmers, although there may be some change in the actual articles used. The small deposits of phosphorite in the Lahn Rhine valleys will probably be worked again. Certain metals, especially quicksilver, copper, and nickel, will become scarce, and rise in price as far as trans-oceanic supplies are concerned. The cessation of supplies of chrome ironstone from Asia Minor and the Caucasus will cause a scarcity of chrome preparations. It is anticipated that the war will lead to an increased demand for iodine goods, but the raw material is to be found in any quantity on the coast of Norway.

Turning to the organic chemical industries, the same writer considers that the German production of spirits will be sufficient for the home demand, especially since the 1914 yield of potatoes has been excellent. Wood distilling will be undisturbed, and methyl alcohol can still be produced from formaldehyde. In the production of acid vinegar material reduction must be reckoned with, because a considerable amount of American raw material is used. The auxiliary products from coal have nothing to fear, and benzol will for many purposes be used instead of benzine. No apprehension is entertained, says the writer in Die Umschau, in regard to several of the raw materials for the manufacture of explosives. The industry engaged in the manufacture of dyes must reckon with a reduction to one-half. Complaints have reached Germany from America, concerning the lack of German dyes, and the French and English textile industries are described by this authority as "crippled." As regards camphor, German chemists have made their country independent of the supply from the Island of Formosa. The supply of fats, oils, soaps, and candles is, however, dependent to a great extent on imports, and the tropical fats and oils will soon be scarce. The supply of train oil, on the other hand, can scarcely be stopped, and by new processes this commodity can be applied to the manufacture of articles of food. Owing to these new processes, and to the home supply of fat, the soap industry hopes to escape a serious shortage of raw materials.

RECRUITING AND EMPLOYMENT.

THE Board of Trade report on the state of employment in October, 1914, to which we referred briefly last week, has been compiled from returns received from nearly 10,000 large industrial firms (employing more than 100 persons), and from 10,600 small industrial firms. Over 4 million people were employed in July by the firms whose returns were tabulated. According to the census of 1911, nearly 9,250,000 persons were occupied in these trades, so that the investigation covers, roughly, 43 per cent. of the industrial population. Returns were also received dealing with the employees of local authorities, from retail and wholesale dealers, from commercial employers in London, and from employers of dock labour at various ports.

The report gives more information about recruiting than has so far been vouchsafed to the public by the authorities. The figures are somewhat out of date, but they cover the September recruiting boom, and show how the demands of the Services were met during that period. The returns do not include agriculture, but the proportion of industrial employees joining the forces from the different districts showed the following increases between September and October in various parts of the country:—

PROPORTION of EMPLOYEES in JULY KNOWN to HAVE JOINED the FORCES in SEPTEMBER and OCTOBER.

	September.	October.	Increase.
London	8·5	10·3	+ 1·8
South-East	11·4	12·9	+ 1·5
South-West	12·8	13·2	+ 0·4
West Midlands	8·4	11·0	+ 2·6
East Midlands	7·3	8·1	+ 0·8
Yorkshire	6·2	8·1	+ 1·9
North-Western	7·9	9·3	+ 1·4
Wales	8·4	10·8	+ 2·4
Northern	8·3	11·1	+ 2·8
Scotland	10·4	13·2	+ 2·8
Ireland	6·2	9·8	+ 3·6

Thus the South-Western division and Scotland tie for first place in October, but whereas the former showed a very high figure in September, the Scotland percentage increased rapidly after the middle of September. The Irish figure shows a considerable increase, but the figures for Yorkshire and the East Midlands were still low in October. The table giving the results for various industries shows that on the whole factory employments have sent a considerably lower proportion than such trades as engineering, the iron and metal trades, timber, brick, &c. The effect of war contracts is to be traced in the fact that in the hosiery and boot trades the enlistment percentage, which was 6.7 in September, was absolutely unchanged in October. These figures relate only to those who are known to employers to have joined the forces, but the report states that except in the building trade there is reason to believe that the returns from employers cover practically all those who have joined the forces. In commercial employments the figures are rather higher than in industry. It is stated, for example, that in London "nearly 30 per cent. of Stock Exchange clerks are known to their employers to have joined the forces, while 20 per cent. have joined from the London banks." In transport and in certain other directions the proportion is not so heavy, and in domestic service it is probably a good deal lower. But if the industrial percentage is applicable on the average to all other occupations, it would indicate that by October 1,400,000 men had been withdrawn from civil employment. This figure agrees with the statistics already quoted in the House when the 260,000 Reservists and 250,000 Territorials called up at the beginning of the war are added to the numbers subsequently enlisted.

As regards employment generally, the report states that after the first shock of the outbreak of war, when many factories went on short time, and in some instances employees were given provisional notice of discharge, it became clear that many of these precautionary measures were too drastic, and although in a few trades employees were dismissed after being on short time for a few weeks, the factories resumed their normal working in a large number of cases. The returns for September showed that while there was a reduction in the employment of males of 10¼ per cent., the calling up of reservists and enlistment reduced the contraction to 1½ per cent. During October there was a continued improvement, brought about chiefly by the placing of large war contracts. By the middle of the month the progress of recruiting had equalled the reduction of employment of males due to the war, while the contraction of employment in the case of females was considerably less than in September. The following table shows the state of employment in the two months as compared with the numbers employed in July (taken as 100) :—

	Males. Sept.	Males. Oct.	Females. Sept.	Females. Oct.
	%	%	%	%
Still on full time.....	60·2 ..	66·8 ..	53·5 ..	61·9
On overtime.....	3·6 ..	5·2 ..	2·1 ..	5·9
On short time	26·0 ..	17·3 ..	36·0 ..	26·0
Contraction of employment	10·2 ..	10·7 ..	8·4 ..	6·2
Known to have joined the forces	8·8 ..	10·6 ..	.. ..	..
Net displacement	— 1·4 ..	— 0·1 ..	.. ..	..

Overtime increased slightly, but the proportion on short time fell by about 8 per cent. in the case of males, and by 10 per cent. in the case of females. The net contraction of employment among males (0.1 per cent.) represents approximately only 7,000 persons. The report points out that some men have joined the forces after having lost their employment, and not with the knowledge of their employers, so that the figures do not, therefore, show the whole of the relief to the labour market through enlistment. The reduction of employment is rather greater in small than in large firms, but since in a large number of cases the net contraction in employment in small firms has been offset by the filling of vacancies in the larger firms, the net result in the case of males shows that on the whole there is very little abnormal unemployment. Small employers, however, have been left with a greatly reduced turnover. As regards women, there is little improvement in the case of large firms, but this is almost entirely due to the condition of the cotton trade.

An analysis by industries shows that the trades most affected are the cotton trade and the furniture trade, the latter being an important London industry. Already before the war conditions in the cotton trade were bad, and spinners of American cotton had decided to curtail production by 166½ hours between July and September, so that a crisis, in any case serious, has been much aggravated by the war. Many of the features in the woollen and worsted trades are the same as in the cotton trade, but the former have been relieved more than any other industry by Government contracts. The following table compares conditions in the two industries in October :—

October.

	Cotton Trade. Males.	Cotton Trade. Females.	Woollen and Worsted Trades. Males.	Woollen and Worsted Trades. Females.
	%	%	%	%
On overtime	0·4 ..	0·5 ..	23·8 ..	19·6
On short time	40·0 ..	43·8 ..	14·5 ..	16·6
Contraction	17·1 ..	14·2 ..	2·1 ..	1·9
With the forces.....	7·0 ..	.. ..	4·8 ..	..
Net displacement (—) or replacement (+)	—10·1 ..	.. ..	+2·7 ..	..

The feature of the woollen and worsted trades is the co-existence of much overtime in branches affected by Government contracts with much short time in branches not so affected. The large contraction of employment in the furniture trades is due partly to the fact that they belong to the "luxury" trades, and partly to the shortage of a variety of raw materials.

Other trades showing a gross contraction of 10 per cent. or more among the males employed are :—

Cycle, motor, &c.	15·8	Tinplate	11·7
Brick, stone, &c.	15·7	Paper and printing	11·7
Building.....	14·0	Glass, china, &c.	11·5
Copper, brass, &c.....	12·0	Clothing	11·2
Engineering	12·0	Cutlery, hardware, &c....	10·3

Owing to the short period of engagement prevalent in the building trades, it is almost certain that a large number of men have joined the forces unknown to their last employer.

The implication of the report as a whole is that even in October there was no margin of unemployed from whom additional recruits could be drawn, and that care will have to be taken not to cripple vital industries by withdrawing labour. We could do well without building and similar trades during the war, and in others women could be employed if the prejudices of employers and trade-unionists could be overcome. But it is clear that if another million men are to be enrolled, the country must be prepared to make considerable adjustments in its industrial methods and personnel. "Business as usual" is an unattainable ideal in war time.

DETACHMENT IN WAR TIME—ESPIONAGE.

Perhaps the most important duty that the ordinary citizen can perform at this moment—beyond looking after his own business—is to try to think critically, and not to let prejudice or panic vitiate the honesty of his judgment. Difficult as it may be, it is essential that we should all strive after some measure at least of detachment if we are to see things clearly and in due proportion. Patriotism will be all the purer and all the stronger if from time to time we put on a pair of neutral spectacles and seek (as Bagehot put it) to see things in a white light. Let us try to examine espionage in this way.

The question of spies occupied much attention in both Houses of Parliament during the all too brief session which came recently to a close. That a good deal of genuine anxiety has underlain a very discreditable press agitation seems clear. Such anxiety should have been allayed by the assurances given on behalf of the Government. It is true that the explanations left something to be desired, Mr McKenna in particular appearing more anxious to shift the responsibility on to other shoulders than to supply the information that was sought, while neither the naval nor the military authorities seemed anxious to meet the criticism of Parliament. Still, on the whole, the panicmongers made out a very poor case, and scored very little in their attacks. The Government were clearly not prepared to deny that cases of signalling from land to enemy ships might have occurred, but all sober people will accept their explicit assurances that every reasonable precaution to prevent such practices is being taken. It is monstrous to suppose that the panicmongers, who, when challenged, appear unable to put forward a single specific case, are better informed as to the extent of the evil than the authorities, who have the whole of the available evidence before them, and have investigated thousands of suspected cases. Nothing would satisfy the extremists short of a system of summary imprisonment upon anonymous delation.

Of course, the most important measure taken, and that most open to criticism, has been the internment of considerable numbers of aliens of enemy nationality which has been carried out at the instigation of the War Office. It is a precautionary measure, and really hardly touches the question of espionage proper, since it is generally admitted that the really dangerous spies are not likely to be found among aliens. It seems rather aimed at the danger of disorder and sabotage. Suspects were, of course, already under detention. It must be admitted that the presence of numbers of unemployed and disaffected aliens might be a source of real danger, and that many have courted trouble by their own behaviour. At the same time, there can be no doubt that many perfectly innocent and well-disposed persons have been interned, and we hope and believe that as investigations proceed these will be allowed to return to their homes. The measure was very likely in itself a wise one, but it was carried out rather hastily, and certainly at a most unfortunate moment. For it had the appearance of being taken in answer to an organised Press campaign against all firms of enemy nationality, and incidentally against those firms which refused to dismiss their German workmen. It is, indeed, quite possible that the sort of blackmail by which employers were in many cases forced to turn their alien hands adrift was largely responsible for the danger with which the War Office was admittedly faced. This is all the more to be regretted inasmuch as the measures

UNEMPLOYMENT.

SINCE THE WAR BEGAN AND NOW.

A STATISTICAL REVIEW.

During the past few weeks it has become clear not only that the amount of unemployment in Manchester is far less serious than was anticipated at the beginning of the war, but that the prospect for the next few months at any rate is quite favourable. This has led some people to doubt the necessity of continued contributions on a large scale to the local relief fund, but investigation shows that there is still sufficient distress in the city to engage all the activities of the officials of the Relief Committee. The statistical records of the Unemployment Relief Sub-committee best explain the fluctuations in the number of applications for help which have been made since the third week in August, when the distribution of relief began.

The First Rush.

During the first week nearly 4,000 people were relieved, and for some time new applicants were registered very rapidly, so that by October 24 no fewer than 14,947 cases had been inquired into by the visitors of the Sub-committee. Relief was granted in 9,887 cases, and 5,060 applicants were refused up to this date. In the next six weeks, up to December 5, the number of new applications registered was 3,236, and relief was granted in 2,241 cases. In the whole period, therefore, relief has been granted in 12,128 cases out of a total of 18,183 investigated.

Payments have not been made each week to this number of people or anything approaching it. Week by week a careful scrutiny has been maintained, with the result that as new recipients have come on to the list old ones have dropped off, either voluntarily or because it has been discovered that their circumstances have improved. During the week ending August 28 relief was given in 2,831 cases at a cost of £520. Later came a revision of the scale, and in the week ending September 26 a sum of £1,597 was distributed among 5,187 applicants, an average of 7s. 6d. each. In the week ending October 24 the number of cases relieved was 5,717, at a cost of £1,823, or 6s. 5d. each. The number of cases in the week ending November 21 was 5,490 and the amount £1,862, an average payment of 6s. 10d.

Improving Conditions.

In the two following weeks, November 28 and December 5, there was a marked decrease, the figures being 5,153 and 4,739 cases and £1,770 and £1,577 respectively. This suggests that the improvement which has become apparent in the labour market is now definitely making itself felt in the homes of the people who have been suffering distress in varying degrees during the past four months. The experience of the sub-committee's officials during the fortnight ending December 5 indicates that a definite turning point was reached in this period, for no fewer than 824 old cases were removed from the relief list, and 702 were held over, pending further inquiry, because discrepancies had been discovered between the incomes returned by applicants and the amounts returned by their employers. To this is attributable the very marked decrease in the payments during last week, when only 237 new payments were granted. In the previous week 571 old cases were removed or held up, and only 345 new ones were added.

An analysis of the trades affected has not been made since October 24, but up to that time the majority of the recipients had been low-paid workers, such as carters, labourers, hawkers, domestic workers, charwomen, and out-porters. The classes named accounted for just over 2,000 out of 5,400 cases. There were also 333 mill workers, 54 dyers, 87 warehousemen, 703 householders who had obtained a living by taking in lodgers, 149 painters, and a number of packing-case makers, engravers, and makers-up. The tailoring trade was seriously affected for a time, and 257 tailors and 241 machinists have been given relief—most of these being Jewish workers. Trade has much improved recently in this industry, but progress has been slower in the other classes of employment.

Amount of Destitution.

Up to the period referred to (October 24) the number of recipients of relief who had been totally unemployed was 4,118, and partially employed 3,382. Of those totally unemployed only 219 out of 7,500 cases investigated were entirely without income. The income in 4,622 cases was more than the rent, and it was less than the rent in 2,638 cases, so that the percentage of absolute destitution in the city has been small. The income of the people who were totally unemployed was derived from the work of wives or children, clubs, pensions, health insurance, or lodgers.

If the distress had grown to anything like the proportions which most people expected at one time the local relief fund would soon have been exhausted. Up to December 5 £22,951 had been distributed by the Unemployment Sub-committee, and, in addition, in the first three months of the war very large weekly sums were expended by the Soldiers' and Sailors' Families' Sub-committee, out of a total contribution to the fund up to December 5 of £66,581. It is probable that even with the welcome limitation of distress in the city a call of from £1,500 to £1,700 a week will be made for some time to come by the Unemployment Sub-committee. During the past four weeks the additions to the fund have ranged from £2,103 to £3,617 per week, and a striking feature of the lists in recent weeks is the preponderance of contributions from salaried and wage-earning people, as compared with the wealthier classes in the community.

The relief given by the Unemployment Sub-committee is still being administered in the shape of vouchers, which are accepted by tradespeople for the purchase of food and coal. Recently attention has been given to the discovery of cases of serious fraud. They are very few, happily, but the Sub-committee has reluctantly decided that in the worst cases they are bound in the public interest to institute prosecutions.

WOMEN AND WAR.

AID FOR UNEMPLOYED.

A cafe chantant and sale of work were opened in Charing Cross Halls, Glasgow, yesterday in aid of the workroom at 70 St George's Road, where women unemployed owing to the war are given employment in the making of garments. The workroom was opened in September by the Women's Suffrage National Aid Corps, a body formed by the Women's Freedom League, and it has since been carried on by private subscription. The cafe chantant and sale of work, which are to be continued to-day, were organised to aid the continuation and extension of the work. The opening ceremony was performed yesterday by Mr Henri Verbrugghen. Mrs Robert Wilson presided. She said that women who had lost their situations owing to the war were employed at the workroom for five days per week for a wage of 10s and their dinner. They made garments which were afterwards given to Belgian refugees. That was a movement with which everyone would sympathise, for they were all anxious to help people thrown out of work and also the Belgians and others who were in distress. (Applause.)

Mr Verbrugghen said he was very pleased to come and open the proceedings because he considered the object a noble one. At a time like this he sympathised very specially with the women of all countries affected by the war. When he said that he included the German and Austrian women as well, because the German mothers were suffering as keenly as those of the other nations. Women were deserving of sympathy at such a time, because they were compelled for the most part to a life of inaction, which must almost be more trying for them than if they were able to take an active part in the fighting. He spoke of the Belgian atrocities, and said the generous movements which had been started in Glasgow and elsewhere in Great Britain for the relief of distress provided a bright side to the picture. He hoped the sale would be a success.

On the motion of Miss Eunice Murray Mr Verbrugghen was awarded a vote of thanks.

Paddington Women's Local Government Association.—Workrooms for Unemployed Women.

TO THE EDITOR OF "THE BAYSWATER CHRONICLE."

DEAR SIR,—May I, through the valuable medium of your paper, put before your readers a short account of our workrooms at 31, Westbourne-terrace North. They came into existence very shortly after the war broke out. Since then we have employed daily from ten to fourteen women and girls of the dressmaking class who had been thrown out of employment in consequence of the war, and we hope, if sufficient funds are forthcoming, gradually to increase this number. Their task is to renovate clothes which have been sent to us through the kindness of the Women's Emergency Corps, Lady Emmott, and many private friends. The clothes are put into thorough repair, mended, cleaned, pressed, and in some cases cut up into suitable garments for children. When completed and passed by two members of the committee they are sent to various places for distribution. Parcels have been sent to Lady Emmott for her depôt, the Alexandra Palace, the Aldwych Receiving Depôt for Refugees, Mrs. Max Müller at Oxford, the Louvain Professors, Folkestone, and to many private families.

Urgent requests are constantly reaching us from secretaries and others begging for some of our "ready to wear" clothes. The work is carried on under a competent paid supervisor. Visitors are welcome at the rooms during any of the working hours, i.e., 10 to 1 and 2 to 5, Saturdays excepted.

Our object in this undertaking is of a dual character—to make a maintenance grant to a few unemployed women and girls to tide them over this terrible time and to assist the Belgian Refugees with necessary clothing. It has been our steady aim throughout to work solely with these objects in view, and we have resolutely stood to our determination in no way to interfere with the trade of small shops or dressmakers, although tempting proposals to make new garments have been offered to us.

To continue this work through the coming weeks we need more funds. Surely our kind friends in Paddington will not let this undertaking fail for lack of donations. The average cost per week is now £5 15s., which includes besides the girls' maintenance grant (wages?), insurance fees, superintendence, gas, fire, and light, hire of sewing-machine (10s. a month), haberdashery, sending of parcels, etc. Any donations towards these expenses will be gratefully received and acknowledged by the Hon. Treasurer, at 31, Westbourne-terrace North, W.—Yours faithfully,

K. L. EMPSON,
Chairman of Committee.

Hon. Secretary.

THE MAYORESS' WAR RELIEF FOR UNEMPLOYED WOMEN.

To the Editor.

Sir,—I have to acknowledge with many thanks the following gifts towards the purchase of wool for knitting by the elementary school-children of warm articles of clothing for our troops:—The Hon. Mrs. Stanhope Tollemache £1, Miss England £1, Mr. Bunnell Burton £1, Miss Nestra Bird 5s. The mufflers, mittens, and cuffs are urgently needed, and the school-children are most eager to take their share in the work, so that we hope the rest of the £15 asked for may soon be forthcoming.

The education authorities have no power to spend any of their funds for this object, and can only place the time of the children and the knitting needles at our disposal, and this they are most anxious to do. The Medical Officer of Health has kindly consented to arrange for the disinfection of all the articles, in case they may have come into contact with any infectious disease.—I am, etc.,

BLACKBURN'S LEAD TO OTHER TOWNS.

A SPLENDID WORK.

An excellent work is being done by the Women's Sub-committee of the Blackburn War Relief Committee in finding employment for women thrown out of work by the war. They have taken over the old Presbyterian School in Whalley Range, and here over 150 girls and women are engaged every day in the making of garments, which will be distributed to necessitous families. The majority of the workers are textile operatives. There are a number of skilled sewers among them, and these are engaged in teaching the less proficient, there being at least one good sewer to each table of six workers. An experienced forewoman supervises and hands out the work, and she has an assistant, who sees that it is being done correctly, and gives help to those in difficulties. The hours of employment are from ten to four, with an hour off for dinner, on five days a week, the premises being closed on Saturday. Applicants for employment have to register at the Labour Exchange, the secretary to the sub-committee being Miss Taylor, the head of the women's department at the Exchang Blackburn was one of the first towns to take up this work, and the school has been visited by deputations from neighbouring centres where it is proposed to start similar workrooms. A capital dinner is served each day at the remarkably low charge of 1d each. The menu is a liberal one, including hot-pot, soup, &c., and there is always a cup of tea. The committee have had gifts of food, but most of it has been bought, and in fixing the scale the whole has been reckoned at cost price, the resulting figure being a penny and a third per head per day. A complete kitchen has been fitted up, with a large steam cooking apparatus, and a competent cook and assistant cook are in charge of the department.

A Glimpse of the Work-room.

"Weekly Telegraph" Photo.

In addition to nearly 200 women employed at the Whalley Range School, 250 others have registered at the Labour Exchange as being desirous of doing similar work. Unfortunately the absence of any grant from the central fund has necessarily exerted a restraining influence on the further activities of the local committee. In view of there being so many women textile workers unemployed in Blackburn, there is a very good case for the opening of one or two more workrooms. The matter is under consideration by the Women's Sub-committee, and probably further action will be taken in the course of a few days. The workers receive 8s 4d per week. As a rule only one member of a family is found employment, though in exceptional cases this is not adhered to. The object of the committee in all cases is the need of the family, and not the ability of the worker.

Helping City Workgirls.

LADY ARTIST'S SUCCESSFUL SCHEME.

If the war has made Liverpool busy—as it has done at the docks and at other centres—it has also worked havoc in other directions. The great European conflict has, indeed, affected Liverpool and district in a remarkable way, so far as the workers are concerned. Night and day toil hardly serves to meet the requirements for some branches of trade; a few hours a day would satisfy in others; and, alas! in many, had it not been for the many who have enlisted making vacancies, lots more would be out of employment than are to-day.

PENNY DINNERS FOR GIRLS.

When the war broke out Mrs. Kate Sargint, the well-known local artist, was one of many women who were filled with a burning desire to "do something." Impressed by the number of working girls whose wages had suddenly undergone a reduction she resolved to aid them in the matter of meals. From friends and relatives in Grange, to which place Mrs. Sargint belongs, she received many offers of help, and the money so raised, supplemented by a substantial cheque from an American friend of her husband, enabled her to launch the scheme which she had in mind. This was to utilise her studio in Liberty-buildings, formerly the Bluecoat Hospital, as a dining-room for workroom girls who are attached to the big shops in the centre of the city, and who, owing to the effect of the war on business, have had their work reduced to half time or three-quarter time. In discovering the class of employee who most needed help Mrs. Sargint had the counsel and assistance of the Anti-Sweating League. Mrs. Sargint's idea was to provide the girls with a substantial hot dinner in the middle of the day at price (1d) which, whilst removing the boon from the category of mere charity, would make the minimum call on the reduced and slender resources of the recipient.

COOKERS IN A STUDIO.

Of course, the cooking arrangements were a problem in themselves. An artist's studio, even so spacious a one as that of Mrs. Sargint, is not equipped for the cooking of dinners, but the difficulty was solved by the generosity of Mr. Melly, of Messrs. Lamport and Holt, who fitted up a kitchen and supplied it with gas cookers and all necessary appliances. Loans of pottery and tables were also forthcoming, and in due course business firms were approached and signified their readiness to supply provisions, &c., at a merely nominal charge. In this way the scheme of supplying dinners was started in the early part of October, and is being continued with ever-increasing evidence of acceptance.

The meals vary from day to day, the changes being rung on hotpot, stewed steak, savoury liver, and fish pie (on Fridays). On every day there are sweets to follow, these consisting of roly-poly or rice puddings. With each meal is supplied an ounce and a half of bread, and the milk used in the puddings is of the best—as, indeed, are all the ingredients employed. In fact it is doubtful whether so appetising and substantial a meal could be obtained elsewhere for less than six times the amount charged by Mrs Sargint. That the girls appreciate the whole Sargint.

OVER 200 DINERS.

When the dinners were inaugurated fifty girls were supplied; now this number has increased to about 230, who sit down in three lots between twelve and one o'clock. The amount of food consumed may be gauged from the fact that sixty pounds of potatoes are cooked daily, and on Fridays fifty pounds of fish are requisitioned. The regulation price of the dinner is a penny, but it is understood that those girls who can afford to pay a little more should do so. The matter is left entirely to the honour of the girls, and Mrs. Sargint is perfectly satisfied with the result, for some of the girls insist on doubling the minimum payment. In addition to work-girls from the city shops, the dinner is generally partaken of by a few older women from the sewing-rooms of the different relief societies, these women being in receipt of only a small wage.

In preparing and serving the dinners Mrs. Sargint has the assistance of a number of ladies, prominent amongst whom are Mrs. Ethel Frimston (a fellow artist), Miss Jessie Gwatkin and Miss Michelson (both of Grange), and Miss Mary Langdon.

EMPLOYMENT FOR CITY WOMEN.

The Sub-committee on Employment of the Citizens' Relief Committee for Glasgow have recently had under consideration the provision of workrooms for unemployed women and girls. One workroom in the city, formerly carried on by voluntary effort, is now under the control of the committee, while another is expected to be open on Monday first.

In these workrooms the principal work carried on will be sewing and knitting and the altering and repairing of garments, while various classes of wearing apparel might be made up for gifting to charitable institutions the Red Cross Society, and the Be[illegible] refugees. A scheme for the training of machinists has been approved by the Scottish Committee on Women's Employment. In this workroom the girls will be provided with food at an exceptionally small charge, and training in cookery will be given to about six girls.

WOMEN'S EDUCATIONAL UNION. — "The Women's Employment Bureau and Students' Careers Association" formed the subject of a lecture delivered by Miss Janet E. Brown, Glasgow, at the third general meeting of the Women's Educational Union, held in the Royal Philosophical Rooms, Glasgow. In the course of her address, Miss Brown said that since 1906, when the Women's Employment Bureau for Glasgow and the West of Scotland was formed, over 3,000 applicants and 1,500 employers had been dealt with annually. Information was given with regard to occupations for educated women, and in order to impress upon girls the necessity to qualify for definite careers, the Students' Careers Association had been formed. There were several occupations not overcrowded, and she believed that if girls had full information regarding them fewer problems in regard to unemployment would be met with. A discussion followed.

SOUTHPORT NATIONAL AID COMMITTEE.

The Women's Employment Bureau, at the Friends' Meeting House, Portland-street, during the past month have employed an average of 33 women and girls in the work-room. Since the opening over 2000 toys have been made, and the value of this stock has covered the cost of labour and materials. This seems a very satisfactory result, when compared with similar work-rooms, and Mrs. Nicholls is to be highly complimented on the result. The garment department, under the direction of Mrs. and Miss Wood, has been very busy making children's and women's garments and men's shirts. There will be a number of garments, suitable for gifts for the Christmas tree, on show on Friday next, as well as shirts for the troops. It is hoped to welcome many friends that day, and also on Wednesday, December 23rd, as the Committee has decided to be open to visiters that afternoon also. The Bureau will be closed from December 23rd, 1914, to January 4th, 1915, for the Christmas holidays. The Committee will be glad of further orders for shirts, which are still greatly needed for the troops.

A NOVEL EXPERIMENT.

To Grapple with the Shortage of Women Machinists.

It is estimated that in the shirtmaking industry in Manchester alone there is a demand to-day for 500 women or girl machinists. It is probably a conservative estimate. These machinists are not to be got. On the other hand, there are many women and girls out of work. Many dressmakers are idle.

An attempt is being made to fit some of the unemployed for this busy industry. It is a small beginning in the business of transferring labour, and a bigger attempt is in contemplation.

So far only a dozen women and girls are being trained, but there are a hundred on the waiting list. The workroom and the machines have been provided by Mr. Thomas Clapham, Sackville-street. It is estimated that six weeks' training will be necessary to fit the twelve for the factory, and they had all had some experience of treadle or power machines. "Green" help would probably require a longer period of probation. They receive 10s. a week during this period.

POPLAR'S GIRL PIONEER.

A Poplar factory girl, May Mears, is the first to accept the offer of Australia, conveyed through Queen Mary, to find employment for English women.

The Queen, when on a visit to Poplar, heard of this and sent for the girl, making kindly inquiries as to her future.

May will sail for Australia early in the New Year, and hopes to become a domestic nurse. By the terms of the Commonwealth offer, girls must stay for at least one year. They will be taken to Australia for £1—paid by the Queen's Work for Women Fund—and will be provided with a complete outfit, with a sovereign as pin-money.

Work for Unemployed.

Sir,—In these days of charity, I beg to ca the attention of the magistrates and councillor of the city to the condition of hundreds o women and young girls out of employment and unable to get work.

I refer especially to dressmakers, good, honest, respectable people, too proud to ask relief. All they ask is work, sewing of any kind.

Could the gentlemen and ladies who have charge of distress and relief funds not provide workrooms? If only they would, I am sure ladies would only be too pleased to supply work, and thus enable those unemployed women and girls to earn enough to keep the wolf from the door. In doing so, they will be doing a greater charity than looking after those for whom the State has provided.—Yours, etc.,

WOMEN'S UNEMPLOYMENT BUREAU

Sale in Elmwood Hall.

A quantity of women's and children's clothing and men's shirts, suitable for charitable purposes, was offered for sale in Elmwood Hall, Elmwood Avenue, yesterday, and attracted many buyers. The object of the promoters of the undertaking was to benefit those out of employment on account of the war, and their efforts certainly deserved the utmost support. The Women's Unemployment Bureau was organised soon after the outbreak of hostilities, with Mrs. Purves as president, Mrs. Hume as vice-president, Mrs. S. Sinclair, Adelaide Park, as secretary, and Miss Sinclair, University Square, as treasurer, and the members earnestly addressed themselves to the task of providing work for as many as possible of the women rendered idle by the partial or complete closing of factories as a result of the outbreak of hostilities. Within a comparatively short time they had the satisfaction of seeing their endeavours meet with the proper reward. The applicants for work grew in numbers, and they were supplied with material for sewing and knitting, which enabled them, by the sale of the various articles produced, to draw a fairly handsome weekly wage. The ladies constituting the bureau, of course, acknowledge themselves helpless in the matter without the generous assistance of outside friends of the movement, and for this reason they are most anxious to enlist on their side all the available sympathy in the community. The work they are engaged in is a very practical one, and it is designed to confer a great benefit upon people in humble life who, owing to the consequences of war, find themselves in very straitened circumstances. So far they have failed to get themselves recognised as an auxiliary relief society under the terms of the National Relief Fund originated by the Prince of Wales, but they are hopeful of a favourable consideration of their claims from that agency, whose object is the same. In the meantime it lies with the general public to come whole-heartedly to their aid with orders which are sure to receive both prompt and careful attention.

PREPARING FOR CHRISTMAS RUSH AT EDINBURGH GENERAL POST OFFICE.—The temporary assistance required by the Edinburgh Post Office in connection with Christmas work is now being recruited by the Labour Exchange at Tollcross. It is not anticipated that there will be any diminution in the seasonal traffic. Over one thousand men between the ages of eighteen and fifty are required, and these are now being secured as rapidly as possible. The Edinburgh branch of the Printing Trades Federation has advised its members suitable for the work, who may be on short time, to apply for Post Office employment, so as to enable their colleagues to obtain fuller employment at their trade for the time being. In addition to the male workers, the Labour Exchange is supplying one hundred young women for sorting work, and most of this labour is being selected from trades and occupations adversely affected by the war.

EMPLOYMENT FOR OUT-OF-WORK DRESSMAKERS.

A correspondent writes:—

Having read in your issue of December ber 16 the letter headed "Plight of Dressmakers, an Appeal to Englishmen to Support Trade," I venture to suggest a way in which those who cannot afford to order gowns, or do not require any at the moment for themselves, might ease the plight of dressmakers, and help the Belgian refugees at the same time. I am told on good authority that numbers of destitute Belgians are still arriving, and that more are expected, that the available cast-off clothes have run short, and in many cases are not suitable for peasants, etc.

Now I feel sure that many dressmakers would be glad to allow and assist their workgirls to make the needed garments for Belgians. I therefore suggest that a small fund might be raised for this purpose."

PLIGHT OF DRESSMAKERS.

AN APPEAL TO ENGLISHMEN TO SUPPORT TRADE.

To the Editor of the "Evening Standard and St. James's Gazette."

Sir,—I am appealing on behalf of dressmakers. I have been making very strict inquiries into all businesses, and I find dressmakers are suffering terribly through this war.

I come across them everywhere. Some have had to close their businesses altogether, others are struggling to keep going on their own hard-earned savings, while heaps of poor workers do not know how to get employment.

I ask British women, do you think it fair to our own women, who have worked hard in the past, and are willing to work hard for an honest living, to be deprived of all means of doing so because ladies are saying they cannot have dresses all the winter because they are giving so much to charities and are helping the Belgians so largely that they cannot afford clothes?

We all know that the motto of the country is "Business as usual." I ask you how many of you are thinking of this. I was at a concert the other night, when well-known men were asking for support for the theatres, and I think they ought to ask their wives and sisters and daughters to help support their dressmakers. We know there are no balls or parties being given, but I think there could be quiet dinners, and ladies could have dresses for that, or afternoon or morning dresses, or even blouses.

I ask your readers again to think of this and help our women, who play a great part in our business world, and help to keep the country going by paying their share of rent, rates, and taxes. Try and put yourselves in their places, and think how you would feel in their position. I have helped in all I can myself, and now I make this appeal.

FEMALE UNEMPLOYMENT.

A COMMENDABLE GLASGOW SCHEME.

The Sub-Committee on Employment of the Citizens' Relief Committee for Glasgow have recently had under consideration the provision of workrooms for unemployed women and girls. Various schemes were submitted for their consideration, and one workroom in the city, formerly carried on by voluntary effort, is now under the control of the committee. In these workrooms the principal work carried on will be sewing and knitting and the altering and repairing of garments, while various classes of wearing apparel with be made up for gifting to charitable institutions, the Red Cross Society, and the Belgian refugees.

A Scheme for the Training of Machinists has been, at the suggestion of the Sub-Committee on Employment, approved by the Scottish Committee on Women's Employment. It is expected that this workroom will be opened shortly, and girls, who perhaps have had no former experience in work of this nature, will be trained, and, when considered fit, would be transferred to the factories or workrooms of some of the large manufacturers of army clothing, who at the present time, owing to stress of work, are unable to give the necessary tuition to learners. In this workroom the girls will be provided with food at an exceptionally small charge, and in so doing training in cookery, under a fully qualified teacher from the College of Domestic Science, will be given to about six girls. The Scottish Committee on Women's Employment are raising no objection to the establishment of workrooms. The Sub-Committee have under consideration other schemes for training in the nature of laundry work, cooking, etc., and so soon as these mature, the approval of the Scottish Committee will be asked.

Woman-Worked Paris:

While the men of Paris are at the front courageous women are filling up the working gaps

By CLAIRE DE PRATZ.

ONE is amazed to note the complete upheaval in the social life of Paris brought about by the war. The calling to the front of all the young and more able-bodied men among the rich and poor alike has created a great dearth of workers, and in every branch of activity their absence is felt even though everybody is determined to put up with the various inconveniences caused by the new state of things Thus in such household details as the warming and heating of our homes, we feel the loss of our stronger coal heavers and many coal merchants who, in spite of the scarcity and increased prices of fuel, still have large stocks on hand, find it impossible to deliver to their customers, for lack of strong men to carry the coals upstairs Parisians usually live in flats, and have but small storing space.

The Coal Difficulty.

A large coal box is kept in the kitchen to store the week's provision. But at present all Parisians—apart from the fact that coal has been scarce in quantities, and difficult to find—are shivering in their cold flats because the providers cannot obtain the necessary number of men to carry the sacks up the numerous flights of back stairs that lead to our kitchens! Three weeks ago I ordered some sacks of coal that were not delivered until yesterday! Customers have to wait their turn, each in succession, and only those who have sick people in their homes may be allowed some favour. Even the houses that are provided with the central heating which is so convenient often fare no better, for most of the male concierges, whose business it is to attend to the furnaces below, are at the front. It is, however, only fair to say that many of these have strong, capable wives, who supplement their absent lords to the best of their ability.

Sugar is another commodity difficult to buy, and which has largely increased in price. The departments invaded by the enemy are precisely our sugar-producing, as well as our coal-producing, provinces. At present ordinary white sugar costs 6d. per pound, and no family may purchase more than one kilo (2lb.) at a time.

Dearer Bread

Another c[ommodity] which has [increased] in quality [and] in price is bread. The beginning of the war by the absence of the more proficient bakers who are responsible for those delicate kinds of bread which delight the Parisians. Early during the hostilities a law was passed forbidding the making of all fancy breads so that all existing stocks of flour should be used solely for the making of plain bread that was well within the prices of the poorer population. So keen is the feeling about this that those bakers who tried to withstand the law and made an effort to produce some fancy stock saw their fresh loaves ruthlessly seized by the police, whose action was vigorously applauded by a vociferous and clamouring crowd. . . But even the most selfish of Parisians, whose croissants with their morning coffee seemed to be an indispensable condition of their existence, resolutely yielded up their luxury without a murmur.

Cheap Fruit.

All other food—except perhaps meat and fish (and this is because of the difficulties of carriage by rail) is as cheap—even cheaper—than at ordinary times Those commodities, such as dairy produce, home-grown fruit and vegetables, which heretofore were largely exported, are now consumed at home, with the result that because of the additional quantities upon the market—the prices have been considerably lowered. Never have we had such cheap fruit as this autumn. Excellent grapes are sold currently at 2½d. and 3d. a pound, excellent pears also, and many sorts of eating apples—of the kind known as the Calville, and greatly appreciated upon the tables of the Parisians. These are now being sold for 4d. or 5d. a pound, though at this season of the year they were formerly most difficult to obtain under 8d. and a franc a piece! . . As they are no longer exported, they are consumed at home, greatly to the delight of all lovers of fine fruit! . . . The social life of the French capital may be said to have become practically non-existent. All tea parties, home receptions, theatre-parties, and restaurant dinners which usually flourish at this season are extinct. Everyone goes to bed at nine o'clock now!

A Provincial Town.

In reality Paris has become a provincial town, and the social life one leads there is comparable only to the life led in the smaller towns of the provinces, where there is no local theatre, and where the only social gatherings are the gatherings of the women who meet together, bringing their needlework with them, to talk scandal and small talk all through the long afternoons. . . . . Fancy work is now replaced by plain work, and knitting and working parties are the order of the day, and when a Parisienne calls upon a friend nowadays she invariably brings her work-bag with her—takes off her hat and cloak and installs herself for the afternoon.

In one way all social relations gain much, for greater sympathies are discovered among mere acquaintances who have occasion during the long afternoons to exchange ideas. The conversations, too, are greatly altered in tone, and are far less frivolous.

Lack of Ready Money.

Another factor which has largely affected all social relations in the city of pleasure is the lack of ready money Even those whom the war has not ruined are in greatly reduced circumstances, because the banks will not give more than a small percentage of the money they hold of each client. Constant calls, too, are being made in the interests of charity, and in every class of Parisian society economy is the watchword of the hour. Literally every person one meets frankly confesses their poverty At friends' houses one is continually meeting women who last year were able to buy themselves beautiful clothes, and who cannot this season afford even the necessary small adjuncts to the toilette. Yesterday I met an acquaintance—a very smart lady—clothed in a long Breischwantz cloak with black fox stole and muff and smart hat from a celebrated modiste, walking abroad in the pale yellow boots and cotton gloves of summer-time! And she was not at all ashamed, for the sight is not at all a rare one; and the touching part is that no one is abashed by their present poverty, and frankly owns to it. A famous dyer told me that large numbers of women whose outdoor cloaks last year were of tones too bright to suit this season's severe tones, have had their cloaks dyed—in tints of dark grey, dark violet, and brown, when not actually black—so great is the general wish not to hurt the feelings of any others in the subdued crowds. All other signs of frivolity have disappeared, too. There are no eccentric modes, no high, waving plumes, no jewels worn.

For the same reason few pianos are heard, and many give up their piano practice entirely, especially when it is known in the neighbourhood that someone has lost a dear one at the front. So far as the necessary work to be accomplished is concerned, the women of France have admirably supplemented the men. In nearly all departments of practical work, French women are usually as able as the men, and the labour in the fields, in the shops of the towns—even in all the transports necessary in a large city like Paris—is done by the women.

As Capable as Men.

The women of France have shown themselves to be admirable during these strenuous times, and have supplemented their own husbands whenever they have been allowed to do so. On the Tube lines of railway in Paris—the Metro and the Nord-Sud—the wives of the employés have been employed in their stead. At lower rates, alas! for the unjust principle of giving to women lower wages for performing identically the same work as men accomplish still prevails! But the wives of the Nord-Sud and Metro Railways have been only too glad to accept three francs a day wages instead of the five francs their men used to bring them home each day The female porter is as assiduous and as reliable as her male partner, and looks far more picturesque in her trim black gown and overall, a scarlet band pinned upon her right arm bearing the initial of the railway she belongs to, and a white embroidered number upon her breast. A serviceable and businesslike leather satchel that holds the railway tickets is swung around her shoulders by means of a strap. She is also provided with a murderous-looking instrument with which to clip the tickets of the travellers—which act she accomplishes with a most severe and martial air. The early-closing hours of the Tube railways are another check to social gatherings, for not only are the taxis greatly reduced in numbers since they have been largely commandeered for the war, and thus are scarce in Paris, but almost everybody being now in reduced circumstances, the cheap Tubes have become more necessary than ever. It appears that a new petition has been made to the authorities asking that these railways should be kept open till ten o'clock at night instead of 9.30, as after this week all restaurants are to be kept open till ten p.m.

There is even to be an attempt at re-opening the theatres on certain nights of the week on condition that a certain percentage of the box-office returns should be devoted to the public charities.

"The social life one leads in Paris is comparable only to the social life led in the smaller towns of the provinces, where there is no local theatre, and where the only social gatherings are the gatherings of the women who meet together bringing their needlework with them. . . . . Fancy work is now replaced by plain work, and knitting and working parties are the order of the day."

WAR AND UNEMPLOYMENT.

HOW AN EMERGENCY WORKROOM IS MANAGED.

By AMY B. BARNARD, L.L.A.

Soon after the war began a resident of one of the London suburbs called upon a friend in great concern about the distress among women and girls in the neighbourhood. "Whatever can be done?" she urged.

The two friends talked the matter over, and decided to invite some eighty friends and acquaintances to a drawing-room meeting, and enlist their interest in starting a workroom for dressmakers and seamstresses out of work through the war. The meeting was attended by some fifty people, and it was decided to place the workroom under the protecting wing of the Women's Emergency Corps. Communication was opened with the central office in London, and it was discovered that there was already a branch at work in a neighbouring suburb, not far as the crow flies, but too remote for workers who could ill afford to pay fares out of their small earnings.

The Financial Aspect.

If the workroom was to be a real help, its establishment must evidently depend on local effort, and the next step was to collect funds. A series of meetings was held at which promise-cards were handed round to obtain donations or weekly subscriptions as well as offers of personal assistance and orders for clothing. One of the two promoters was elected secretary, and with £20 in hand the band of enthusiasts set about finding a suitable room. A Wesleyan church near the high street kindly offered rent free a small hall close to a dilapidated old house said to have been used as a hunting lodge by George IV. in the days when the suburb was a country village. On Sundays classes were held in the rooms, and the house offered prospect of quiet corners where the women could eat their midday meal. The offer of the little hall was gladly accepted; the chief items of expense would simply be gas, coal, and the wages of a caretaker. Handbills setting forth the kinds of needlework to be done were printed and distributed, and on September 15 the workroom was opened.

Some Needy Cases.

The first three girls who applied for work were sent on by the nearest Labour Exchange, the manager of which was delighted at the venture. The need of each one was great. There was a hump-backed girl, whose father had his old-age pension of 5s. a week, and whose brother earned 14s. There was also her sister, a cripple, and the 19s. was all the family of five had to live on. The girl proved a splendid little worker and an excellent machinist. Another early applicant had a mother aged sixty to seventy, a semi-invalid. One of the two brothers had gone to the Front; the other, a small builder, was only earning some half-a-crown or 5s. a week. The girl had occupied a post as cashier at a picture palace, but on the outbreak of war she lost it. She was described as a nice, capable girl, who afterwards during an emergency took charge of the workroom. One of the "first contingent" was a poor thing, living in a bed-sitting-room, where she made up garments for customers. The war crushed her, and she would have lost everything—her furniture and all, had she not gone in the nick of time to the Y.W.C.A., which recommended her to the emergency workroom. From the start applications poured in; but the workroom at the hall could not accommodate more than twenty. It might soon have been filled twice over.

The Secretary soon learned the necessity of method in every detail of organisation, and the most careful bookkeeping. She secured two books with lettered margins—one for names, addresses and orders, with entries both under surname of employer and description of order; the other for names, addresses and occupations of applicants for work. Details such as number and earnings of applicant's family, her previous trade, general remarks as to respectability, age, and two references—one trade the other personal—are recorded in the second book. Applications were made by dressmakers, seamstresses, charwomen, daily helps, sick nurses, upholstresses and domestic servants. In a room adjoining the workroom was a large clothier's order-book with duplicate detachable tickets, provided by an acquaintance in the trade. It proved most useful.

The sewing-machines were somewhat of a difficulty. A few were lent, but three had to be hired, first at 4s. a month, then at 4s. 6d., and a treadle machine was badly needed. Publicity will doubtless remedy this deficiency in time, for in many a top attic there are sewing-machines lying idle which could soon be repaired, cleaned and set going.

Visits to local tradesmen were productive of excellent results. Drapers promised to allow one penny in the shilling off the purchase of materials, and permitted collecting-boxes to be placed in their shops. One local kinema theatre displayed on the screen notice of a collection, and £1 16s. was taken. A clever collecting-dog did yeoman service in barking for contributions, and in one hour added 10s. 6d. to the funds. On one occasion an observer was much touched at seeing a "Tommy" put three coppers into that doggy's tin. Small subscriptions of threepence and sixpence a week were gladly welcomed.

The Question of Wages.

It was agreed that the women in the workroom should be paid threepence an hour; thus, working forty-eight hours a week, they could earn a minimum of 10s. a week; but the committee refused to tie itself down to this low wage. The Secretary remarked: "We get so many girls who are dependent on themselves; but as the maximum wage in the district for a skilled machinist is 12s. 6d., we dare not exceed that. If we did, other women would throw up work to come to us. We provide tea. The midday meal is obtained outside or eaten in a room of the adjoining house."

Ten shillings a week, and glad to work for it! Alas! poor, white-faced, thin-fingered victims of the war, representative of thousands of women—women with white hair, young girls, nice-mannered and refined as any to be met in a day's journey. Among them was a white-faced, dainty creature with tiny hands, one surely upon whose shoulders the burdens of life ought to press but lightly. A look of sympathy and the suggestion that she could do light artistic needlework so well brought the shy reply: "I have made baby clothes, and would like a machine, but cannot be spared one." The little garment she was making was exquisitely sewn, but one longed to set a good nourishing basin of soup before her.

The workers are clever at mending and altering clothes. Orders for new costumes are refused, lest regular dressmakers of the neighbourhood should be deprived of their work. The cutter-out sat at a side table, and on inquiry said she had been employed at a tailor's at good pay, but fell ill with a bad throat, and on returning to work was dismissed on account of the war, and found her way to the Emergency Corps. Another skilled worker had been a tailor's assistant in a provincial town during many years. Her people moved up to London and she came with them, nothing doubting she would find employment. War broke out, and she could obtain none. One girl, with a friend who was weakly, let lodgings. On the outbreak of war the lodgers departed, and then the two lived on their savings, until outside work was found by the Emergency Corps. One applicant was found to be eligible for the Soldiers' and Sailors' Families' Fund, and was at once sent to the proper quarter. Sometimes bookbinders and clerks have applied, and have been directed elsewhere. But few applicants have been shop assistants.

One curious delusion has had to be combated. Many housewives have come seeking domestic servants, and have seemed surprised they could not transform the girls into servants straight away. "We try to make them understand," remarked the Secretary, "that if a girl has any inclination for domestic work she is at once sent on to a registry for servants. Others think anyone can knit. I wish they could, for the War Office is ready to supply any amount of wool for articles for soldiers. Perhaps Belgians might do this, but few Londoners are knitters."

Current Prices.

The price-list of ladies', children's and men's garments is similar to that current in the trade, but it makes an outsider gasp: A dozen pillow-slips for 1s. 6d.; pyjamas for 1s. 6d.; a tucked nightdress for 2s.; a man's shirt for 1s., buttons extra; blouses from 1s. 6d. Such prices were regarded as nothing unusual by the workers themselves, for, unfortunately, until women's work is everywhere better paid, they have to submit to low rates; and these busy women were evidently so pleased to be at work in a warm room with certain pay in prospect, that though a lump rose to one's throat at thought of them, it was with a cheery word one wished "All success to your beautiful work!"

Friends have canvassed from house to house, and preparations are being made for a concert, since the next development must be removal to an empty house, preferably a shop in the main street, and already the Secretary, by search for unlet ones and notices in the local paper, is trying to find a landlord willing to lend premises for at least six months. The progress of the workroom has been most satisfactory and such a boon that it is to be hoped similar ones will be started in every town where women are out of work.

TRADE AFFAIRS.

UNEMPLOYMENT AMONG WOMEN IN THE PRINTING TRADE.

A representative meeting of the women in the printing trade, under the auspices of the National Union of Paper Workers, was held on December 16, at Free Gardeners' Hall, Picardy Place; a number of members of local ward committees and other public Boards were present. Mr S. Anderson, secretary of the National Union of Paper Workers, was in the chair. He said the object of the meeting was to meet all women in the trade, whether union or non-union, to discuss this great problem that affected all, of unemployment. Mrs Cheshire, Scottish organiser of the National Union of Paper Workers, spoke of the inquisitorial and rude methods of some members of the ward committees, although it was surprising what a large number, although not working class representatives, were entering into the real spirit of the Prince of Wales's Fund, that it was not a charity in the ordinary sense of the word, but a fund subscribed by the nation, and largely by the working class, to help those unemployed through the war, and so prevent destitution and poverty. A sub-committee of the Printing and Kindred Trades Federation met every Thursday, at 8 P.M., at Typographical Hall, High Street, to hear any complaints, and would do their utmost to get them remedied. She spoke on the reluctance of a large number of girls to apply to the ward committees, because of the charity-like method of giving doles, whereas they were physically able, and would gladly do any work rather than accept the doles. Unemployment was rife now, but in the New Year, especially in the printing trade, it would enormously increase. Mr Moran, president of the Printing and Kindred Trades Federation; Mr Cecil Mitchell, Calton Ward; Parish Councillor Millar, Gorgie Ward; Mr W. A. Buckner, Dalry Ward, &c., addressed the meeting. The following resolution was unanimously adopted:—That this meeting protests against the protracted and unwarranted delay in the present national crisis, and urges upon the Scottish Advisory Committee and the Scottish Women's Advisory Committee the necessity of hastening forward at the earliest possible moment the provision of work for the large and growing number of unemployed women.—Communicated.

A Word to Some Ladies.

We have received, and continue to receive, letters on a subject which we wish to bring to the notice of our feminine readers. It is appropriate to Christmas and the end of the last quarter in the year. They are pathetic letters, appealing on behalf of a struggling class which has been very hard hit by the war and can find no help in any quarter. We refer to the dressmakers, and particularly those who work for themselves or for small employers, who have no financial resources to carry them over a prolonged period of depression and no alternative lines of business, like the large houses. Such small employers have struggled to keep their establishments going, but have been compelled to dismiss the girls they employ one after another because there was nothing for them to do. They appeal not so much on their own behalf as for the girls who have been discharged. These workless girls—and the dressmakers who work at home on their own account are in the same plight—go to the committees which are administering public funds for the relief of war distress, but they go in vain. They are sent from one committee to another, with the same result. There is no work for them, although there may be ladies there doing for nothing work which they would be thankful to do for a very modest wage. They naturally ask why they should not be employed if the object for which the money is subscribed, and the organization exists, is to help persons in their position. We do not suggest that any committee or other organization should give them work, because it would be futile. What we suggest is that their former customers should rouse themselves for a moment from the absorbing pursuit of war activities and remember the existence of the unfortunate dressmaker. She is not a person of whose existence it is necessary to remind them in normal times. They remember her very well indeed, think of her very often, and demand her aid with an importunity which is bestowed upon few other people. It is not kind or fair to forget her altogether when a superior interest supervenes. To forget her bills, too, is something much worse, deserving a different description. We are informed that ladies whose names have appeared in the lists of one or other of the war funds for large subscriptions have not paid their dressmakers' bills. This is not charity or patriotism; it is affecting both at some one else's expense. A good resolve for Christmas would be to pay what we owe and to pay the smaller people first.

UNEMPLOYED DRESSMAKERS.

Sir,—In these days of charity, I beg, through your paper, to call the attention of Magistrates and Councillors of the city to the condition of hundreds of women and girls out of employment and unable to get work. I refer especially to dressmakers—honest, respectable, good people, too proud to ask relief. All they want is work, sewing of any kind. I know of some who are in absolute want.

I know that a workroom was started, in which about forty were employed, ladies of the town supplying work; but for some unknown reason this was given up. Could the gentlemen and ladies of the Distress and Relief Committees not provide some such workrooms from some of the funds existing? If only they would, I am sure ladies would only be too willing again to supply work, and thus enable those employed to keep the wolf from the door. In doing so they would be doing a greater charity than looking after those for whom the State has provided.—I am, etc.,

DOMESTIC SERVANTS IN AUSTRALIA.

ASSISTED PASSAGES FOR UNEMPLOYED WOMEN.

Very few applications have been made for the assisted passages to Australia offered by the Governments of New South Wales and Victoria to British women thrown out of work by the war. The passages are offered, in the case of New South Wales, to women not exceeding 24 years of age, and in the case of Victoria to girls under 21, who are willing to take places as domestic servants.

Arrangements have been made to deal with women and girls without previous experience as servants, and a wage to 8s. to 10s. a week is offered, with board and lodging while they are receiving a year's training. The passage is to cost £3, £1 of which is to be paid before starting, the remaining £2 to be paid in instalments. Should the girl break her contract and seek work other than domestic service she must repay the full passage money, amounting to about £20. Two references as to character are required and the applicant must be in excellent health.

The committee of the Queen's Work for Women Fund are offering to candidates selected by the Emigration Sub-Committee, and satisfying the emigration authorities of the two States, the first part of the passage money (£1), the necessary outfit, and £1 on landing. Applications for this grant should be made in the first instance to local distress committees or to the hon. secretary, British Women's Emigration Association, Imperial Institute, South Kensington, S.W.

The offer of New South Wales is further extended to widows of soldiers or sailors, killed in action, who are not more than 35 years of age and who have not more than two children. One child under three would be taken free of charge, and one under 12 at a cost of £4. Work would be found for these women in country districts.

The four Governments—New South Wales, Victoria, Queensland, and Western Australia—offer the same assisted passage to experienced domestic servants not exceeding 35 years of age if single, and to widows without children up to 45 years. The wages vary from 12s. to 20s. a week.

It should be distinctly understood that these offers only concern those women requiring work as domestic servants.

Aberdeen Free Press, Dec: 18th. 1914.

The war is causing a game of general post in the ranks of women workers. While factory girls out of employment are being trained as sempstresses, domestic workers and even farm hands and professional workers are employed in toy-making and other manual occupations. A class hard hit by the war is that of women typists and clerks, and to assist some of these Miss Jean Greive, a Scottish lady who is vice-president of the Association of Women Clerks and Secretaries, has started a small rug-making industry with the help of Miss Ruth Cross, an artist craftswoman. The work is carried on in Miss Cross's studio in Moscow Road, Bayswater. The rugs are made in Persian fashion on hand looms in designs which are highly original and specially applicable to war time. There is the "Road to Calais" rug, its sand-coloured ground strewn with bayonets with tufts of green turf and puffs of cannon smoke in the corners. The "Ship and Gun" rug shows a battleship buffeted by the waves and a side design of cannons. Then Belgian colours figure on one rug, and, of course, there is a "Road to Tipperary" rug. The most original design of all is named "Just Once," and commemorates the encounter between the London Scottish and the Bavarians, which fulfilled in an unexpected way the Kaiser's desire that the Bavarians should meet the British "just once." The rug shows the London Scottish badge, a dark blue lion on a white St Andrew's Cross, and the ground is in the hodden-grey of the London Scottish kilt. These rugs, which are in demand as novel Christmas gifts, cost a guinea each. The workers are paid a weekly wage, and are supplied with hot meals at a nominal cost. Other modes of assisting women clerks and typists out of work are being devised by this society's war emergency fund, to which the more fortunate clerks of both sexes have contributed.

WOMEN AND UNEMPLOYMENT.

AN EFFECT OF THE WAR.

When the tide of war has rolled back, and we are in a position to reflect calmly how all things work together for good, we shall not be surprised to find that we owe to the general upheaval in Europe some definite advance in the attempt to cope with the growing problem of women's unemployment. We certainly shall not pretend that the mountain has been in labour to produce this mouse, but certainly the mouse has none the less been evolved from it.

For years women have been mentally active, have been receiving a sound business training, getting in many instances a grasp of economic principles, widening their outlook upon life, and acquiring that deeper knowledge of the fellow women which has developed into a genuine bond of sisterhood. Until the war these new energies sought an outlet that many of us instinctively condemned, but since the war they have justified themselves in a hundred energetic directions.

The subject of women's unemployment has been taken up and gripped, and we doubt if it will ever be dropped until something in the way of a definite solution has been reached. The great problem is the unskilled worker, and it is more particularly in her interest that workrooms are being opened where she is being trained to take her proper place in the labour market, and being drafted into regular employment. Not only do the new schemes aim at producing competent workers: they are making generally for the efficiency of women, and do not disdain to teach such things as laundry work, sewing, and cookery. All this cannot be done without the sinews of war, and here is an opportunity for the war funds which, instead of giving a charitable subsidy, may achieve a definite end by helping the women to help themselves.

But this cannot be done without the funds to draw from, and all the present tendency is to let things drift. The swelling of war funds is for the present merely mechanical; individual interest and generosity begin to be sadly lacking.

BRISK TRADE.

PLENTY OF WORK, BUT NOT ENOUGH WORKERS.

Reviewing the conditions of unemployment in London at the meeting of the Central (Unemployed) Body yesterday, Mr. Brinsley Harper, the chairman, made several interesting statements. He said:—

There was the customary trade activity which invariably preceded Christmas, though a diminution was anticipated.

There were no signs of abnormal distress, although home workers were still feeling the pinch of bad times.

In Bermondsey trade was so brisk that at the wharves it was difficult to get men.

In Deptford it was not possible to get enough men to fill Christmas vacancies in the Post Office.

Two thousand men and boys would shortly be required at Woolwich Arsenal.

Hawkers, flower sellers, and costermongers complained that business was bad because of the darkened streets.

"Tally men" reported that money was coming in better than was expected.

There was a demand for wrist watches for soldiers, but it could no longer be met, because the watches come from Switzerland, where the trade was now interfered with owing to the Swiss mobilisation. No London firm made these watches, and the trade could be captured if London firms had sufficient initiative.

Drunkenness is decreasing amongst women. Women workers were flocking to the workrooms, and there was a danger that these institutions would deprive women of their initiative to find work. Most women preferred these workrooms to other employment.

East London Observer, Dec. 19th. 1914.

Assisting Poor Stepney Women.

The Mayoress's Useful Scheme.

Sale of Garments.

Quietly and unostentatiously there has been inaugurated in the Borough of Stepney a scheme of workrooms with the object of helping poor women who are not being assisted through the ordinary channels. This effort is being carried on with admirable enthusiasm, energy and patriotism by the Mayoress of Stepney. Mrs. Chidgey, soon after the War broke out, realised that there were a number of women in the Borough who were being badly hit by the War and its effects, and she immediately set to work to establish workrooms for their assistance. It was not an elaborate scheme; nor a costly one; but it was eminently practical. It sought to bring real assistance, with a welcome touch of sympathy, to women who were suddenly faced with distress, and for whom no provision was made, either through the Prince of Wales's Fund or the Poor Law. There are such gaps in our social strata which are left untouched unless some voluntary organisation is established to meet the need. All honour to the Mayoress of Stepney for stepping into the breach. There are now three workrooms in operation under her care. One had already been opened in Leman-street through the foresight of Mrs. George Cohen, and this is being continued for the district of Whitechapel. Another has its headquarters at the St. George's Public Library, and the third is situated at the Mile End Library. As for Stepney and Limehouse,

THE TWEEDDALE GUILD,

so long and honourably established, continues its efforts in the former constituency under the direction of Mrs. Hasted; and Miss Scott and others are at work in Limehouse. The Mayoress's workrooms are workrooms only in the sense that they form centres for distributing the work to the women assisted. The object is to help women who are not in the habit of going out to work, and whose income has been reduced in some way by reason of the War. The husband, may be, has been thrown out of work or has fallen ill. At any rate, care is taken that the person to be assisted is thoroughly worthy of a sympathetic lift. Generally the cases are recommended by the National Relief Fund Committees or some creditable organisation. And there is no overlapping. Women who are entitled to assistance elsewhere are directed to the proper channel. For instance, the wives of soldiers and sailors are sent on to the Association which is looking after that class of women. And as for the work provided, it is such as can be performed at home, say, in the evening, when the children have gone to bed or while they are at school. Garments of various kinds are already cut out, and it is for the women to stitch them into shirts and so on. Knitting and needlework of a simple character is the only labour involved; but the product is a useful article which will clothe and comfort some poor soul. Thus the work serves a double purpose. Altogether some 200 women have been assisted through and her friends. Each is given what represents a day's work at a time. They come to the workroom, receive the parcel of materials and return home to do the necessary needlework or knitting in their quiet moments. Quiet moments with this timely provision; but sad, sad moments without such help. In her efforts thus to relieve the lot of an industrious but unfortunate class, Mrs. Chidgey is ably assisted by many friends, most of them the wives of Aldermen and Councillors of the Borough. These ladies cut out the material and prepare the work beforehand, a necessary and not an easy task; but those who perform it have the satisfaction of knowing that they are helping the nation in this period of supreme trial. For effort such as this is an essential link in the chain which connects the complicated machinery of Empire. Stepney has set a splendid example in this connexion. We know of no other Borough where the Mayoress has established similar workrooms. And it is no light task to add to all the other demands made upon the first lady in the Borough at a time like this. Here we have Mrs. Chidgey opening sales of work in various localities and carrying out the numerous duties of her office in addition to the extra labour consequent upon the War. She has thrown herself heart and soul into this effort on behalf of

THE EFFORTS OF THE MAYORESS

HER POORER SISTERS.

An admirable feature of the work is that the capital, although represented by goods, remains more or less intact. The material is made up into garments, and these are sold at the actual cost of making. There is no question of a profit. The initial outlay was provided by the Mayor chiefly, but also by other friends. When the garments are made, of course, they have to be sold, otherwise the sinews of war would not be available to continue this very practical effort of assistance. Attempts are made to dispose of the goods privately, but a wider circle of purchasers is required. The Mayoress was able to sell some of the garments at the sale recently held at the residence of Mrs. George Cohen. And this week a public sale was held for two days at the Working Lads' Institute. One saw there a vast quantity of very useful and well-made clothing. The goods were all of a serviceable and useful quality and sort. Prices, too, were exceedingly moderate and those who bought certainly obtained full value, perhaps a little more than that, for their money. All manner of garments were represented, covering the needs of men, women and children. In addition to the products of the women's labour, there was a stall tastefully laden with calendars, Christmas cards and books, provided by Messrs. Gale and Polden, the well-known military printers and a choice collection of pottery. The Mayoress was willingly assisted by a number of friends in displaying the goods for sale. Among them were Mrs. George Cohen, Mrs. Barker, Mrs. Newell, Mrs. Faulkner, Mrs. Brown, Mrs. Harvey, Mrs. Forrest, Mrs. Hamlyn, Mrs. Goodman, the Misses Faulkner, Mr. A. Faulkner, Mr. W. R. Masters, Mr. Mason, Mrs. Cawthorne, Mrs. Marks, Miss Chidgey, Miss Jeffreys, Miss Mostyn, Miss Collum, and Miss Salomon. Then the Rev. Thomas Jackson kindly lent the use of the hall, and the Mayor of Stepney graced the inaugural proceedings with his presence, although there was no formal opening ceremony.

TURFING IN WANDSWORTH.

£1500 FOR UNEMPLOYED MEN.

At a meeting of the Central Unemployed Body for London yesterday a letter was received from the Local Government Board consenting to a scheme for levelling and turfing work on Wandsworth Common.

An order for the payment of £1500 as a first instalment would be sent. The work will occupy 225 men for twenty weeks.

Regarding conditions of employment generally, it was reported that there was a decline of 59 men and 20 women in the number registering last week as compared with the previous week.

The authority had nine special work-rooms for women, the maintenance of which cost £515 a week.

Yorkshire Post, Dec. 21st. 1914. 654.

It is now reported by the local Care Committees attached to London Schools that such unemployment of young people as was due to the war has passed away. The information relates to young people between 14 and 17 years of age. The chief trouble was among girls during September and October, and for obvious reasons this was a matter of grave anxiety to the Committees. By the middle of November the number of girls under 17 out of employment was less than one-half per cent. above the number for the corresponding period of last year, so that trouble at first caused by the outbreak of war has gone. It is always possible that the trouble may recur, but if it does, the experience of the last three months will be useful. All the agencies will remain mobilised.

Islington Gazette, Dec. 22nd

Mr. and Mrs. Masterman and Miss McArthur (the secretary of the Queen's Work for Women Fund) on a recent afternoon made a tour of inspection of the establishment in City-road where a considerable number of Finsbury women who lost their employment owing to the war have been provided with remunerative work in the manufacture of toys, wearing apparel, and other useful articles, which are proving welcome gifts to Belgian refugees and poor families in the borough. The Mayoress and a host of local ladies have evinced a practical interest in the scheme, and the work provided has enabled an industrious class of women and girls to tide over a period of anxiety without having to seek charitable aid.

EMPLOYMENT FOR SCOTTISH FISHERWOMEN.

Amongst the classes of workers that have been rather badly hit by the war are the fisher-people of the East of Scotland, whose ordinarily flourishing trade has within the last few months dwindled to a very fine point. The Scottish fisherwomen are, however, amongst the most skilled knitters in the world, and many of them have been enabled to add somewhat to their diminished earnings in this fashion. Quite lately the Scottish Committee on Women's Employment received an order for the immediate manufacture of 40,000 pairs of socks for the troops at the front, and with a view to securing the best of knitting, as well as giving assistance to a very deserving class of workers, the order has been placed with a number of expert knitters amongst the fisherwomen up and down the East Coast of Scotland, and especially in Aberdeenshire. Other knitting orders for socks, mittens, and the like are being arranged for in various fishing districts throughout the country.

EMPLOYMENT FOR WOMEN IN EDINBURGH.

A meeting of the Edinburgh Relief Sub-Committee on Women's Employment was held in the City Chambers this afternoon. The Committee now consists of 32 persons, representative of many women's needs throughout the city. Discussion took place upon the delay which had occurred in receiving grants from the Advisory Committee. It was nearly three weeks since an application had been made for a grant to open a workroom at Hope Park Square. It was now impossible to open the workroom until after the New Year, which was rather unfortunate as there was a long list of women ready to be taken on.

MORE GOOD NEWS.

UNEMPLOYMENT STILL DECREASING.

By Professor W. SMART.

I am aware that some responsibility attaches to one who writes anything to-day that may make us "too well pleased with ourselves." Many voices, from Lord Rosebery downwards, have been urging that we are not taking the matter seriously enough—that a bomb in the middle of a football crowd is the kind of lesson we need.

Of course it is the case that optimism may conveniently deaden the call of duty, and I fully agree that young men who, for any but the gravest reason, hold back from offering their lives when freedom itself is in danger, should be sent to Coventry till they learn better. And if anything I had to say had the tendency to make us relax our efforts I should prefer to hold my peace.

But pessimism also has its dangers. My professional interest is in the production of a national income which will be sufficient to afford the sinews of war to those who are fighting, and that our national resources for providing these sinews should be unimpaired. Now the danger which appeals to me is that the fear of "economic exhaustion" may weaken the national fibre and create an anxiety to make peace before we have ensued it. If, then, I can show that, apart from the ghastly loss of life, we may with good heart carry on the war so long as is necessary to secure the great end on which we have set our hopes—even if it be years—it seems my duty to do so.

THE OFFICIAL RETURNS FOR NOVEMBER.

On the 26th of last month I called attention to the gratifying fact that the official figure of unemployment among the great trade unions for the month of October was no more than 4.4 per cent.; that is, a percentage less than the mean of the past ten years. Like the good lady in the parable who found the piece of money she had lost, I feel inclined to call my neighbours together and ask them to rejoice with me when I find from the "Labour Gazette" just published that there is a "further marked improvement" for November, the rate having fallen to 2.9 per cent. This is practically the same as it was for July, the month preceding the war. In the unorganised trades also—as represented by the "insured trades"—the percentage of unemployment has fallen within the same month from 4.2 to 3.7—that is, lower than it was in the corresponding month of 1913. As might be expected, the industries which are noted as still adversely affected are bespoke tailoring, dressmaking, millinery, hat and collar trades, to which may be added jewellery, carpets, and cotton. On the other hand, there is much overtime in engineering, shipbuilding, cutlery, worsted, woollen, hosiery, leather, boot and shoe, and wholesale clothing trades.

A similar testimony is borne by local authorities. In a lecture delivered at the University last week by Mr Cramond, of our own Labour Exchange, he said that "unemployment was less all over Scotland than it had been at any period for a long time." To-day Mr Motion tells me that since the beginning of September the applications of that almost hopeless class, the "ins and outs," are fewer by 80 than for the same period last year; that some of "the most celebrated cases" among this class have found and taken to steady work at the shipyards; and that the pressure on the model lodging-houses is noticeably less. It would seem in fact that to some extent the "labour reserve" has been called up—employment found for many who were not up to the rising standard required by modern industry, could not find work, and were merely a burden on the community.

TESTIMONY OF EMPLOYERS.

Since writing my last article I have had occasion to look into another remarkable report on the state of employment in the United Kingdom and published by the Government, relating not to November indeed but to October. It supplements the regular information furnished monthly to the Board of Trade by the trade unions and by labour correspondents by a special inquiry made at employers. The returns were obtained from over 20,000 firms, large and small, employing 4,000,000 persons before the war, and thus, it is claimed, covering about 43 per cent. of the industrial population. Its substance is as follows:—

After an abrupt and considerable curtailment of production in August, things settled down in September, and as compared with July the returns for October show 10.7 per cent. of reduction in the number of males employed. The seriousness of this reduction vanishes, however, when it is said that this percentage is almost precisely equal to the percentage of men who have joined or been called up for the military and naval forces, and the conclusion is drawn that, compared with July, there has been no net increase in the number of unemployed, although the proportion working short time is considerable. That is to say, the apparent reduction of employment only means that a certain number of men formerly "employed" in one way are employed in another—have changed from service under private employers to serve under the Government.

It must at the same time be admitted that, as regards women, the position is not so favourable. The reduction in the number employed, as compared with July, is 6.2 per cent., and this, it must be noted, is a net displacement of labour, as women have no alternative employment in the Army. The proportion of short time also is considerable, though much less than in September. The industries most affected are the furniture trade and the cotton trade. In the furniture trade—which is an important London industry—the curtailment is due partly to this being one of the "luxury trades," partly to scarcity of a variety of raw materials. In cotton the position is much more serious, inasmuch as it employs 20 times the number of females that are employed in the furniture trade. Here, however, it must be remembered that the trade in Lancashire was already bad before the war broke out. Looking over back numbers of the "Gazette," I find that, particularly in weaving, there was short time and slackness from January onwards, and the prospects were such that the Federation employers spinning American cotton had agreed to curtail production by one-fourth from July 7 to the end of September. In July, again, in the Blackburn district "several mills, covering about 4000 workpeople, were closed down." In consideration of this we see that a great deal at least of the existing unemployment of women is not due to the war at all. But, as cotton depends more than any other important industry on foreign markets, all this was aggravated by the war. Germany, for instance, took from us in 1913 £5,000,000 of cotton yarn and nearly £2,500,000 of cotton manufactures.

Happily, however, since this return was made, we learn from the present "Labour Gazette" that, comparing the same months of 1914, the percentage of unemployment in cotton factories, which was 42.1 per cent. under the figure of August, 1913, is no more than 12.1 per cent. under the figure of November, 1913.

A STRANGE PHENOMENON.

Taking all this evidence together, I hope we fully appreciate how strange a phenomenon this keeping up of employment is. For (1) the ordinary demand of our own people for more luxuries has evidently been greatly curtailed, and, although we have few statistics, this must have had a most serious effect on the industries which provided these luxuries. But (2) our British exports, for the four months beginning with August, are only £98,000,000, as compared with £167,000,000 for the corresponding four months of 1913—a fall of 42 per cent.—while our imports of "raw materials and articles mainly unmanufactured" are only £57,000,000 as compared with £91,000,000—a fall of 37½ per cent.—which means that the demand abroad for the products of several of our great industries is seriously curtailed—to the extent, indeed, of not far from one-half—at the same time as the producing power of many of our industries is seriously crippled by want of foreign materials. In view of these two things, I repeat that it is as strange as it is gratifying that, after four months of this disastrous upheaval and dislocation both of demand and supply, practically as many of our workmen, and not far from as many of our workwomen, are employed as were before the war.

ITS EXPLANATION.

Putting the women's question on one side, if we ask what accounts for this, I suggest four explanations.

The first, and most obvious, is that the Admiralty and the War Office have made a sudden and great increase of demand on several of the large industries—all those which furnished ships, arms, and munition of war generally. New capital has been poured into these trades, overtime worked, and men transferred from other callings.

The second is that an alternative "job," not indeed so well paid but of a very attractive character on many grounds, was offered to the younger men, and that a large number have passed into this new employment. Whether but for this, they would have been unemployed or not we cannot tell; what we know is that they have sought and found employment under the State as soldiers. Now, this has so much relieved the labour market as to cause an active demand for men in most of the ordinary industries—witness the fact that, in spite of the closing of the Forth, only six labourers were attracted to the Clyde.

The third is that, apart from the more directly military equipment, the ordinary provisioning of an army occasions, in some respects, an increase of the demand on ordinary industry. It may be assumed that the Tommy does not eat more or more expensively in the trenches than he did when he was a worker in a shipyard, but almost every other part of his provisioning costs more; his uniform, for instance, costs more than his overalls did, and in war all clothes wear out at a phenomenal rate—to the great gain of Yorkshire and Northampton.

The fourth is that, beyond the extra demand for doctors, nurses, bearers, etc., a new demand has been made on a great many of the ordinary trades by the large expenses involved in the cure and convalescence of our wounded, and—what is not always noticed—by the board and lodging of our honoured guests, the Belgian refugees.

My conclusion is that both labour and capital have been found unexpectedly adaptable to the new wants and necessities of war time, and that, between new demand and additional demand, enough employment has been found to balance and compensate for the loss of employment due to the stoppage of the home demand for luxuries and the curtailment of demand from foreign countries.

BUT IS EMPLOYMENT EVERYTHING?

In view of this, most people probably will be disposed to think that all goes well with us. If the capital of the country and the men of the country are fully employed, it follows that wages are being paid and profits earned, and what more can we want?—particularly as, to all appearance, we are better off in this respect than most neutral nations, and of course ever so much better off than our arch-enemy. A question, however, emerges in the course of this investigation; it has been bothering me, and, I have no doubt, is bothering others. It is whether and how far we may be content with this. Employment is not everything. In estimating the general prosperity of a country in peace times economists at least have never been satisfied with a single test; they ask about such things as the national income, pauperism, wages, income-tax returns, savings, banking statistics, shipping, foreign trade, leisure, little luxuries, and the like. In a time of stress like this is full employment a sufficient test of our national welfare? For inside a beleaguered city everybody might be "employed" and yet everybody starving! If the editor will allow me, I should like to face this question in another article.

The Glasgow Herald, Dec: 23 rd. 1914.

LONDON CORRESPONDENCE

112 Fleet Street, Tuesday Night.

FEMALE UNEMPLOYMENT.

The extent to which the market for women's labour in London has been affected by the war is shown by the enormous increase of unemployment as compared with the corresponding period of last year. The number of applications by women to the central unemployed body for relief work a year ago was between 700 and 800 a week. Last Saturday the total reached nearly 12,000. Fortunately the growth of distress among women in the Metropolitan area has been gradual, and the authorities have been able to overhaul their machinery of organisation to cope with the winter rush that has now begun. At the beginning of the war several difficulties of a more or less novel character presented themselves. For instance, it soon became evident that many of the women who applied for work in the relief workshops established in various districts by the central unemployed body, with the consent of the Local Government Board, preferred the conditions in those workshops to those prevailing outside, and showed little desire to offer their labour in the ordinary market. This was contrary to the object for which the relief workshops were founded—namely, to provide a means of keeping women employed only so long as they were unable to obtain work from private employers. It meant that the workshops filled up almost at once, and there was no free circulation from day to day and week to week, as it was intended there should be. This state of matters has now been remedied, I understand, by a careful surveillance of the workshops by members of the Women Workers' Committee and the members of the local advisory committees which are appointed in connection with each relief workroom. The women are constantly urged to look for outside work, and in case of recalcitrance they may be dismissed. A feature of the workshops is the part they are playing in giving untrained women a skilled trade. Especially useful is the instruction in certain trades which have been improved or are relatively unaffected by the present abnormal conditions.

FEMALE EMPLOYMENT.

Training Schemes for Women and Girls.

The question of unemployment among women is one of the most urgent of the economic difficulties caused by the war. Efforts are being made to meet this problem by providing work for women, and Her Majesty the Queen has initiated a special fund for this purpose. But among the younger women and girls it is felt that something more should be done than merely giving them work to do, and that some attempt should be made to increase their economic and their civic value by supplying in addition a certain amount of training. On this question the Scottish Committee on Women's Employment has been in consultation with education authorities and with other organisations having a special knowledge of conditions among girls, and it is proposed that the School Board and the local Committees of the National Relief Fund may usefully co-operate in organising and carrying out such schemes of training.

In order to avoid any misapprehension two things must be noted—(1) There is no payment from the National Relief Fund or the Queen's Work for Women Fund to the School Board. All that comes from these funds is a grant for the maintenance of the women and girls who are unemployed through the war, and who earn the grant by following an approved course of training. The School Board, on the other hand, under the continuation classes code, provides the educational opportunities without charge. (2) The scheme of training is not to keep girls and women from ordinary employment when the opportunity of returning to it is offered. On the contrary, all such women and girls as receive grants for maintenance are to be registered at the Labour Exchange, and their claim to maintenance would cease if they refused to accept suitable work when offered to them.

The schemes which are at present under consideration include both trade instruction and practical domestic training similar to that already given in the "Mothers' Classes" for which are well known in Edinburgh and

Daily News & Leader, Dec. 23rd. 1914.

APPEAL FOR WOMEN IN DISTRESS.

Plight of Professional Classes.

One of the earliest problems of war distress, and one of the acutest still, is the position of the professional woman, particularly the woman typist—or secretary, whose means of livelihood were in thousands of cases cut off sharp in the first week or fortnight of August.

Without drawing invidious social distinctions, it may be assumed as generally agreed that professional women cannot suitably be encouraged to go before a local relief committee and apply to it either for work or money-relief on the statutory scale—a fact which the Government Committee on the Prevention and Relief of Distress has recognised by appointing a Professional Classes Sub-Committee to deal specifically with this and kindred problems.

Unfortunately, in spite of the work of this sub-committee and the operation of certain schemes initiated by the Central Committee on Women's Employment, a great deal of ground appears to remain still uncovered, largely no doubt on account of the difficulty of improvising suitable employment and the undesirability of merely distributing money-doles.

Under these circumstances, the National Union of Women's Suffrage Societies—having first ascertained that its action would involve no overlapping with existing schemes—has inaugurated a fund, known as the Professional Women's Patriotic Service Fund, to defray the cost of paying salaries to unemployed professional women whose services it proposes should be placed at the disposal of various organisations of public utility in which experienced workers are urgently needed.

The scheme will incur no expense whatever in material. The whole of the sum subscribed will be expended in paying the salaries at the standard rates. There will not be any cost of administration, as the N.U.W.S.S. is able to provide office accommodation and sufficient staff and equipment to carry out the work.

The National Union is appealing publicly for funds to enable it to carry out a piece of work which should do much to alleviate the distress inflicted by the war on numbers of women who because they suffer in silence do not suffer the less acutely.

Western Morning News, Dec: 26th. 1914.

EMPLOYMENT FOR DISTRESSED WOMEN.

SIR,—In view of the distress caused by the war to the educated woman worker, the Conservative and Unionist Women's Franchise Association has now opened a hostel at 9, Roland-gardens, South Kensington, for the reception of ladies who are either being trained or are seeking employment.

Guests will be maintained free of charge for a period of one month, at the end of which time, if no employment has been found, their case will be reconsidered. All applicants must be of British birth, and must provide two personal references.

Sufficient funds have been subscribed by the members of the Conservative and Unionist Women's Franchise Association and their friends to enable the committee to keep the hostel open for six months. The greater part of the furniture has also been given or lent by members and their friends. The National Food Fund is contributing a portion of the food supply.

All applications must be made in the first place in writing to the secretary of the Conservative and Unionist Women's Franchise Association, 48, Dover-street, Piccadilly, W., who will forward a form of application to be filled in.

DRESSMAKER'S APPEAL.

To the Editor of "The Standard."

Sir,—I have read the article of the appeal to Englishwomen to support the trade of dressmakers, and I am very grateful for the patriotic Londoner's appeal. I am a Frenchwoman, but entirely English at heart; my household is English and my workgirls are English. We all have had to suffer terribly since the war broke out, as at once all the orders were stopped.

If things are going on as at present I fear I shall have to close my business, a thing which would break my heart, as I love it so much. We do not mind working cheaply or doing anything in the shape of work or serving so long as the girls can be kept going until the spring, when I hope all things will brighten up.—I am, Sir, yours truly,

HELENE DENEL,

WORK FOR UNEMPLOYED GIRLS.

At the St. Pancras Workrooms, established under the Central Committee on Women's Employment and the Queen's Fund, at Lyndhurst Hall, Kentish Town, a three months' training scheme for unemployed girls between the ages of 17 and 25 has been put into operation. Five weeks are to be spent at dressmaking, five weeks at tailoring, and two weeks at cooking, in each instance under qualified teachers. The girls are mainly drawn from West-end houses which have had to cut down their workroom staffs, and by acquiring a knowledge now of the tailoring trade, will be prepared for vacancies in either class of workroom when high-class trade begins to improve. In the dressmaking rooms millinery is also taught.

Nothing is bought for these rooms, even the hooks and eyes, cut from the dresses that have been given, doing duty again, and all buttons used being also obtained in this way or made in the workroom. In the tailoring room old riding habits that have been given are remodelled.

THE EMPLOYMENT OF WOMEN.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE MORNING POST.

SIR,—Some ladies are defending the purchase of new, fashionable, and costly dresses and hats on the ground of keeping the shopwomen in employment. If the only alternative to this were the hoarding of the money, it would certainly be the better course. But it is surely better to spend it on employing labour in making necessaries for our soldiers, sailors, and the destitute, rather than on superfluous adornment for ourselves. The question is not—Shall we employ labour? but, How shall we employ it?

Again; ladies have been told that it is better to pay unemployed women to make shirts and other garments rather than to make them themselves. There are, however, many ladies who cannot afford to pay for this work, but who can give their own, and their time to it; while everyone has some limit to her means. Whichever method we adopt, we are not likely to provide more than will be needed.

But further: the workrooms can only accommodate an infinitesimal proportion of those thrown out of work; if more ladies, instead of buying expensive new clothes, would be content with renovating or "doing up" what they have, they might thus employ in their own houses many of the dressmakers and milliners whose special training is not required for shirt-making and plain needlework. These women would thus receive their wages direct, instead of through a firm and would in addition obtain at least one good meal in the day. All those ladies who renovate their own clothes in this manner know the difficulty of finding trustworthy and clever workers for the purpose and of finding them disengaged, so great is the run on them. At the present moment an increasing number of ladies are denying themselves new clothes and renovating their old ones, so that the demand for these women workers is greater than ever.

The committee of the Chelsea work-room now located in the Court Theatre are sending out many of their women for this work to private houses, and have now undertaken to keep a register to which ladies may apply for them. Perhaps other work-rooms are doing the same; but if all would keep such a register and take steps to make it known, it would go some way towards the relief of women's unemployment. And if through war in the first instance we arrived permanently at a simpler way of living, the reduction of luxuries, and the more useful employment of labour, it would be no small blessing.—Yours, &c.

HERE AND THERE.

OTHER WORK FOR DRESSMAKERS.

With reference to what appeared in this column on Tuesday about the distress amongst local dressmakers, a kindly correspondent, anxious to help, tells me that if the young ladies who are short of work will only change their calling slightly, they can get as much work as they want. He suggests that they shall either enter the clothing trade or the blouse-making industry, both of which are very busy. By the latter, he means, of course, the wholesale blouse-making business, of which there is a considerable amount done in the town. There is so much dearth of labour in this direction, he says, that at least one local firm has had to advertise in other towns to try to secure girls for the work. I should imagine, too, that the young dressmakers would have little difficulty in getting employment in some of our busy hosiery factories.

GIRLS AND FACTORIES.

The trouble is that many girls have become dressmakers largely because they wished to avoid going into factories, and to some extent one applauds them for the course they have taken. The average factory is not quite the place for a girl of quiet tastes and refined thought, as many girls, even from working-class homes, undoubtedly are. I can imagine many a working-class girl, brought up by her parents to habits of self-control and self-respect, shrinking, with a holy dread, from becoming a worker in a factory. Many people will regard this feeling as stupid pride, or "swank." Sometimes it is, but in far more cases it is simply refinement of thought and feeling that is responsible for the hatred of all idea of work in a factory.

THE FAULT OF MANUFACTURERS.

For the prevalance of this feeling I fear the manufacturers are to some extent blameworthy. If they were to take more interest in their workrooms and endeavour to attract to them workers on a higher plane of education and culture, they would at the same time attract workers of higher intelligence. There would be no need for raising wages to get this higher intelligence. Many girls who work as dressmakers, as milliners, or who serve behind counters, accept low wages at these occupations, and work long hours, just because they want a form of work which shall be reasonably free from coarseness, vulgarity, and nastiness.

BETTER THAN STARVING.

In writing the above I must not be taken as trying to discourage any young dressmaker from entering a factory. In the first place there are factories to be found wherein the girls are encouraged to conduct themselves in a lady-like way, and are speedily brought to book for any outbursts of roughness of conduct. If an out-of-work dressmaker can get entry into such a place she ought not to let any false notion of pride prevent her from seizing the opportunity of easing her financial position. The hard-pressed dressmaker, too, should remember that even amongst the roughest girls it would be possible for her to retain her own refinements, if she were careful and tactful—never allowing herself to put on the pose of a superior person. If she could bring herself to accept employment in a factory, her influence might be very efficacious in improving the tone of the room in which she worked. But the task would be hard—so hard that I do not blame any girl for shrink from it.

WAR AND THE SHOE TRADE.

Plenty of Work, but Much Sickness.

WOMEN WORKERS WANTED.

The war has had a remarkable effect on the boot and shoe trade, especially in the districts more closely concerned with Government requirements. This is common knowledge locally, but probably the position was not appreciated at its true value in the absence of definite figures showing exactly the state of employment in the trade.

The writer of a series of special articles in the "Daily Citizen" on "Trade Unionism in Time of War" deals to-day with the boot and shoe trade. He points out that the war broke out at one of the quietest seasons of the industry, and the first effect of the war was panic—unemployment going up alarmingly. Then Army orders came pouring in, and unemployment rushed down again even more quickly than it went up.

Comparative figures for Leicester and Northampton show an amazing result. For September, October, and November of last year the numbers of unemployed on the books were as follows:—

	Sep.	Oct.	Nov
Leicester (No. 1 branch)	203	232	168
Leicester (No. 2 branch)	47	74	39
Northampton (No 1 branch) ...	174	163	109
Northampton (No. 2 branch) ...	154	163	76

For the same months of this year the figures were:—

Leicester (No. 1 branch)	116	162	82
Leicester (No. 2 branch)	116	57	9
Northampton (No. 1 branch) ...	40	6	nil
Northampton (No. 2 branch) ...	60	26	11

In effect the above figures mean that out of a total membership of 20,506 for the two towns, only 102 were unemployed in November. So far as women and girls are concerned there is nearly always plenty of work in peace time, but at present the demand for women workers is so great that Mr. E. L. Poulton states that he could find work for 40 alone in one factory in Leicester. A tremendous lot of overtime is being worked, and some of the places are running Saturday afternoons and Sundays, for which the full rates of wages are being paid. During the holiday season instead of the factories closing until January 4th, as usual, they are re-opening on Monday, December 28th.

The writer states that, speaking generally, the demands of the Union with respect to conditions and wages are being fully met; but, he adds, the excessive overtime is causing a comparative reduction of output and a considerable increase of sickness.

There are no fewer than 3,161 financial members of the Union on active service, representing a loss in contributions in November alone of over £318. All these men retain their cards and will be in full Union benefit when they return home. Funeral claims are being paid to the wives of men who die on active service, while those who return incapacitated and resume their Union payments will still be eligible for benefit. In this connection it is recognised that the Union is building up a very big future liability. Great discrimination and far-seeing judgment will be required to guide the Union through the difficulties it will undoubtedly experience after the war is over.

Yorkshire Post,

Careful inquiries made by societies interested in the employment of women, go to show that the steady decline in the number of workless women is only in a small degree due to recovery in certain branches of industry where women were discharged at the beginning of the war. Most of the unemployed women are to be found in the cotton trade. A small proportion of women in this industry have found employment in place of men serving with the Colours. For similar reasons there is a greater demand for women in other occupations where dislocation has resulted. The Labour organisations under feminist influences are rather gratified at what they call the opening of new careers for women, but Labour leaders associated with the clerical workers are of opinion that the first effect of the influx of women will be a lowering of wages. Watch is being kept for such cases, and it is proposed to take national action to deal with any attempted reductions. What seems, however, to give an air of insincerity to this attitude is that, almost without exception, the unions themselves have reduced the salaries and wages of their staffs.

Southport Visiter, Dec: 26th. 1914.. 654 II/51 656.

SOUTHPORT NATIONAL AID COMMITTEE.

THE MONEY RAISED BY SOUTHPORT.

Record of Work since the War began.

At a meeting of the Southport National Aid Committee, on Friday, December 18th, the Mayor (Mr. Councillor Willett) presiding, the chairmen of the various sub-committees submitted statements as to the work done by the different sub-committees to date.

The Chairman of the Employment Committee (Mr. E. G. Wood) stated that this committee was appointed with the following primary duty: "To observe the existing conditions of labour in the locality and to consider what measures might be adopted to prevent and alleviate distress if and when it occurs." With this object in view the committee gave instructions for information to be obtained as to the existing conditions and prospects of the various trades in the borough, and circulars were sent to 500 employers of labour asking them for information as to the present and future prospects of employment. The Trade Unions were also asked to furnish for the guidance of the Committee information in their possession or control as to the existing conditions of employment in Southport.

The result of the replies to such circular went to show that with the exception of the various sections of the building trade, the printing trade, and those trades employing female labour, such as drapers and milliners, the conditions were satisfactory under the circumstances, and did not appear to call for any action on the part of the Committee at the present time.

With regard to the building trade, the residents and others in the Borough were requested through the public Press to put work in hand as far as possible and give orders so as to maintain employment. The position amongst joiners particularly has been relieved by the building by contract of huts for the War Office and the Corporation sewerage and other works.

The Committee have applied to the Board of Trade Labour Exchange for their co-operation, and the local officers have been instructed by the Board of Trade to give all possible assistance, and work in harmony with the Committee. The Committee have had the advantage of reports as to the labour market from the manager of the local Exchange, and have co-opted him a member of the Committee. With regard to the printing trade, since the return was obtained by the Committee, employment in this trade has improved.

UNEMPLOYMENT AMONGST WOMEN.

With regard to the question of unemployment amongst women, a scheme has been prepared by a sub-committee of the Ladies' Auxiliary working in connection with the Queen's Work for Women Fund, by which employment is found for women and girls who are out of work, in the making of toys, etc., for sale. This scheme was a very interesting experiment, upon which the ladies concerned, including Mrs. Henry Nicholl, Mrs. Rowntree, Mrs. Hindley Smith, Mrs. T. Walker, and others are to be congratulated, and up to the present has been very successful, as the following return will show:—"The work has gone on steadily since it opened. This week there are 20 women and girls in the workroom, the highest number for any week being 39. Since the troops came into the town unemployment in Southport has been very little, and personally, I consider there is scarcely any unemployment among women owing to the war in Southport. A rough estimate has been made of the expenses in connection with the toy department, and it was found that the money received for toys had covered the expense of materials and labour, which is, I think, a highly satisfactory result, especially when compared with similar workrooms, reports of which have appeared in the newspapers."

The local conditions generally speaking are very much more favourable than could have been expected, and matters generally have been very much modified by the effects of billeting a large number of troops in the town, and the weekly expenditure of several thousands of pounds which is distributed so widely amongst householders and tradespeople, and persons depending upon them for employment.

CASE COMMITTEE'S WORK.

The Chairman of the Case Committee (Mr. W. J. Boothroyd) reported that since the appointment of the committee after the outbreak of the war 174 applications for assistance in cases of civil distress have ben made to this committee. Up to the 12th December, of these cases three were pending inquiry, and had not been adjudicated upon.

Fifty-three applications had for various reasons not been entertained. In the majority of such cases there was not in the opinion of the committee distress owing to the war, which it is the purpose of the fund to relieve.

The number of cases helped amount to a total of 118. The average weekly number of cases helped is 60, but the weekly number of cases is now higher than that figure.

In a number of cases work has been found as the form of assistance most acceptable, and in this direction a number of women have been helped by being employed to make garments which have been given to the Belgian refugees, so that a double object has been achieved.

Applications for relief are received at 2, Church-street, and are considered and dealt with by the committee twice weekly, and the invaluable assistance rendered by the ladies is much appreciated, their work of inquiry and registration being most efficiently conducted.

THE LADIES' AUXILIARY.

The Secretary of the Ladies' Auxiliary (Mrs. Hindley-Smith) reported that the inaugural meeting of the Ladies' Auxiliary was held August 10th, 1914. From this was formed five sub-committees:—(1) Sewing Guild. (2) Ambulance and Nursing. (3) Civil Distress. (4) Women's Employment. (This rather later.) (5) The Sailors and Soldiers' Families Association. (The members of this were already in existence). (1) The Sewing Committee have sent out up to the present time 20,771 garments. These have been given to local men in the 7th King's (Liverpool Regiment), both at Canterbury, Blackpool, and Bootle, and Sevenoaks. Also to the local men who have recruited for Kitchener's Army and for local men in the Naval Reserve, and for the Southport Infirmary and many other military hospitals. The troops billeted in town have also had 6000 garments sent to them. The money for providing these garments has been entirely provided by the Southport public, also a great deal of material has been given, including a gift of 600 yards of shirting from the Finance Committee. A large number of the garments are sent in as gifts from the work societies in town, and those in some cases are sent marked for special despatch. The committee have also provided a great number of garments for the dependants of soldiers and sailors, and also provided the sewing to be paid for in connection with the Case Committee. (2) Ambulance and Nursing: St. John Ambulance lectures were held at the Science and Art Schools, Southport; also by Dr. Fenn for Birkdale and Ainsdale. Smaller classes have been held by Drs. Swete-Evans, Schofield, Harker, Penrose, and McKay and Horn. Ninety-five per cent. of all the students have successfully passed the examinations and hold the St. John Ambulance Certificate. (3) Civil Distress: Applications for assistance on account of civil distress are made at 2, Church-street. The work of this comes before the Case Committee, and will be fully reported from there. (4) Women's Employment: A full report of this was sent to the Employment Committee, and will be enfolded in the report of the secretary. The workroom for women and girls was opened on October 5th, 1914. On the first day 14 were employed; the number soon rose to 39, and now is down to 16 again. There were no applications this week. Since the opening 51 have been employed. Over 3000 toys have been made; these have paid for labour and material. The garments have in the bulk been orders, therefore the material has been paid for, but the labour has not quite been covered. (5) It is not possible to say much about the S. and S.F.A. It is worked under certain rules and regulations that have changed fairly constantly. The separation allowance is now paid through the Post Office. Until this comes money has been advanced most kindly by the town: most of this has been repaid. There are over 600 cases on the books. Where money is received direct from the Post Office the S. and S.F.A. only make an allowance on the rent.

FINANCE SUB-COMMITTEE.

The Mayor, as Chairman of the Finance Committee, reported that the ex-Mayor (Councillor Dr. Limont) opened a local branch of the Prince of Wales' National Relief Fund.

The Finance Sub-Committee was appointed to assist the Mayor to obtain subscriptions to the Prince of Wales' National Fund, and also to obtain proper grants from that fund for the expenditure of the committee, and to allocate to the various sub-committees, and generally to exercise financial control.

In accordance with these instructions the committee have from time to time considered various ways and means of augmenting the various funds opened by the Mayor in connection with the war.

As a result of a communication from the Central Office of the National Relief Fund, the Mayor opened a special local fund for local needs, and as a result of the opening of such fund no demand has as yet been made on the Prince of Wales' Fund.

In addition to opening these two funds, his predecessor (Dr. Limont) also opened a local Belgian Relief Fund and a local Princess Mary's Sailors and Soldiers' Christmas Fund, and since I came into office I also opened an account in connection with the King Albert and His People's Christmas Fund.

He was pleased to report that all these funds have been well supported by the people of Southport, and that the amounts collected for the several funds are, up to Wednesday last, as follow:—

	£	s.	d.
Prince of Wales' National Relief Fund	10,231	8	8
The Mayor's Local War Fund	3,147	9	8
The Belgian Relief Fund	1,250	15	6
The Princess Mary's Sailors and Soldiers' Christmas Fund	68	19	2
King Albert and His People's Fund	139	0	0
	£14,837	13	0

In accordance with instructions received from the General Committee the sub-committee have considered the scheme presented by Dr. Bentall for the establishment of a hospital for wounded and convalescent soldiers, and after very careful consideration, and in view of the offers already made by existing institutions to take in wounded and convalescent soldiers, and also especially in view of the announcement of the billeting of a large number of troops in the town during the present winter, the sub-committee could not recommend the committee at present to proceed with the scheme.

WOUNDED BELGIAN SOLDIERS.

Mr. J. J. Barlow reported as to the wounded Belgian soldiers, who had been in Southport during the last two or three months. In all there were 50, distributed as follow:—The Infirmary 7, Convalescent Hospital 10, Hydropathic Hospital 7, Homœopathic Hospital 19, Isolation Hospital 7; total 50. The majority suffered from bullet and shrapnel wounds in the hands and arms, which in six cases necessitated the amputation of one or more fingers; in some instances, rendering the men useless for any further actual fighting. All the cases progressed favourably under the excellent care they received at the hands of the medical and nursing staff. The attention and hospitality they received from the public during their stay has been lavish, not to say at times, embarrassing, and it is no wonder that all of them, whilst recognising their duty to their gallant country, were loth to leave our hospitable borders.

The Belgian Military Authorities arranged with the Salvation Army in various parts of the Country to have those who were fit sent to the Salvation Army quarters in Quaker-street, London, where they are further examined, and if deemed fit drafted to the Continent. The first batch left here on November 30th, followed by further batches on the 4th and 14th December. There now remain 10—eight at the Homœopathic Hospital, one at the Infirmary, and one at the Isolation Hospital—who are not yet fit to return. These will probably be here till the New Year.

NOT PAYING FOR WORK DONE.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE MORNING POST.

SIR,—I am interested in the letter signed by Miss M. H. Mason in your issue of the 24th inst. on the subject of the employment of women. In addition to the remarks already made I would wish to draw attention to the disastrous habit which some of our best-dressed women fall into of not paying for work done. I know of very sad cases where the workers (dressmakers and milliners) are left so long unpaid that ruin has overtaken them from not being able to pay in their turn for the expensive material they have provided. I have always felt that rich women should dress richly and so contribute to the wealth of manufacturers, and the question of what should be spent on ourselves in dress is equally true of what we should spend on ourselves in food. As I also know, bakers and butchers and dairies are kept in cruel suspense as to how to meet their liabilities in consequence of the long delay in receiving payment from their customers. Fine clothes are a luxury, and so are expensive articles of food, butter, eggs, plenty of milk, and the best items out of our butchers' and grocers' shops. It is a good test as to what we really can afford to spend on luxuries to pay at least once a week every coin we owe and consider what remains in our purse as our own to spend. We are otherwise living dishonestly on charity.—Yours, &c.,

PREVENTING UNEMPLOYMENT.

Not the least valuable part of the activities of the Central Committee on Women's Employment has been its efforts to obtain orders for firms which would otherwise be at a standstill. Thus, during the last few days an order for khaki clothing sufficient to maintain a considerable number of women in employment for several months has been obtained for a large firm at Liverpool where distress existed among the employees. In the same way, a mantle factory in London on the advice of the committee tendered to the War Office for a contract for 8,000 great coats.

The committee has also interested itself in the increase of the supply of khaki clothing, and certain carpet-weaving factories have been led to arrange to manufacture this cloth on a great scale. These firms have now tendered to the War Office and to the Allied Governments for orders which, if given, will lead to the re-employment of some thousands of girls and women weavers reduced by the stoppage of the carpet trade to idleness.

It is creditable to the committee and to Mr. J. J. Mallon, who supervises this side of its work, that the organisation created is capable at short notice of adjusting itself to fresh demands. A fortnight ago an order to make 7,000 flannel belts was suddenly offered on condition that the belts were finished in five days. The order was taken and satisfactorily executed in the specified time.

The work of the Contracts Department, it should be noted, is entirely self-supporting, and does not involve expenditure from the National Relief Funds.

One of the new trades suggested by the Central Committee on Women's Employment for giving work to women is the making of doll's tea-sets. This work is now progressing favourably in the Potteries, particularly at Stoke-on-Trent. One firm reports that they are able to employ more women than they have been able to do for a long time by reason of this new industry.

Before the war, the doll's tea-sets were all made in Germany, and the demand for them, particularly this Christmas time, was large. The shop-keepers at Stoke have themselves urged the manufacturers to take up this class of work. Since it has been begun, there has been a quick sale for the British-made article. Toy dinner, tea, dessert, and toilet sets are being made by a process which is easy for the girls to learn, and at which they can speedily earn good wages. One employer reports to the committee that he is also copying German vases of good shape and pattern, for which there are good orders. Employment is thus being found for an additional number of women.

The making of boxes for the tea-sets will give further work to women, while the packing is another definite employment. If the suggestions of the committee are followed, the latter will be developed into an art as it is in Germany.

WORKROOM FOR UNEMPLOYED CITY TYPISTS.

The City of London Committee of the Prince of Wales's National Relief Fund yesterday opened at the disused police station in Bridewell-place, Blackfriars, a workroom to give employment to a number of young women and girls—typists in the City—who have been thrown out of situations through the war. The expenses will be paid from the Queen's "Work for Women" Fund.

About 50 girls are being dealt with at present, though gradually about 210 will be taken in. For the moment needlework and domestic economy are being taught, but, later on, other subjects will be added. Small wages are being paid. There are classes for cookery and the meals prepared are sold to the pupils for a nominal sum.

LADY CLERKS IN BANKS.

LONDON PROBLEM AND ITS PROBABLE EFFECT.

LOWERING OF SALARIES.

In the "Bank Clerks' Review" a secretary of the National Association of Bank Clerks discusses the question of the employment of lady clerks in London banks owing to the serious shortage in the supply of male clerical assistance due to the war.

"The question for bank clerks to decide," says the writer, "is whether this emergency innovation is likely to be a permanency, and, if so, how it will affect the banking profession?"

He anticipates that a large number of the clerks who have enlisted will never return to the banks. Some may be killed, others permanently disabled, while a certain proportion may adopt either the Army or some other sphere of activity as their permanent career after the campaign.

"It is therefore," he says, "quite likely that the female clerks who are employed during the war will become permanent members of the staffs of the banks." He fears that the result will be a reduction of wages and salaries among the male staffs.

MORE WOMEN AT WORK.

Careful inquiries made by societies interested in the steady employment of women go to show that the steady decline in the number of workless women is only in a small degree due to recovery in certain branches of industry where women were discharged at the beginning of the war. Most of the unemployed women are to be found in the cotton trade. A small proportion of women in this industry have found employment in place of men serving with the colours. WAR AND TRADE.

SATISFACTORY FIGURES.

The Board of Trade announce that in the trades compulsorily insured against unemployment, namely, building, works of construction, engineering, shipbuilding, vehicle making, &c., the percentage of unemployment at Dec. 24 was 3.24, as compared with 3.28 the previous week, 3.69 a month previous, and 4.64 a year ago.

These figures relate to the whole of the United Kingdom, and include all unemployed workmen in the insured trades. It will be seen that the rate of unemployment in these trades remains below the level of a year ago. As regards the uninsured trades, the number of men and women on the registers of the Labour Exchanges at Dec. 24 shows a decrease on the figure of the previous week, being 34,883 as compared with 42,633. For men alone the corresponding figures were 14,330 and 17,263, and for women 20,553 and 25,370. These figures may be affected by the Christmas holidays.

WORKROOMS FOR WOMEN.

Experience has shown that in Liverpool female workers have been much more adversely affected by the war than men. As a consequence efforts are being put forward to make up to them in some measure for the loss of employment by the opening of two workrooms, one at 111, Shaw-street, and the other in the disused Council Schools in Oakes-street. Here at the present moment work is being found for over 200 women, the wages of the majority being paid by the Relief Sub-committee of the Prince of Wales' Fund, and of some others by the Soldiers' and Sailors' Families Organisation. So far the employment provided has not clashed with the work ordinarily done in previously existing workrooms or factories in Liverpool, but it is becoming increasingly difficult to find work of this description, which largely consists of the repairing and making up of linen and clothing presented for the purpose, and afterwards distributed among the hospitals and the poor. Many children will shortly be returning to school after the holidays and if parents when fitting them out with new garments will send the old ones to either of the workrooms they will be gratefully appreciated. Such gifts will serve the double purpose of assisting to provide employment for many women and enabling the committee to continue the distribution of clothing among poor children. Parcels of clothing can be sent to the superintendent at either of the workrooms mentioned.

WOMEN AND THE WAR.

PROVISION OF EMPLOYMENT.

DISTRESS COMMITTEES' CONFERENCE.

THE question of providing work for unemployed women in times of distress was under consideration yesterday at a conference of the Distress Committees of Scotland, held in the City Chambers, Glasgow. The meeting was called "to consider and devise a national policy in regard to making provision for unemployed women, and to arrange for collective action being taken to carry out same."

Bailie M'Clure, chairman of Glasgow Distress Committee, presided, and representatives were present from the Distress Committees in Glasgow, Aberdeen, Paisley, Leith, Edinburgh, Greenock, and Dundee.

At the outset, the Chairman said he hoped that a discussion on their past experiences in dealing with the unemployment of women would result in suggestions which would enable them to meet circumstances that might arise when the war is over.

Councillor Alston stated that employment was very good at the moment, and as long as the war lasted, although everyone hoped it would not last long, there was no danger of the problem of unemployed women arising. But wisdom suggested that now was the time to prepare for the possibilities of the future.

In answer to Miss Lees, Edinburgh, Mr Alston stated that at the outbreak of war a much superior class of women than before made application to the Glasgow Distress Committee for employment.

Miss Irwin, Glasgow, suggested that in every large centre a permanent emergency workroom should be established, where respectable women temporarily out of employment could be placed for a short period until work was procured for them.

Bailie Russell, Greenock, supported the suggestion of the previous speaker.

Mr Robertson, Leith, said the situation in Leith at present gave them little or no concern. The problem, in fact, was one of finding labour, not of finding employment.

Since the outbreak of the war, said Miss Lees, Edinburgh, the women had shown a remarkable adaptability. What was wanted now were new trades. They went into shops and were told that they could not get certain articles because they had been made in Germany or Austria. Why, she asked, doesn't some man with a head for machinery and organisation set up machinery to make these articles?

Mr Banks and Mrs Boëmé, Edinburgh; Bailies Kelly and Keddie, Leith; and Bailie Baird, Paisley, also addressed the meeting.

Thereafter Councillor Alston moved a resolution to the effect that Distress Committees approach the Local Government Board for the amendment of the Unemployed Workman's Act to enable them to undertake the training of girls for new professions or to subsidise girls in training for new professions; to establish a workroom, to be open all the year round, in order to deal with applications at once, and to enable them to deal with the training of women for agricultural purposes, so that they would be able to take up professions in that line and become self-supporting in such businesses as poultry keeping, vegetable production, &c.

Mr Banks seconded the resolution, which was unanimously carried.

It was agreed to send copies of the resolution to the various Distress Committees recommending its adoption by them. The Conference agreed to meet again in a month.

WORK IN WARTIME.

FEWER UNEMPLOYED.

OFFICIAL RECORD OF IMPROVING INDUSTRY.

Based mainly on returns received from 23,000 industrial firms employing about 4,000,000 workpeople—roughly 43 per cent. of the industrial population—a report was issued by the Board of Trade yesterday showing the state of unemployment in the United Kingdom in December.

The improvement which was noted in the report for October has continued. In October the reduction in the number of male workpeople employed, compared with July, was 10.7 per cent., while the percentage joining the Forces up to that date was 10.6 per cent., so that allowing for enlistment there was practically no net increase of unemployment as between July and October. By December the reduction in the number of male workpeople employed had fallen to 10.6 per cent., while the percentage joining the Forces had risen to 13.3. There had, therefore, from July to December, been an actual diminution in the number unemployed, representing 2.7 per cent. of the male workpeople in industry. The favourable tendency shown by the statistics is emphasised by the figures for short time and overtime. The number of men on short time has been reduced from 17.3 per cent. in October to 10.8 per cent. in December, while the percentage on overtime has risen from 5.2 per cent. to 13.0 per cent. Women were more seriously affected by the war than men, but the recent improvement in their case has been almost equally marked. As compared with July the reduction in the numbers employed was 3.2 per cent. in December, as against 6.2 in October. Short time has fallen from 26 per cent. to 19.1 per cent., while overtime has increased from 5.9 per cent. to 10.8 per cent.

Trades Affected.

The trades which show the largest contraction of employment are the building, cotton, and furniture trades, but in many industries a shortage of labour rather than a lack of employment has become the chief feature of the situation. It is pointed out that the percentages given above as "joining the Forces" do not by any means represent the number of recruits enlisted. They relate solely to men known by their employers to have left industrial employment for the purpose of joining the Forces. Thus they do not include any recruits who enlisted while unemployed, or whose occupation was not industrial. On the other hand, they include Reservists, besides new recruits. The report further indicates that while for September and October the contraction of the numbers employed among males exceeded the numbers known to have joined the Forces, in December the position is reversed, and the numbers known to have joined the Forces ex-he contraction of the numbers employed. Thus, and other mines, iron and steel, shipbuilding, engineering, wool and worsted, boot and shoe, leather, chemical, timber, hosiery, and food industries, is the fact that, in spite of the abundance of Government orders, and the keen demand for labour, there is a marked increase in enlistment in each. In all these trades those who have joined the Forces have been replaced to a very large extent, and there is much more overtime than short time. In the coal trade there is still some short time—chiefly in the north-east coalfield and the East Midlands. In timber there is almost as much short time as overtime—an illustration of the unequal distributio of good trade. The improvement in the chemical ade is not only the consequence of the stoppage German imports into the home market, but is ir art due to an expansion of exports; for the trade returns of the last three months show an increase which is doubtless due to a shortage of certain German chemicals in neutral markets. The woollen and worsted trades show better results than ever, partly owing to the fact that worsted is now being used extensively for uniforms. The prosperity is therefore more widespread than before. The very high unemployment figure for women in the "food" group is largely to be accounted for by the condition of the fish-curing trades, where the normal seasonal depression has this year been accentuated on the East Coast by the restriction on fishing in the North Sea.

Pottery, Linen, and Jute.

The second group of trades comprises glass, china, and earthenware, &c., linen, hemp, and jute, paper and printing, clothing, and the cycle, motor, and carriage trades. In all of them there is a net replacement of men, enlistment more than accounting for the contraction of male employment. None the less there are features of these trades either unsatisfactory or calling for explanatory comment. In the Potteries, which are predominant in the glass, china, &c., group, there is a large amount of short time, less than in October it is true, but still amounting to 19.5 per cent. in the case of men and 34.9 per cent. in the case of women. The linen, hemp, and jute group also show a considerable amount of short time—chiefly the linen trade. This trade is, indeed, one of the few where the condition of things was worse in December than in October; linen depends largely on supplies of flax from Russia, and the closing of the Baltic by the war has caused a serious shortage. The jute trade, too, though there are here and there complaints of a shortage of men, is not in an entirely satisfactory condition. The paper and printing trades have benefited much less than usual from the Christmas season, and mention is made of the diminution in catalogues.

The Clothing Trade.

The clothing trades head includes several sections which are rather depressed, e.g., dressmaking and millinery. Hence, though shirtmaking and wholesale tailoring show a great deal of additional employment, the result for the whole group is fairly normal. In this industry the effect of the war entirely depends on the extent to which the individuals in the depressed sections have been transferred to other branches. Women's labour is, however, never so mobile as men's, and the adjustment will only take place freely if the various sections of the trade already happen to exist in the same locality, or if new forms of employment can be started and contracts given in localities where formerly only one branch was carried on. The sections which remain most depressed are high-class dressmaking and bespoke tailoring, while laundries are experiencing a good deal of short time.

Other Occupations.

There has been a considerable improvement in the cycle, motor, and carriage trades, but the building trade stands out as the one important industry which shows results greatly inferior to those of October. On the other hand, the furniture trade is somewhat better. A number of manufacturers with wood-working plants are occupied on Government orders for ammunition boxes, but the "luxury" side of the trade remains, and must be expected to remain, depressed. A scheme which has been set on foot in London under Government auspices for training upholsterers and cabinetmakers in the saddlery trade is worthy of note as an instance of an attempt by industrial training to meet the problem of transference. There has been a marked renewal of employment in the jewellery and musical instrument trades.

Employment in the cotton trade shows an appreciable improvement. The net contraction of men employed has fallen from 10.1 per cent. to 3.7 per cent., and the contraction of women has fallen from 14.2 per cent. to 9.3 per cent.; short time has also decreased. This improvement has been in spite of some unfavourable factors, for example, the cutting off of the Turkish market. There has been some increase in Government orders for cotton goods.

Sacrifice for Defence.

With regard to enlistment it is pointed out that although recruiting is no doubt encouraged by unemployment, the prosperity or depression of a trade is by no means the only factor in determining the percentage of enlistment; for in some of the most prosperous trades the percentage is very high and seems to be the cause of a good deal of overtime among those who remain at home. Enlistment from Government offices has been heavy—about 15 per cent.—and it has been necessary to fill places temporarily on a large scale. Returns from 460 local authorities show that over 19,700 persons have been taken on to fill the places of 27,783 who have joined the Colours. As regards the professions, the general tenor of such reports as come to hand is that while business is restricted it does not yet involve any considerable amount of distress. Business has fallen off particularly heavily in the legal profession, but the decline is compensated from the employers' point of view by the enlistment of a very large percentage of lawy clerks. The musical profession has also suffered rath heavily, but apparently more in London than in th provinces. Male school teachers are scarcer than eve owing to heavy enlistment, and places are being filled by women to such an extent that a shortage of women teachers is reported. Artists and architects seem to be among the worst hit of the professional classes. As regards domestic service the fear expressed in the autumn that there would be very little employment later in the year has not been realised, and except among charwomen there is no evidence of serious lack of employment.

Commercial Situations.

Statistics relating to commercial employment in London show that there has been an increase of 25 per cent. in the employment of women in London banks since the war, while similar, though not quite such striking figures, are given for some other City employments. The enlistment percentage for commercial employments as a whole in London is 18½, which about balances the contraction of numbers employed. As regards railways, the companies have been compelled to apply to the War Office for permission to put pressure on their employees not to enlist, and the number who have joined the forces is now about 60,000 out of some 600,000 employed. The situation with regard to tramway and omnibus service is little changed compared with October.

Docks and Shipping.

As regards the docks, employment in London was abnormally brisk throughout November and December, and certain classes of work in the port have been held up for lack of labour. The unloading of timber, for example, was delayed for lack of deal porters. Figures comparing employment in the middle of December with the corresponding week last year show 26,258 employed by the Port Authority, wharves, shipowners, &c., as compared with 24,311 a year ago, an increase of 8 per cent. On the East Coast generally the state of employment is below the normal, owing to shipping difficulties, but there is evidence that men have found employment in other directions. On the West Coast the state of employment is good. At Cardiff there is a shortage of labour, largely owing to heavy enlistment. On the South Coast the state of employment is also good. The number enlisting of this class of worker is very high throughout the country. As regards agriculture, the correspondents of the Board of Agriculture report that while in most dis tricts there is a sufficiency of labour for winter needs there is likely to be difficulty in getting the necessar work done in the spring owing to the considerab numbers who have enlisted. Shortage of labour already marked in the Wold district of Yorkshire, a in the home counties in the case of milkers and mark gardeners. At the November hirings in several d tricts competition among farmers has caused a c siderable advance in wages. There is no evidence lack of employment among shop assistants.

ACUTE DISTRESS IN LEWIS.

POVERTY OF FISH GIRLS.

INADEQUATE RELIEF SCHEMES.

The problem of distress consequent on the stoppage of the herring fishing is widespread, and daily becoming more acute, in Lewis (says a Stornoway correspondent). This island has sent a seventh of its entire population into the fighting line. It is calculated that at least 90 per cent. of all able-bodied men of military age are serving King and country in one branch or other of the sea or land forces. About 2000 of these men in civil live followed the herring fishing, and though their earnings from this source have been lost to the island, their families and dependents have been more than recompensed by the separation allowances and allotments—a sure and steady influx of money such as these households never before knew. So far as the command of hard coin is concerned, therefore, many families in Lewis find themselves better placed than they were before the outbreak of war.

Unfortunately, this is true of a section only, for families hitherto dependent on the earnings of the young women at the herring fishing find themselves face to face with actual poverty. In prosperous fishing seasons, upwards of £50,000 would be brought home annually by the girls. On the outbreak of hostilities in August, 2500 girls returned to Lewis, most of them literally penniless. Then the potato crop has been a complete failure in almost every district of the island. It is estimated that 800 households which in normal times were comparatively com- are in need of assistance.

Efforts are being made through the various agencies to provide the women and girls with employment at knitting. The average that can be earned at stock-making is a paltry 2s 6d a week, yet even at these sweating terms hundreds of girls all over the island are clamouring for work. Hitherto the local Relief Committee has found it impossible to procure sufficient supplies of yarn from the agencies to meet even a tithe of the demand. The result is that instead of meeting the situation by the provision of employment—even poorly-paid employment—the committee has to dole out charity, a method which, to the credit of the girls be it said, most of them find distasteful. For the men even the EMPLOYMENT AMONG WOMEN IN EDINBURGH.

A demonstration was held on Saturday afternoon in Edinburgh by the Northern Men's Federation for Women's Suffrage, with the object of drawing public attention to the question of unemployment among women in the city caused by the war. Meetings were addressed at Chamber Street, the Mound, and the West End by a number of speakers, and collections taken on behalf of the funds for providing work for unemployed women. The Grassmarket Mission Silver Band provided music at each meeting place, and headed the procession en route.

Councillor Crawford, addressing the gathering at the Mound, referred to the campaign for a pension of £1 a week for disabled soldiers and the dependants of soldiers killed at the front. He said it was the duty of the country to make this provision for those who had done their duty. He went on to describe the efforts being made in Edinburgh to deal with the question of unemployment among women workers, and remarked that the Women's Emergency Corps had taken a practical step towards establishing the toy industry. If it were properly encouraged they might succeed in ousting the Germans from the market, and establish the industry on a permanent basis.

Councillor Scott, who spoke at the West End, complained that the organisations which were dealinig with the relief of distress caused by the war in the city were being treated in too niggardly a manner.

Among the others who took part in the proceedings were Councillor Barrie, Parish Councillor Millar, Mr M'Michael, Mr J. Wilson M'Laren, and Mr Drummond.

WORK FOR WOMEN.

TWO TRADES INSTEAD OF ONE AT DERBY.

With the Mayoress as president and treasurer an influential committee is engaged at Derby in alleviating distress through unemployment among women and girls. A feature of the scheme which has been evolved is an attempt to give facilities for learning more than one trade. Many factories are busy on War Office contracts, while at others short time is being worked.

It is intended to draft unemployed operatives from the latter to the former in cases in which manufacturers are willing to teach them, as several have already shown themselves to be. A beginning has been made with about 20 young women. While the workers are learning it is intended to add to the small wage received such a subsidy from the local fund which has been started as will bring the weekly income up to a minimum of 10s.

The Employment of Women.—The Standing Committee, consisting of fourteen ladies, appointed in August last "to consider, and from time to time to report upon, schemes for the provision of work for women and girls unemployed on account of the war," has just issued an interim report, and this is published in the form of a Parliamentary Paper. Much has been done to alleviate the distress which the disruption of industry consequent upon the war has caused among women workers, and the Committee seems to have reached a high standard of efficiency in the exercise of its many functions, one of which is the promotion of new openings for permanent employment. In this latter connection it is interesting to note that the list of trades under review includes the manufacture of potash from seaweed and the making of surgical bandages.

A DEPARTURE IN WOMEN'S WORK.

By AMY B. BARNARD, L.L.A.

Again and again some of the greatest progressive movements have originated in quite trivial beginnings. An instance of this is occurring to-day, arising out of the changed economic conditions created by the war. Hitherto factory owners have readily employed skilled women operatives, but have not attempted to attach training rooms to their factories. Consequently, an unskilled woman over eighteen years of age has been barred from the factories. Nor have polytechnics, evening institutes and classes successfully trained women for skilled work, for with the best intentions their atmosphere is more academic than commercial. It has not been possible for the women to support themselves while training, nor, on leaving, to compete with experienced workers in the open market. The poor woman suddenly thrust on her own resources has been handicapped through want of training at a time when the demand for capable machinists has far exceeded the supply.

However, if the war has wrought untold suffering in most ways, in one direction at least it has encouraged an experiment which is full of interest and proving so successful that it deserves trial in other occupations, in the professions as well as in the industries.

Just after war broke out Mrs. Spender Clay, wife of Captain Spender Clay, of Lingfield, and daughter of W. Waldorf Astor, Esq., paid a visit to the manager of one of the Women's Labour Exchanges in the south of London, with the object of discovering the best way to remedy the increasing unemployment among women. This wise step brought her into contact with an enterprising woman, thoroughly acquainted with the labour market of the district. It appeared at the moment that skilled dressmakers, clerks and waitresses were so far the most deeply affected by the loss of work. Mrs. Spender Clay offered at once to engage a workroom, secure orders, and set the women to work making garments.

Not a minute was lost in carrying out the plan. A room was hired in Walworth-road; sewing-machine makers were visited; some dozen treadle machines were hired, and workers engaged by 2.30 that same afternoon. Material for grey army flannel shirts was bought, a cutter engaged, and by next morning at 8.30 the women, many in a desperate condition, started work. It was found necessary to engage a supervisor to train those unfamiliar with a sewing-machine, some of whom were even unable to make buttonholes.

Meanwhile, Mrs. Spender Clay was busy arranging financial security for the venture and getting orders. In less than a week it became evident that larger premises would be necessary, and nine days from the start two rooms, and subsequently three, were hired at Crossway Institute, New Kent-road. They accommodate over 50 women and are rented at about 23s. a week, which sum covers cleaning and lighting.

From the beginning the management was conducted in a most business-like way. Waitresses, clerks, shop-assistants, cook-housekeepers, embroideresses, even charwomen, women and girls, were gathered into a beginners' room, where they started at 3d. an hour work for four days a week, earning 9s. for the 36 hours. In this room some do hand-sewing, making gussets and buttonholes, sewing on buttons, flag-hemming, and learn to work a sewing-machine. If after three weeks a woman cannot make a shirt, she is regarded as incapable of learning, and has to make room for another. Such cases are rare; and the women are sent back to the Labour Exchange.

To show what a boon this first room has proved, the following instance may be quoted as representative. One day a very young woman applied for work at the Labour Exchange. Her husband had been killed at the Front a few days before, and she had not yet obtained her widow's pension. She was drafted on to the workroom, and soon became self-supporting. Every worker is admitted by way of the Labour Exchange, upon which rests the responsibility of the woman's respectability; thus no time is lost through the management having to investigate the case.

As soon as the women are ready for it, they are drafted out of the first room into a second one, where they earn 1s. a week more, i.e., a wage of 10s. a week, and still work for four days a week. They work faster and better, and their labour is more profitable.

In the next and last room piecework is alone done. Here the rate of pay is sixpence a shirt, and the average earnings are 15s. to 16s. a week. The full hours are from 8.30 to 6.30 five days a week, with one hour off for dinner and half an hour for tea, which is served to the women at a table in the room. It will be readily understood that the pieceworkers, though some at first regret the change from a fixed wage, are stimulated to effort when they realise the amount they earn is limited only by their skill and quickness.

As skilled machinists the women work on shirts, pyjamas, double-fronted grey waistcoats for the Flying Corps, Red Cross suits, any order, in fact, that the indefatigable Mrs. Spender Clay brings to the workrooms. In the piece room at the time of the writer's visit there was an average attendance of twenty women. The work they turned out was remarkably good, and they were working on the best materials obtainable. Fortunate are the airmen rigged out by that workroom. The coats and trousers of the Red Cross suits, dark blue trimmed with red, were just what would be found most serviceable in hospitals. In pattern and execution some 180 shirts for men at the Front were faultless. The materials are cut out by an expert, and the making is superintended by experienced supervisors who understand trade methods, while another is detailed to attend to the smooth running of the sewing-machines. In one case an order for 50 shirts cut to pattern arrived. The women who made them up were paid the trade rate, supplemented to the amount of sixpence a shirt.

It is found that in a few weeks the women are ready to undertake work at trade pay in the open market. They are then at once passed back to the Labour Exchange, making way for other unskilled workers to get their chance also. It is true that numbers of Emergency Workrooms have been started on philanthropic lines all over the country, but it was surely an inspiration of genius to organise one as an annexe to a Labour Exchange, and, in a careful and wholly acceptable way to the women, to change them from unskilled to skilled workers in so short a time. As able machinists they will have at their finger ends a trade that will earn them a livelihood, since good machinists are always in demand. Every care is being taken to avoid spoiling the workers with undue "nursing."

The scheme has worked out admirably, and in such a way as to suggest its extension on a big scale in the future. Facilities for such extension, when economic conditions have returned to an even more prosperous condition than before the war, might be found by the Board of Trade and the local Education Authorities acting in concert. The L.C.C. is making a trial of paying girls of sixteen 4s. a week to return to school and learn at a polytechnic something practically useful; therefore Mrs. Spender Clay's experiment is worth studying at the present time. Economic stress has been at the back of what it is not improbable may one day be the approved method of preparing workers for numbers of occupations. In the next few years it will more than ever be necessary to render British women self-supporting. If they can be trained to carry on industries won from Germany and Austria, so much the better.

UNEMPLOYMENT ON THE INCREASE.

COUNCIL AND WOMEN'S INDUSTRY.

New industries, more particularly those of a kind to absorb women's labour, have long been a pressing need in Liverpool. The Corporation, we understand, are to be approached with regard to this matter, for the problem has become acute on account of the alarmingly large number of women unemployed. So far as can be seen, there are no existing avenues in which their labour can be utilised, nor is it likely that there will be even when the industrial machine is fully in motion again.

Latterly the out-of-work population in the four Merseyside boroughs has been increasing, and it is understood that there are now 20,388 recepients of the donation at the Employment Exchanges. Of these the men number 5,490, the women 13,800, the boys 486, and the girls 612. Considering its size, Bootle's problem is the most serious of all, and there is little prospect of the future bringing improvement. It has 5 800 out-of-work women, which compares with 6,467 in Liverpool. Compared with the rest of the country, the Mersey district is peculiar in this respect, and it adds to the perplexities of the local officials of the Labour Ministry.

Finding the Bona-fide Claims.

Something like £25,000 is being paid out in donations per week, though this amount may be reduced before very long. Coupled with the reduction of the benefit rate on the exhaustion of thirteen weekly payments, with the much closer scrutiny of claims that has just been put into operation. The Court of Referees has refused the continuance of benefit in very many cases where women have declined offers of employment. In most instances they have refused the job because of the alleged insufficiency of pay. Eligibility to the donation is also withdrawn if it cannot be proved that they normally followed some occupation. By this means the claims of women who left their homes for war work, but who have since returned to domestic duties, are being eliminated from the registers. Exceptions, of course, are made in the cases of wives and others have changed since the war began, and who may now be compelled to look for employment.

Nevertheless, when this winnowing process has been completed, there will still remain a very large volume of bona fide unemployment, and it is a very doubtful question when it will be reabsorbed into indutsry. Employers, it is stated, are sometimes declining to re-engage hands who left them for war work, and they harbour the grievance that they had been "left in the lurch." In the meanwhile they have trained younger substitutes, who have proved their capabilities, and who have "not had their heads turned with ideas of fabulous wages." Shopkeepers seem to be adopting this attitude rather frequently.

Liverpool Women and Work.

But it must be confessed that firms seem reluctant to increase their staffs because of the general trade uncertainty. Such a factor affects not only the women, but the men released from the Army. The export and import trade, still freeing itself with difficulty from the fetters of control, has not yet been able to re-establish its normal dimensions, and another difficulty would seem to be that of obtaining supplies. It is impossible to build houses without bricks, and not only are there actually no stocks of bricks available for constructional work, but there is a restricted supply of those more figurative bricks which are essential for the re-equipment of the edifice of general manufacture and industry.

So far as Liverpool is concerned, the tobacco factories may be able in due course to take more women into their service, and many of these may yet return to domestic service and shops. But it is obvious that the sphere for woman labour will have to be widening appreciably in Liverpool. Comparisons of a very interesting kind have just been made, and it has been found that, during the munition period, the quantity of output per head on the part of the local women workers was lower than in other parts of the country. That, of course, is an unfortunate fact, but it can be attributed to tradition and heredity. The Liverpool woman, unlike her sisters of the cotton towns, for instance, has not been educated in industrial work and conditions, nor had her mother any such experience. It was not, as it were, "in the blood." But in times of national necessity she has shown adaptability, and when that necessity becomes more personal, she will probably soon apply herself to any suitable manufacturing process.

Manchester Daily Despatch. 13.1.19.

UNEMPLOYED PROBLEM.

Difficulty Over "What is Suitable Work?"

WOMEN'S COMPLAINT.

Pay Offered Less than Grant from Government.

So long as unemployed pay can be drawn on such a liberal scale, it is inevitable that up and down the country there should be a sprinkling of demobilised munition workers who have no inclination to do other work while that pay is available. But exhaustive inquiries by a Daily Dispatch representative reveals little evidence of this sort of thing being prevalent in the Manchester district.

True, there are some matters which require watching, such as certain cases where a doctor's certificate is produced that a person is unfit to return to the pre-war occupation, while a trade union secretary says there are some soldiers' wives who, now that the well-paid munition work has ended, do not intend to go out to work again, but are going to get hold of the unemployed allowances as long as they can.

On the whole, however, slacking and dishonesty appear to be negligible locally. The question of doctors' certificates could be met by requiring doubtful holders to go before a medical referee, and the Employment Exchanges have ample powers of giving short shrift in suspected cases of slacking.

An important problem has, nevertheless, arisen, and that is the interpretation of reasonable employment. There are strong complaints that many of the jobs offered by the Employment Exchanges are not at all suitable and often mean less pay than the out-of-work grants.

Right of Appeal.

The Courts of Referees have already had to deal with many cases of women leaving places through these causes, and they are likely to have a busy time in the near future. Arrangements have now been made for women members of the local Advisory Committees to sit with the tribunals in Manchester as assessors. Where a person leaves or refuses a situation, he or she has the right of appeal to these courts, but as no unemployment donation is receivable pending the decision, it is hoped that the hearing of the cases will be speeded up as much as possible.

It is alleged that some employers to whom the demobilised workers are sent are expecting them to come at practically pre-war wages and conditions, while others, after stating that the wages would be a certain sum, dodge that promise by putting women on piece-work, at which they cannot earn the amount specified.

Two girls sent to a Salford works found at the week-end that their earnings were only 10s. Girls who were on wood-working have been asked to go to rag-sorting. In another case girls sent to a works had to carry boxes weighing 72lb.; they only stuck it half a day.

Mrs. Pearson, secretary for Lancashire to the Federation of Women Workers, which has some thousands of members in the Manchester district, instanced two girls being sent to a rubber works at 24s. 6d. a week for the learning period, but at the week-end they were given 14s. and 4s. bonus, the manager saying the other girls would object if they got more.

A case typical of many, she said, is that of a widow (not a war widow) with three children, entitled to 37s. a week while unemployed, under the Government scale, who was offered work at 24s. 6d. She asked at the exchange if she would get the children's allowances, in view of the inadequacy of the wages, and was told "No." As she did not, therefore, accept the place she has received no unemployment donation yet, and will get none if her appeal is unsuccessful.

Councillor Titt, secretary of the Workers' Union, states that in regard to skilled engineers, a scheme is being worked independent of the Employment Exchanges between the Manchester District Employers' Federation and the unions. Notice had been given by the A.S.E. that the skilled men would not supervise the work of women and dilutees after December 31, but negotiations resulted in a month's postponement, during which efforts are to be made to deal with the unemployment question as regards skilled men. The federation drew up a list of over 600 vacancies, which rather exceeded the number of unemployed on the books of the unions. A sub-committee is endeavouring to fill the vacancies from the unemployed engineers fitted to do the jobs that are open.

WORK AND WORKERS.

Unemployment Increasing in Sheffield District.

The ranks of unemployed persons in Sheffield continues to increase week by week, and further additions are certain in the immediate future. The amount paid out this week as unemployment donations has been roundly £15,000, so that the recipients number between 15,000 and 16,000. The total was swollen this week by the paying off of several hundred workmen by one of the large East End firms, whose activities were brought to a standstill by the failure of the fuel supply. Incidentally it may be mentioned that had not the colliery strike been settled promptly three-parts of Sheffield works would have been idle next week, the stocks of fuel are so small.

Numerous cases of abuse of the donation benefit have come to light; the administrators of the fund are not often able to prevent them. A considerable number of the lower paid women have contrived to get discharged from their jobs in order to enjoy three months' holiday on the 25s. a week granted by a generous Government. These people have to take "suitable" jobs that are offered, but in the present state of employment the vacancies open for women are extremely limited, and unless the employers report these the officials have little opportunity of discovering them. The payment every Friday of 14,000 or 15,000 recipients from the fund provides a colossal task for the staff at the Employment Exchange.

This week-end the East End establishments are discharging large bodies of women clerks and a considerable number of women manual workers, besides a few men clerks. These will, of course, be entitled to benefit. The appearance of the interior of the big works to-day is a striking contrast to that of a year ago. Some of the shops are idle and almost deserted, and there is a beggarly array of empty desks and stools, and there are many unused typewriters in the offices. The closing of the many Government offices in the city has begun. A proportion of the head officials have gone, and the staffs are being paid off gradually. The time should not, therefore, be far distant when the many local business men who were turned out of their offices in order to provide accommodation for Government war departments will be able to re-occupy their old premises.

A vast amount of work is being done in connection with demobilisation, the general scheme for which was not set in motion until this week. Locally the applications for the release of "slip" men has exceeded 50,000. These are men for whom employment is waiting. More than half of the applications were sent in by employers, and the remainder from the friends of the soldiers. During the week men from the Army have been returning to their jobs in driblets.

WOMEN IN INDUSTRY.

FIELDS FOR FEMALE LABOUR.

The Home Office has issued a memorandum dealing with the substitution of women in non-munition factories during the war, and based on information collected by the Factory Department of the Home Office after exhaustive and careful inquiries throughout the country.

A general review is given of the nature of the work done by women and their capacity for doing it, and the opinion of the Factory Department is recorded that the substitution has proved successful in a great majority of cases and that women have shown themselves able to take up many of the more skilled processes which have hitherto been reserved for men and to carry them out completely and well, and have displayed unexpected readiness for work which at first sight seemed highly unsuitable for them. After excluding the occupations which must be considered unsuitable in normal conditions for women, there remains, the Factory Department believes, "a hopeful field of fresh employment for women where their war experience can be turned to account and should prove a national asset of great value."

The trades which from their nature and the conditions of work appear in the main unsuitable for female labour in normal times are stated to be as follows:—Sawmilling, wood wool manufacture, india-rubber (processes in the manufacture of the raw material), chemicals (heavy), oil and seed crushing (except certain processes), glass (flint glass, glass bottles), glasshouse processes, papermaking (certain manufacturing processes), flour and corn milling (except certain processes), sugar refining, gas manufacture, rope and binder twine, heavy edge tool., scythe and sickle industry, wire ropes (heavy), shale oil refining, cement manufacture (except certain processes), fellmongering, malting, linoleum and floorcloth manufacture (except a few light processes), paints and colour, and china and earthenware (certain prohibited processes). The trades which are considered suitable for female labour in normal times and in which women were largely employed before the war, but in which their employment has been extended to fresh processes, are the following:—Cotton, woollen and worsted, hosiery, lace, textile bleaching, dyeing and finishing, heavy clothing, light clothing, boots and shoes, soap, tobacco, electro-plating, &c., leather gloves, candles, brushes and brooms, dairying, and breweries. The trades into which women have been introduced during the war, some branches of which appear to be suitable for female labour, are:—Light leather tanning, solid leather case and fancy leather, box and packing-case making, furniture, scientific instrument making, flint glass (cutting and decorating branch), and cutlery.

The memorandum indicates the extent and degree of success attending the substitution of women, the changes in methods of work required to permit or facilitate their employment, the special conditions needed to safeguard the health and safety of women, and (in certain cases) the modifications of the Factory Act which would be necessary if the employment is to continue after the present emergency period. An estimate is also attempted of the opportunities for the employment of women after the war, in the light of the war experience and the probable position of the industries in question at the close of the war.

CONDUCTRESSES TO GO.

No Women to be Employed on Buses if Men Can be Obtained.

In a few months there will probably be no women bus conductors working in London. The London General Omnibus Co. is unable to accept the protest of the 300 who have already been dismissed. "When the women undertook the work," said an official of the company yesterday, "they clearly understand that it was of a temporary nature. It is not intended to keep on women if men can be obtained."

On Monday a new route will be worked on week-days between Charing Cross and Belmont (for Banstead), via Vauxhall, Stockwell, Clapham, Tooting, Mitcham, and Sutton.

GIRLS' TESTING-TIME.

"KEEPING STRAIGHT" ON 15s. A WEEK.

By Miss JESSIE STEPHEN, Hon. Organiser Federation of Women Workers.

BEFORE the war economic conditions forced something like 17,000 girls into the streets of Glasgow—an average of one woman in every twelve, while 75,000 were said to walk the golden streets of London.

To-day the number is infinitely greater.

I do not believe these appalling figures are due to sheer depravity, as many people try to make out. Few women willingly take the road to an early death, for the women of the street seldom survive from five to seven years of her soul and body destroying trade.

But it is only human to want decent clothes and decent food—to want sunshine instead of perpetual greyness, and to many women and girls there is only one sign-post to their desires, and they take it.

One cannot blame them; their fall lies at the door of the employer who pays the sweating wage. Hunger and misery are the whips that have driven them to the streets.

* * * *

When I came to Bermondsey a year ago as Hon. District Organiser of the National Federation of Women Workers, I found that the average wage was 15s. or 16s. a week, and that when food was at a maximum price.

After some hard work I was instrumental in getting that sum increased until now the average wage is between 18s. and 19s., and in some cases the girls are earning 30s. weekly.

I was amazed when Sir Robert Horne informed us at the Labour Conference that the Government had decided to reduce the unemployment donation from 25s. weekly to 15s. By reducing, I am referring to the women who have already been drawing the 25s. for thirteen weeks. If it takes 25s. a week to live for thirteen weeks, it takes as much afterwards.

I said at the conference that I thought it most unfair, and am heading a deputation to Sir Robert Horne to-morrow on this very subject.

I want to ensure that every girl gets a decent living wage, a wage consistent with a decent standard of comfort, and that can only be done by establishing a minimum wage with a maximum working day.

Employers must be compelled to do this, or sweating with all its hideous consequences will never be abolished.

No girl can live on 15s. a week and be decent.

The donation certainly keeps her alive, but being out of work, time hangs heavily on her hands, and——

Trekking about looking for work that does not exist does not help things either.

* * * *

The girl who keeps straight under these merciless conditions may get offered a job—at a wage of anything from 10s. a week upwards.

If she refuses it, and the Court of Referees think her excuse unreasonable, then the Government donation stops and she is stranded altogether. This is infamous. No girl ought to be compelled to work at sweating rates.

One way of solving the female labour problem is to get the married women out of the labour market by providing mothers' pensions. This would not only make more room for the single girl, but also reduce the number of juvenile delinquents.

I am told that I have been heard to say that many a girl has now the choice of 15s., or, say, the streets. I go further and say that a girl may be lucky to keep the donation, but if I cannot keep her, while the employers who buy women's work at sweating rates are giving her a free pass to perdition.

Neither Government nor employer has the faintest right to subject any girl to such a test.

Woman is not made of granite.

THE UNFORTUNATE MIDDLE-CLASS WOMAN.

ENGLAND'S DEBT TO HER YET UNPAID.

BY J. C. BRISTOW-NOBLE.

Whose heart is not bleeding for the middle-class woman who must work to live? These are hard, bitter times for her if she has to live upon her earnings. The Government has cast her adrift, and the private employer only too often has not a job to offer her. From beginning to end of hostilities she worked hard, loyally, enthusiastically, conscientiously, and while she drew her fifty shillings or less a week, her sister from the back-street cottage drew her hundred shillings. I am not hinting that the latter was unworthy of her hire, far from it, but we do not need reminding who had the easier job. It was not the middle-class woman. On the land; in the woods, in the ranks of the "Waacs" and "Wrens," in hospital and canteen she was only paid a bare living wage. She took what she could get, and was glad to get it, happy in the thought that she was doing her "bit," and that when at last the war came to an end there would be a better job for her.

Legislation Needed.

For decades the problem of adequate pay for women's work has been with us, and always becoming graver. Be it borne in mind that in the workfield the middle-class woman stands without protection. Unlike the factory-hand, she has not the support of a powerful and wealthy Trade Union, with the most skilful lawyers at its beck and call. The words "shop stewards," "delegates," "lodges" are all as meaningless to her as Greek to the flower-girl. The world is against her in the competition for bread-and-butter. Let her raise her voice in protest against the insufficient salary she has been paid, and things are said about her as unjust as they are painful. She is called unpractical, which is untrue; careless, which is also untrue; inefficient, which again is untrue. For hard work, for enthusiasm in her work, for efficiency the British middle-class woman is the match of many a clever man, and the struggle and grind she has endured so patiently these many years is one of the tragedies of the age. The problem is one, perhaps, for which a permanent solution will never be found; but it should not be difficult to find a solution that would serve the purposes of the present generation of women. Such a solution, unless I am greatly mistaken, lies in good, energetic organisation, protection in certain directions by legislation, and liberal financial assistance. Legislation is needed to sweep away for ever the system of grossly inadequate salares. For England to suffer her daughters to be placed in a position so full of dangers is revolting, and haste should be made to compel such a minimum wage to be paid as will leave no doubt in the minds of anxious parents that the girls in the future can fearlessly look the world in the face.

Urgent Need for Organisation.

Every girl who has been working on the land might be permanently settled on the land, not as a labourer, but as a small holder or small farmer. Most of them took up this form of National Service for the sake of the experience, and in the belief that there would be holdings for them at the end of it all. They have served a hard and dreary apprenticeship for in some cases less than a bare living wage, and, from my experience of women as agriculturists from one end of England to the other, I have not the least fear that, given a fair start, they would succeed handsomely, and indeed be a great acquisition to the countryside; they have such enthusiasm, such sound, practical ideas, such energy. Then what hundreds of middle-class women might be permanently employed in industry! Indeed and in short, for every middle-class woman with health and strength it should not be difficult to find congenial employment at a comfortable wage. What is needed, it seems to me, is a big national clearing-house, wherein to sort, to grade, to guide, to allot—to fit the round pegs into the round holes. We saw some such attempts during the war, and, although some good work was accomplished, the attempts on the whole ended in disaster; the organisation was so slipshod and hasty, and those who held the reins too conscious of their own importance and too susceptible to the appeals of their friends. But the war is now an event of the past, and there is the time and opportunity to perfect the organisation then improvised. The need is urgent.

YORKSHIRE.

FEMALE UNEMPLOYMENT.

Rotherham's Shell Factory Scheme Considered.

A deputation from the Rotherham Local Advisory Committee attended yesterday before the newly-constituted Nucleus Council, appointed by the Divisional Council for Yorkshire and the East Midlands Division, to co-ordinate with Local Advisory Committees in solving problems of unemployment, etc.

Admiral Sir Francis Bridgeman, K.C.B., presided, and Mr. H. A. Longbotham (chairman of the Rotherham Committee) introduced the deputation, which consisted of Messrs. A. E. Wells, C. E. Iles, and W. Milnes (secretary).

Mr. Longbotham said the Rotherham Committee had sent up a resolution to the effect that there were now some 4,000 women and girls unemployed in Rotherham owing to the munitions works having closed down, and unless some new industries could be brought into the town there was no prospect of finding employment for those needing it. The suggestion had been thrown out that the Government should be induced to take over a portion of the National Projectile Factory at Templeborough, and utilise it for the manufacturing of clothes. The Rotherham Committee had also gone so far as to approach L.A.C.'s in those towns where textiles and cloths were manufactured, but they had met with little or no sympathy. The domestic service problem was under consideration by the Women's Sub-Committee, but whatever they were able to do would only absorb a small proportion of the women now claiming unemployment benefit.

Mr. Iles emphasised the fact that Rotherham was peculiarly situated, inasmuch as all its industries were on the heavy side, and unless new industries of a light character were introduced, it would mean that many of the women and girls would have to migrate to other places, and he contended that it was of paramount importance that young girls and women should be found employment near to their homes. It was distinctly a matter for the Government to deal with.

Mr. Wells said the Rotherham women answered most loyally to the call when shells were needed, and, as chairman of the Rotherham Chamber of Commerce for six successive years, he felt that it was their duty to try to find suitable employment for these people, so that they could remain at their homes. The National Projectile Factory was in every way suited for the manufacture of clothing, bicycles, motors, etc., while the labour was there.

The Chairman said the Council fully recognised that Rotherham was differently situated from most other towns, but he did not think the Government would be inclined to open and run a clothing factory. Still, the Council were most sympathetic with the Rotherham Committee's claims, and he assured them that they would do all in their power to help them.

Mr. Kean (Sheffield) moved that the Council take the matter up with other L.A.C.'s in towns where clothing and textiles were manufactured, and also that the Government be approached in regard to the future use of the National Projectile Factory.

This was seconded and carried.

The deputation afterwards had an interview with Mr. Davis Little, president of the Wholesale Clothing Merchants' Association, who said the main difficulties in the way of opening out new factories, even where there was a surplus of female labour, was shortness of material, both as regarded cloth and linens. There were also 3,000 women unemployed in Leeds at the present moment. Had they gone to them 4½ years ago there would have been 20 firms who would have asked for an option on the Rotherham offer.

It was pointed out that if the National Projectile Factory was unobtainable, there would be no difficulty in obtaining other suitable buildings.

Mr. Little promised to bring the request to the notice of the people with whom he was connected.

THE NEW REST CURE.

In order that the women who automatically lose their jobs at war work of various kinds should not suffer hardship while waiting for new employment a paternal Government decided to pay them 25s. a week unemployment benefit over a period of thirteen weeks if necessary.

Of course, it was understood that no one who refused a suitable job should continue to draw unemployment money, but for those who wish to take a holiday at the national expense there was an easy way out of the difficulty, and the holiday-makers were not long in finding it. They had come from all sorts of occupations, and if they registered themselves as willing to return to these they could easily have found work, especially the domestic servants, for whom there is a tremendous demand. Instead, they put their names on the books of the Labour Exchanges as factory workers, and owing to the change over it was found impossible to find employment for more than a small proportion of the whole. The result is that at the present time there are between 150,000 and 200,000 women unemployed, though there is work of sorts waiting for them.

It is not to be supposed that all these women are anxious to carry on with the sort of work which they did in war-time, but to register as a female mechanic is at the present time to be fairly sure of a holiday. These women are not wearing out their shoe-leather to any great extent looking for work. Many of them would do their best to dodge a job if they saw it coming. A holiday on 25s. a week at the expense of the taxpayer is quite good enough for them, and in the case of those who are able to live with parents or relations they can have quite a good time on the money.

We have all admired the way in which the munition girls worked during the war, toiling long hours cheerfully in order that the men at the front might have sufficient shells to throw at the Huns. Of course, the pay was good, but over and over again the shell girls proved that pay was not everything to them. Now that the war is over they have been faced with what was undoubtedly a severe temptation, and a good many have yielded to it.

It is very human, no doubt, but when the overburdened taxpayer realises that young women by the hundred thousands are being paid by him—or her—to enable them to dodge work there is likely to be trouble.

WOMEN AT DOCKYARDS.

Prospects for Their Employment After Demobilisation.

Now that the staffs at the various dockyards are being reduced with a view to a gradual return to the pre-war basis, the position of the women workers who were temporarily employed and are being gradually demobilised becomes one of considerable anxiety.

PORTSMOUTH.

In Portsmouth Dockyard of the 16,000 employees only about 1,500 are women workers. These are being discharged at the rate of about 50 a week, but all will have to go in time. Beyond corset-making there is practically no work except domestic service, which they refuse.

PLYMOUTH.

Women employed in Devonport Dockyard number over a thousand, and are engaged as writers and in various forms of light work. The first notices of discharge were served last evening, only a small number of women in the colour works and ropery being involved. It is probable that there will be a certain number of notices in succeeding weeks until the recognised establishment is reached. There is no big industry in the town apart from the dockyard, so the girls would have to take their chance in private employment.

CHATHAM.

Several hundred women have been engaged at Chatham Dockyard during the war, and next week their number is to be gradually reduced. In the ropery, for instance, the night shift is to be discontinued, displacing at least 150 women. In the locality there is no other employment open to them except domestic service. A considerable proportion, however, are the wives of service men, and it is hoped that as demobilisation proceeds they will not require other employment.

BEESTON COUNCIL AND FEMALE LABOUR.

At a meeting of the Beeston Urban Council permission was given to the postal authorities to place an underground telegraphic line along the Derby road, subject to all disturbances being made good. Dr. Parkinson, medical officer to the Basford Rural District Council, was appointed medical officer, vice Dr. Chalmers, resigned. During the month 18 births and 14 deaths had taken place. It was decided to dispense with all female labour employed by the Council. A local branch of the Employment Exchange is to be opened immediately, to be staffed principally by discharged soldiers.

A demonstration took place at Barrow, on Saturday afternoon, of girls rendered idle by the stoppage of munition work. About 2,500 females are drawing out-of-work donation. A resolution was passed protesting against the Government's failure to provide measures to meet the post-war situation of industry, and demanding the utilisation of national factories to produce commodities of which there is a shortage, and to absorb female labour. The resolution also urged prolongation of the period of donation benefit until useful work at reasonable wage was arranged.

THE POSITION OF WOMEN WORKERS.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE MORNING POST.

SIR,—The condition of the discharged women is so serious throughout the country that I venture to ask for space in your valuable paper to give a short summary of their case, in order that public opinion may assist in a solution of a situation which is daily becoming increasingly difficult.

There are over half a million women workers at present receiving unemployment allowances, and there are probably an additional million of industrial women at present out of employment. In whole areas, such as the North-East Coast, there is practically no employment for industrial women. A period of unemployment on the cessation of war contracts was recognised to be inevitable, but what are the Government doing to find employment for this great army of efficient women workers in peace-time occupations?

Then instructions have been issued to controlled firms by Government Departments to discharge women workers in a wholesale manner. The rights of women in the matter seem to have been totally disregarded. Women are willing to stand aside and give place to certain classes of skilled men and to men discharged from the forces, but why should women have been thrown out and male dilutees retained? Why, also, should women, who, previous to the war, were employed on certain processes, be discharged, as they have been, on the instruction of a Government Department? The handling of the entire question has been lacking in imagination and initiatve, and the Government will shortly be faced with the question of the renewal of unemployment doles on a gigantic scale, when it could, surely, by intelligent and constructive measures, alleviate the whole position and save large sums of public money.

The Women's Industrial League, of which I am President, appeals for the support of all women workers in their endeavours to deal with the present difficult position, and will also welcome the co-operation of all members of the community in the solution of this grave national problem.—Yours, &c.,

RHONDDA, President.

MUNITIONER'S NEW OUTLOOK.

How Work is Being Found for Girls in London.

CANNING TOWN'S SCHEME

"The one thing that the young ex-munition girl wants is work, however many tales you may hear to the contrary," said Miss Frodsham, the head of the Girls' Employment Centre at Canning Town, to a "Daily News" representative yesterday. "We have 100 girls on the books here, and though they are happy enough with us, they never miss the opportunity of applying for every job they hear about. Practically all the girls have a trade, machine tailoring and box-making being favourite ones in the district. Only one girl out of 16,180 who have passed through my hands since Jan. 1 told me she wanted to go into service, but that is quite natural, because the girls were too young for domestic work when war broke out."

The girls found great difficulty in getting work, Miss Frodsham said, because there was a want of co-operation between the Labour Exchanges and the foremen of the factories, who engaged the workers. The latter, it appeared, never notified vacancies to the Exchange, but engaged workers from those who came to the gates of the factory in search of work. The girls who draw their 12s. 6d. out of work pay and attend unemployment classes have thus a grievance; for while they are in school from 9 a.m. to 4 p.m., their mates, who have not gone to the classes, take the work that is going.

"This morning is the first time that the manager of one of the largest box factories in Canning Town has applied to the Labour Exchange for workers," said Miss Frodsham. "As a result eight of my girls obtained work immediately."

The Unemployment Centre, or, to give it its fuller title, the Girls' Education and Recreation Centre, at Canning Town is conducted on unconventional lines.

"A Montessori school for girls in their teens" is how a "Daily News" representative who visited the centre describes it: The classrooms yesterday afternoon were occupied by little groups of girls sewing, while one of their number or a teacher read aloud. Others were at a table copying drawings in pencil or writing letters.

They have been reading and enjoying Shakespeare, especially "The Merchant of Venice" and a "Midsummer Night's Dream." Shakespeare shares the honour of the first place in their appreciation, with Maeterlinck and Lady Gregory, of whose Irish plays they are very fond. They read the plays in parts, and many of the girls, their teachers say, show more dramatic appreciation of the scenes than the average High School girl. Modern poetry appeals to many of them. Yesterday afternoon the most silent group in the classroom was absorbed in a volume of Patrick McGill's "Soldier Songs."

EX-MUNITION GIRLS WANT WORK.

5,000 GIRLS

To Join Liverpool Unemployed.

APPEAL TO EMPLOYERS.

EXPRESS SPECIAL.

This coming week-end will terminate the unemployment benefit of 25s. per week for fully 5,000 girls and women ex-munition workers in Liverpool. The ease and comfort with which they have been able to "carry on," thanks to the Government's generosity, will have to give place to either some new employment or an unremunerative idleness with all its attendant perils.

An "Express" representative this afternoon discussed the position of these girls with Mrs. Billinge, who can speak an behalf of 1,600 organised women workers in Liverpool.

"The outlook is an appalling one for these girls," Mrs. Billinge said. "In my capacity as a member of the Liverpool Labour Advisory Committee I have advocated the opening of a big laundry to give them employment, or the establishment of a White Factory where white articles of clothing are made. The laundry scheme has not materialised and the factory is not practicable because Liverpool is not a sufficiently good distributing centre. The tobacco factories from which many of these munitioneers were recruited will not have them back again as they have trained other workers in their place. And so we have no occupation to put these girls into. During the past four years they have been well shod and well clothed, with plenty of spare cash. Now they will have nothing but the reduced allowance of 7s. 6d. per week, which will take the place of the 25s. At the moment there is no employment for them. We can only appeal to the big employers to consider the position and do anything they can to relieve the situation. Those who can see their way to increase their employés are urged to do so, and in that way alleviate to some extent the danger with which these girls are faced."

"It has been suggested," our representative observed, "that the Liverpool girl workers do not compare very favourably with the girl workers of the industrial towns of Lancashire."

"The Liverpool girls are of a different class to those who are to be seen in the factory districts. The factory lass, who goes to work with a shawl over her head, is a grand type of woman, who gets a wage and does not care who knows it or how much it is. That type does not exist in Liverpool. The girl worker of Merseyside would not care for her neighbour to know how much money she gets. The girls here don't seem to develop the business side of their nature. They go to work, as it were, just for the time being—for a change. They don't seem to look at work in the proper spirit. They look upon it as menial, but there is nothing menial about it, except the spirit in which it is done. Unfortunately the Liverpool girl has not been trained for factory work, and hence there is at present no demand for her services."

734,000 Unemployed.

In the House of Commons, this afternoon, Mr. Parker said up to 7th February 734,090 persons were unemployed. The largest number were in the engineering and iron founding industries.

UNEMPLOYED WOMEN IN ABERDEEN.

MINIMUM WAGE FOR GIRLS.

A large meeting of unemployed women, numbering between 400 and 500, was held last night in the North U.F. Church Hall, Queen Street. Mr Macgregor, hon. president of the Aberdeen Branch of the National Federation of Women Workers, presided.

Mr Gruer, A.S.E., addressed the meeting, and said that many of the girls were being sent by the Labour Exchange to jobs which they did not want and which perhaps did not suit them. Some of them refused the job, and when told that they would have to go before a Court of Referees they got scared and had not carried their case to the Court, with the result that their donation was probably stopped when it should not have been. It would react to their own disadvantage if they showed timidness in bringing their case before the Court of Referees. Many employers were deliberately offering a wage which it was impossible to live on. Unless the salary offered was at a reasonable rate in all probability the Court would allow the appeal. In the event of their disallowing the appeal it could be taken to a higher tribunal. It was the girls' duty to speak up if they thought that they did not get fair play, or failing that, put the matter in the hands of their Union.

The Broadford Workers.

Broadford had intimated in the press that in the very near future they would have to disband a great many of their girls, and they did it to-day. The tenters possibly might in a way affect a proportion of that number, but to penalise the whole 600 or 700 by refusing the unemployment grant was unfair. They would have noticed by yesterday's papers that the Labour Exchange had been accused of exploiting the girls. He did not desire to retract anything he had said because he had clear evidence of the cases he quoted. He had known cases where the Labour Exchange had sent men and women away to other places for jobs where there were no jobs at all. A 25s per week minimum wage for girls should be started. The employers were waiting for the expiration of the donation scheme when they would be in a position to dictate their terms, and offer any wage they liked to girls. An extension of the period of the scheme was wanted to frustrate this ruse, and unless the girls joined together and exerted every effort they would be forced back into the old pre-war conditions, when they were paid with a miserable pittance of between 6s and 12s.

"Household Orderlies."

In regard to the question of domestic service, there was a scheme in Gloucestershire which was called "The Household Ordeslies," the idea being that those who would be likely to derive the benefit of the service of girls would have to pay into a sort of central organisation probably a guinea per annum, and this organisation would be responsible for the proper training, etc., of the girls. The rate of wage was to be 30s, out of which they would have to pay their own board. A 40 hours' day was suggested. If any such scheme were instituted, it should be open to the east end as well as to the west end. There was many a woman in the east end who by circumstances beyond her control had far more need of a domestic servant than anybody in the west end. In regard to the 40-hour week many women would say, "If a man is only going to work a six-hour day he will come home and stick about the house," but a six-hour day in his opinion was what was wanted. Of course, he did not say that this would not be the case if a short day were put in force to-morrow, because they would have to get accustomed to it, and it would take some time to develop their minds sufficiently to appreciate such things as art, science, good literature, and sport. He did not believe in the theory of one person having more or better brains than another. They were all the same except that some, a very few, got the facilities to broaden and develop their minds. If a man got the opportunity to do this he should not exalt and see himself on a pinnacle, but should use his position for the good of his fellow man.

Mr Macgregor, Miss Innes, secretary of the Aberdeen branch of the National Federation of Women Workers, and Mr Paton then followed in somewhat similar terms, and the meeting closed.

THE BROADFORD UNEMPLOYED.

Criticism of the Churches and of the Lord Provost.

A demonstration of the unemployed in Aberdeen, more particularly in the interests of the 700 girls affected by the tenters' dispute at Messrs Broadford, Broadford Works, was held yesterday afternoon under the auspices of the local branch of the National Federation of Women Workers. About 100 of the girls, with their officials, assembled in Golden Square, and, headed by a brass band and two of their number bearing a banner of the National Federation of Women Workers, marched to the Castlegate, where the proceedings attracted a considerable crowd.

Mr J. C. Allan, president of the Industrial Section of the Trades Council, said that that morning he had seen the Bishop of Aberdeen, and had impressed on him the necessity of something being done on behalf of the Broadford girls. He had suggested to the Bishop that the Churches Council in the city should take the matter up from the purely moral point of view, as it would become very necessary if the dispute were not settled in the near future.

Miss Innes, secretary of the Aberdeen Branch of the National Federation of Women Workers, said she had no faith in dealing with the Church, although Mr Allan had intended it for the best. The Church had done nothing for them in the past, and it was no use being sentimental over the matter. It was only the workers themselves who would better their conditions, and therefore she appealed to them to organise. She deprecated the small numbers who had taken part in the procession. The Lord Provost had been to London a few days ago, and the King had asked him how Aberdeen was. The Lord Provost replied that Aberdeen was splendid—(laughter). How could he say that when there were 2500 women idle and £4000 being paid out in unemployment benefit.

Mr A. Fraser M'Intosh also appealed to the workers generally to organise, and said that the Government had refused to recognise any strike that was unconstitutional. In the case of Broadford, they had the directors actually refusing to recognise the Union, which was against the principle now laid down by the Government.

Mr Hay, a discharged soldier, also appealed for better organisation. The following resolution was unanimously carried:—"That this meeting of citizens and unemployed workers in Aberdeen demand the Lord Provost and Town Council to immediately provide work for all men and women now unemployed."

WOMEN'S "HOLIDAY"

Out-of-Work Donation Lapses This Week

THOUSANDS UNEMPLOYED

Over 26,000 unemployed women in Glasgow, according to latest returns from the Employment Exchanges, are in receipt of the out-of-work donation of 25s per week. What has been described as the munition workers' "free holiday" ends this week, however, for many of these women with the lapse of their unemployment benefit. The out-of-work donation was granted to discharged war workers for 13 weeks, if during that time they failed to find employment, and was made payable as from November 25 last. Those women who have been in receipt of it from the beginning will therefore draw their last donation under the present scheme on Friday.

A Drop of 18s Weekly

Women who came under the scheme later will of course continue to draw the benefit for 13 weeks from the date of their first becoming eligible, or for whatever part of that period they may remain out of employment. A few new women applicants for the out-of-work donation are still enrolling at the Employment Exchanges, but, unless the scheme is extended, the next week or two will bring about a big reduction in the number of recipients of benefit.

Unemployed women who are in possession of the necessary stamped insurance cards will, on ceasing to draw the out-of-work donation, become eligible for ordinary unemployment insurance, which will also be paid through the Employment Exchanges. This amounts to only 7s a week, however, and the fact that they will be poorer by 18s weekly will probably make the women more eager to find employment than they have been while in receipt of the larger donation.

Slow Reabsorption of Women

An official told a representative of "The Bulletin" yesterday that while the Exchanges were doing everything possible to place women in new employment there was no branch of industry at the moment in Glasgow which was absorbing women workers in large numbers. Employers are appealed to to notify vacancies to the Exchanges.

She mentioned that there was little difficulty in finding work for girls who could sew. With regard to domestic service, she said there were many vacancies, and new and stricter rules had been laid down. If a girl who had had previous experience in domestic service was offered a domestic post and declined to accept it she was reported to the Court of Referees, and almost invariably disqualified as a recipient of the out-of-work donation.

Women on Military Service

Demobilized members of Queen Mary's Army Auxiliary Corps and kindred services who were enrolled on a mobile basis for the duration of the war are entitled, if unable to find suitable employment, to claim military out-of-work donation at the rate of 25s a week for 26 weeks. Other members are entitled to out-of-work donation on the civilian basis. So far as Glasgow is concerned, however, there have been few applications for benefit by "Waacs," as there has been no general demobilisation of the Women's Army.

A scheme adopted in Glasgow for employing usefully the time of lads and young girls thrown out of employment by the cessation of war industries, and in receipt of out-of-work donation, has already been described in "The Bulletin." Nothing unfortunately, has been done to occupy to similar good advantage the time of the young women who attend daily at the Employment Exchanges. Training schemes have been advocated, but there are various difficulties in the way. It is felt, however, that it is a pity thousands of young women should have gone idle for almost three months at the public expense. Had they, for instance, received some useful training for peace-time occupations the results would have been valuable to themselves and to the country.

1,500,000 UNEMPLOYED WOMEN.

MRS. FAWCETT ON DIFFICULTY OF ABSORPTION.

The annual meeting of the Charity Organization Society was held yesterday at Denison House. Mr. RONALD C. NORMAN presided.

Mrs. FAWCETT, in moving the adoption of the report, stated that over half a million women were in receipt of out-of-work allowances. It was believed that the number of women now actually out of employment through the demobilization of labour and crises that had arisen in textile and other industries was at least one and a half millions. There was not a single woman who wanted to stand in the way of men displaced as a result of volunteering for the Army, but there were very great difficulties in the absorption of that great mass of women labour. The deplorably low wages for women which existed before the war formed one of the great difficulties which that society had had to encounter.

How could they have an A.1 Empire if they had a C.3 population, as they certainly had before the war, so far as a large number of women were concerned. They were C.3 largely because they were underfed and ill-housed. By standing firm for the principle of the open door for the employment of women, they would do a great service for the country. The capacity shown by women in employment during the war had amazed not only the ordinary anti-Suffragette, but even old Suffragists like herself. If the door were closed after they had tasted the sweets of sufficient wages there would be a growing feeling of dissatisfaction and rebellion among them.

Mr. HENRY VIVIAN said the Government were subsidizing one class of house. The situation for the lower middle class was going to be far more serious than that of the workman. The worker had been debauched by the generous distribution of Treasury notes and the capitalist by the splendid issues of War Loan. Both had an idea that the country could carry on for a long time on those lines.

The Bermondsey District Branch of the National Federation of Women Workers state that two Bermondsey firms will close their places on Friday, and about 1,000 women will thus be thrown out of work. It is further stated that there are already 5,000 women drawing the unemployment donation in this district, and the number is constantly increasing.

UNEMPLOYED WOMEN.

No Out-of-Work Pay For Girls Who Refuse Domestic Service.

Young women workers drawing out-of-work donation must—if they are regarded as suitable—undertake domestic service or forfeit their unemployment pay.

This is the verdict of a test case now being circulated for the guidance of Employment Exchanges.

A girl of 19, earning £1 a week on a machine in an ironworks, at which she had been working a few months, became out of work in November, and the following month was offered a situation as a domestic servant.

Plea Of Inexperience.

She refused this as unsuitable, contending that she had never been employed before as a domestic servant, and had never performed household duties.

The Court of Referees held that she had refused an offer of suitable employment, and refused the out-of-work donation, but granted leave to appeal to the umpire.

In this appeal the girl said she was willing to work as a factory hand in any class of work, but was not capable of domestic service.

The umpire upheld the Court of Referees, and disallowed the claim for donation.

Although the girl had had no previous experience of domestic service, the umpire ruled that, since she was only 19 years of age, and had not been learning a skilled trade, she should be prepared to adapt herself.

If she prefers to wait for factory work, she must do so at her own expense.

Unemployment.

Survey of the Position in Southampton.

Facts and figures relating to unemployment in Southampton will serve to set forth the exact position, dispel one or two illusions about the "waste" of unemployment money, and indicate what needs to be done to restore men, women, girls, and boys to employment.

The percentage of unemployment in Southampton is roughly 2 per cent., reckoning the population at 130,000. It is not possible to comapre this with the state of affairs before the war, because the Labour Exchange did not then embrace all trades and employments, but it compares very favourably with the 7 per cent. of Birmingham and the much higher rates prevailing in towns which were munition centres. It is considered that fully 50 per cent. of the unemployed would be immediately absorbed by the re-opening of the port to commercial activities, for stevedores and quayside workers form a big percentage of those on the books.

Nevertheless, the numbers are formidable enough. Last week there were 1,544 "civilians" on the books of the Exchange and 835 demobilised soldiers. The sum of £1,600 was dispensed in out-of-work benefit to the former, and £1,154 to the latter. The "civilians" are men discharged from their employment either to make room for men returning from the Army or for ordinary reasons.

The tendency is for the demobilised category to grow bigger than the civilian category. It should be remembered that the demobilised men in receipt of benefit are those discharged over a month ago, when demobilisation was at its height.

There is a widespread belief that men have got themselves demobilised, not because they have any employment to go to, but in order to receive the unemployment pay of 29s. per week, plus allowances. So far as Southampton is concerned, there is no truth in this. A man under 37 cannot be demobilised unless he has an approved offer of employment, and when such a man presents himself to receive benefit it is generally found that his case is genuine, i.e., that some contingency has occurred (such as the death of his employer) between the time the offer of employment was made and the time of demobilisation. The ex-soldiers in receipt of benefit are practically all over 37 years of age, and therefore unconditionally eligible for release from the Army.

A Word to Employers.

When one recalls the large promises made to young men in the early days of the war to induce them to enlist, it is disheartening, though not surprising, to learn that there is little disposition on the part of employers in Southampton to prefer the ex-Service man to any other man. Bearing in mind what was said in 1914 and 1915, when the potential soldier was led to believe that employers would fall over one another at the end of the war in their eagerness to give him a job, it is painful to have to realise that the old soldier and the man who stayed at home stand more or less on the same footing, not in the eyes of the Labour Exchange, who make special exertions for the former, but in the cold business eyes of employers.

Partly disabled men are the principal sufferers. There are about 100 on the books of the Exchange at present, and some are "placed" here and there as porters, messengers, night watchmen, and clerks. But the owners of factories and of engineering establishments fight decidedly shy of the disabled man. The reason is that they say they cannot have a man in their shops on a different footing from the rest, cannot afford to pay him the same, and are not disposed to waste the time of other men in helping him. They think, and probably rightly, that the disabled man is a case for the State, and not for individuals. Disabled men come to the Exchange with this story, and, unfortunately, no definite arrangements appear to have been made by the Government yet for dealing with the matter.

Now, employers cannot be blamed for keeping clear of the disabled man. But in another direction they are much to be blamed. Only occasionally do they write on their requirement "chits," "Ex-Service man preferred," and the only preference given is when all other things are equal, the result naturally being, having regard to the long time since the ex-soldier has worked, that he suffers. Employers must be prepared to make far greater allowance for the ex-soldier's lack of recent experience.

Women and Girls.

Last week 600 women signed the unemployment register, and about 450 received benefit, the amount disbursed being £380. When it is considered that since the Armistice 6,000 policies have been lodged, the number remaining is comparatively small, and, indeed, much smaller than the average throughout the country. Women have been placed on the land, as clerks, domestic servants, and cleaners. It is to be feared that there is far more "work-shying" among the women than among the men. The donation of 25s. is very attractive to a woman at a time when women's wages are on the down grade. But it is a great mistake to suppose that benefit is given indiscriminately. For every claim allowed there are three claims disallowed. Nor is a woman allowed to pick and choose jobs too much. Where there is reason to believe a girl is suitable for an employment she nevertheless will not take, benefit is suspended, and she must satisfy an advisory committee, consisting of workmen and employers, that her objection is genuine. The Labour Exchange officials themselves, contrary to general belief, have no power to stop benefit; it is done by a committee acting as referee.

Tightening the Strings.

People who complain that the Labour Exchange are lax in the manner in which they deal out the public money may with advantage reflect that the employers themselves often have a very poor sense of public duty. A woman who does not want a job will coolly request an employer to certify her "unsuitable." The employer who tamely does this is simply abetting the woman in cheating the public.

After nearly six months of Armistice conditions women have not brought themselves to realise that factory work, with the money paid for it during the war, will not be possible again. They still demand employment of this sort, but there has been a great tightening of the strings lately, and a woman does not necessarily get benefit because this work is not forthcoming. Women, for instance, who left domestic service to enter the factory are now required to return to the pots and pans.

The stories current about girls remaining out of work deliberately in order to draw benefit are discountenaced by the fact that last week only £11 was paid in unemployment benefit to girls between 15 and 18, and the weekly amount has never exceeded £24.

In parenthesis, it may be pointed out that women do not appear to understand that they are entitled to benefit, even though they may not have been on war work. Any woman with an insurance card stamped before August 9th last can lodge a policy.

Domestic servants constitute a problem of their own. There is still a great shortage. In many towns the shortage has been removed by mistresses advertising a code of rules governing domestic service. This will shortly be done in Southampton. Probably the model of another town will be copied, though no fantastic rule, such as never calling the maid by her Christian name, will, it is to be hoped, be adopted.

New Scheme for Boys.

In regard to unemployed boys, a new scheme has been brought into being this week, which, as far as can now be judged, promises to be a great success.

Yesterday afternon there were to be seen at St. Paul's Schoolroom about a hundred boys marching to the platform in a quene to receive their unemployment pay. It is now a condition of the receipt of unemployed benefit that a boy shall attend to undergo instruction every day. A representative of this paper who looked in yesterday was greatly impressed by the standard of discipline prevailing. These youths do not regard themselves as schoolboys, and when they came for the first time on Monday there was a great indisposition apparent to sit at a desk. But a week's enlightened discipline has made a vast difference, and, whether or not the sight of the money bags had anything to do with the mood, the boys certainly appeared to think their training the finest thing on earth. Considering the class from which these boys come, considering they are dirty, unkempt, and uncombed, considering that, working with men, they like to regard themselves as men, their interest and attention were remarkable.

Actual instruction is not, of course, the main object of the scheme, which has been arranged by the Education Committee in co-operation with the Ministry of Labour, and which is at present under the control of Mr. R. J. Dawes, who has had a lot of experience of continuation school work, and of Mr. Boyle, of the Labour Exchange. Certainly, the sort of mechanics which Mr. Johns, an elementary school teacher, is giving the boys, makes a big appeal to them, and one cannot but be pleased at the amount of interest which 90 per cent. of these boys, who have had very little education, take. But drill, games, and ambulance work take up a large part of the syllabus (which only lsts two and a half hours a day), and the main object aimed at is to keep more or less control over the lads.

The instructors have no hold over the boys other than recommending a stoppage of pay, which recommendation would only apply to a very extreme case; and this being so, the manner in which these rough lads play the game augurs well.

THE UNTRAINED WOMAN.

PROSPECTS FOR DEMOBILISED WORKERS.

The thousands of women who are leaving Whitehall are in a very difficult position, and their case is the more serious because so large a proportion of them are now dependent on their earnings. The first difficulty they have to face is that of realising what the position really is.

Because so many of them lacked previous experience they do not understand how artificial were the conditions under which they worked or how remote is the chance that they will succeed in getting similar employment in the world at peace. Thousands of them, it is said, have a pathetic belief that they will find jobs such as they have left at the war-time rate of £3 or £4 a week. "We want to do the same sort of work," they say, and they go on hoping that it will turn up. Previous training was not demanded when they went to Whitehall. The work they had to do has not qualified them for an ordinary office, and they do not understand where they are lacking. Many months ago they were approached by the Central Bureau of Women's Employment and the Women's Service Office, both of which were prepared to advance funds for training in various profitable employments, but they could not be persuaded that this was the course they should pursue. They preferred to remain at their old work—though any of them who wished to accept the offers would have been released, and though at the time there were many vacancies waiting for them as soon as they were qualified. They could have been gradually absorbed had they come out gradually, but they have chosen to remain till the last moment and come out in a flood, and even now it is only a small proportion who understand that the wisest thing they can do is to enter immediately on some training and qualify for good salaries.

"Loan-for-Training."

I have had some talk with the secretary of the Central Bureau of Women's Employment regarding the best openings for educated women. She said that it was of first importance that a girl should consider very carefully what work she liked best and was best fitted for, a consideration too often overlooked by the inexperienced worker. It was unfortunate that so few of the war workers had saved any money, but the almost invariable rule was that they had lived up to their salary and felt they must start earning again at once. Secretarial work had kept up in a surprising manner, and because there were good prospects for qualified women the Bureau, under its loan-for-training scheme, was every day sending women to secretarial training schools Salaries generally are at the present moment higher than before the war, but they are coming down, and the fact must be accepted by sensible women without grumbling. They cannot expect people to go on paying the high prices they could command when there was such a shortage of labour.

Three or four women are now having their fees paid at a medical school, and the first woman to be so helped, who has now a good position on the staff of a hospital, has repaid to the Bureau the whole of the loan advanced. There are more medical women on the market now than ever before, but their work during the war has firmly established their position with the public, and because they are so appreciated they are likely to receive more appointments than were formerly open to them.

Never before were there such openings as there are now for teachers, and women are being urged to consider taking up this work. Salaries have improved and pensions are larger. There is great diversity of work for women teachers, and specially interesting openings in connection with the continuation classes provided for under Mr. Fisher's bill. There are many openings in various branches of work for children, and a great demand for nurses trained on the lines of the Norland Institute. This work should appeal tremendously to girls who are fond of children. They are very well paid, are treated as the gentlewomen they are, and there are so many openings that a qualified girl can practically take her choice. But girls who are well adapted for the training will not look at it because it means a residential post. For governesses, again, there is an enormous demand. Private governesses are not to be had for love or money, though the salaries offered are now very good. Ambleside asks a minimum of £70 for governesses trained in that institution, and salaries go up to £100.

Domestic Work.

There are very good openings in cookery in every direction. The trained cook must have a diploma, which necessitates at least six months' training, and after that she will have no difficulty in getting a post in a college or school, or in an institution where an educated woman would take charge of the kitchen. Domestic economy teachers are wanted all over the country. They must have had two years' training and then are eligible for posts in elementary or secondary schools. The salaries, which vary with the different county councils, range from about £140 to £150 a year.

Massage does not offer the openings it used to do. For one thing, a great number of trained masseuses have been released from the military hospitals, and now the best chance is for a woman who combines massage with remedial work or hospital nursing. So many women dispensers have been trained in hospitals during the war that there is not now much opening in this direction, unless the student takes the three years' course and becomes a chemist. Gardening as a profession for women is suffering from the return of service men and the release of women gardeners employed by the army. The question of food production is, however, so important that the Central Employment Bureau is prepared to lend money to women gardeners who intend to start market gardening near small towns. To make a success of the venture the gardener would not only have to understand her work, but she must have a knowledge of market conditions and of business. There will be good openings for women health workers under the scheme of the Ministry of Health. Two years' training will be required for this, but the scheme is so new that it is not yet known what its details are.

UNEMPLOYED WOMEN

New Maintenance and Training Scheme

£500,000 GRANTED

As a result of suggestions from the National Federation of Women Workers a grant of £500,000 has been made from the National Relief Fund to assist unemployed women, and, in addition, the residue of the Queen's Work for Women Fund is to be applied to that end.

The funds will be administered by the Central Committee of Women's Training and Employment, which the Minister of Labour has now appointed as a Standing Committee and its work will be to devise and carry out special schemes of work and training for women who are unemployed or whose earning capacities or opportunities have been injuriously affected as a result of the war.

Maintenance Scholarships

The scheme is to provide at once a large number of maintenance scholarships, which will enable women to qualify as teachers of domestic science, physical culture, and other subjects. Other women will be assisted while qualifying for public health work. A few may be chosen as suitable for medicine and law.

Schemes are contemplated for giving some the opportunity to study higher-grade cookery and higher clerical work. In conjunction with local authorities, it is proposed to provide special intensive courses to enable women to fulfil the conditions prescribed by the Board of Education for entering into training under the terms offered by local education authorities.

Interrupted Careers

Special consideration will be given to ex-Service and other women whose entry into war-work necessitated the interruption of their professional training, and whose circumstances are now so altered as to make it difficult to continue their studies.

Of the Central Committee Miss Mary Macarthur is honorary secretary and the members of the Committee include Miss Margaret Bondfield, Mrs. Garson, Miss Susan Lawrence, and Dr. Marion Phillips.

MINISTRY (WOMEN EMPLOYES).

"Parliamentary Debates" 24.11.19

Lieut.-Colonel CLAY asked the Parliamentary Secretary to the Ministry of Munitions how many women are still employed by the Ministry of Supply; what is the average weekly salary; and what steps are being taken to replace them by demobilised members of His Majesty's forces?

Mr. KELLAWAY: Parliament has not yet been asked to assent to the creation of a Ministry of Supply. The number of women at present employed by the Ministry of Munitions is 4,178, representing 46 per cent. of the total staff exclusive of messengers and cleaners. The large majority of the women are members of the clerical and typing grades, and are paid in accordance with scales prescribed by the Treasury, which range from 35s. to 62s. 6d. per week. As I stated in a reply on the 11th instant, measures are already in operation for the substitution, so far as possible, of non-Service employés of both sexes by ex-Service men, preference being given to disabled men and those who have served overseas. To assist in carrying out this policy, the Minister has appointed a committee, the majority of the members of which are ex-Service men and includes a representative of the Ministry of Munitions Association of Ex-Service Men. Since the Armistice the number of women employés at headquarters has been reduced by 10,131 and the number of male employés by 5,240. The number of ex-Service men now serving in the Ministry is approximately 2,381. Since 1st November over 100 ex-Service men have been substituted in the Ministry for non-Service men and women.

HARD CASE OF THE WORKLESS WOMEN

Faced With Starvation They Enter Underpaid Trades

PERIL TO WAGES

The Bill to increase unemployment benefit under the Insurance Acts passed its second reading on Thursday. It increases the benefit from 7s. to 11s. a week, and this may be received by three and a half million out of the 14 million workers of Great Britain.

An official of the National Federation of Women Workers, in an interview with a DAILY HERALD representative, states that the actual number of women unemployed is double the return of 34,000 given by the Ministry of Labour.

At all the former great centres of munition-making there are thousands of destitute women. Inquiry at Shepherd's Bush yesterday revealed 2,000 women out of work. At Woolwich there were 1,400.

National Factories Cold-shouldered

The policy, urged upon the Government by the National Federation of Women Workers, and by the DAILY HERALD, of using the national factories for providing work, has been completely rejected. The result is that many women are finding casual enployment in underpaid seasonal trades, and they will in future be liable to frequent spells of unemployment—a fact which will have obvious effects on wages.

We are informed that already the process of wage reduction has begun—in some cases in defiance of law. For instance, in small laundries, where it is difficult to discover if the regulations of the Laundry Trade Board are being carried out, women who demand the legal minimum are being dismissed, and others who will work for less get the jobs.

NEWCASTLE ROUSED

At a mass meeting of Gateshead unemployed the chairman declared they would demonstrate at the next meeting of the Gateshead Council. He also advised a demonstration at the Poor Law Offices and the Workhouse for relief.

The unemployed so far had been tolerant, but were not going to remain calm whilst their children were starving, in such weather as the present.

A resolution was carried demanding a fluctuating working week in all trades with hours regulated so as to absorb the unemployed.

ALL WILLING TO WORK

Our Edinburgh correspondent wires that a protest against the stoppage of donation was made at a mass meeting of domestic servants, laundry workers and others, held in the Central Hall, under the auspices of the Laundry Workers' Union.

Mrs. Telford said that the war had proved that everybody who could get work was willing to take it.

IF PEACEFUL MEANS FAIL —

West Bromwich Brassworkers adds to its protest a demand that the Trades Union Congress, if it cannot induce the Government by peaceful means to restore the dole, shall call the workers to drastic action.

Letter in Daily Herald 20. 11. 19.

Unemployment of Women.

The lot of the female clerical worker who is thrown on the labour market just now is not a happy one. I heard of an instance yesterday of nearly 1,000 applicants for one vacancy. In great degree, of course, this is due to changes in Government Departments where, apart from wholesale dismissals, the girls are being replaced by discharged soldiers in accordance with the 8 per cent. substitution scheme. And, no matter how considerately the various Ministries weed out the "independent" girls first, there is tragedy here, for many who are being discharged were tempted from "sure" commercial situations by the glamour of direct war service, and their ages have not stood still. Now, it would appear, a large number will have to seek spheres of usefulness other than clerical. The question is an urgent one, and there is great scope for official activity in that Department of the Ministry of Labour which was formed to provide free training for the unemployed woman.

DESOLATION WITHOUT DOLES.

MR. CLYNES, in the course of the fine speech which was the best contribution to the unemployment debate last week, reminded the Minister of Labour of the "desolate conditions" which will prevail during "our mis-named Christmas season" for a large number of those chiefly concerned in the Government announcement that "Civilian Doles" must cease. We cannot doubt that among those who will feel these desolate conditions in their fullest force are many of the women workers, who, less than two winters ago, were told and told again by almost every man in authority, that without their work the country could not have been saved.

Many men will suffer too, and their wives and children with them, but the problem is not so severe for them as it is for the women. Everybody knows that there is plenty of work ready for the men. Their unemployment is caused by industrial disorganisation, lack of transport facilities, housing difficulties, and other temporary conditions, some of which may be and should be rapidly put right. For women, on the other hand, there is a real lack of work which they can do and are permitted to do.

We make this statement boldly, conscious that we shall at once be met with the answer that was made in the House, and which is made everywhere. Women can do domestic work, and they are not only permitted to do it but the whole middle class, the whole country, in view of the reports from other lands we might almost say the whole world, is demanding that they should do it. Nevertheless, we believe that our statement is true. We do not deny that a certain number of women now out of work could conceivably find places as domestic servants. They are not amongst those who have been receiving the dole, because it is almost invariably refused to those who will not accept domestic places. But no doubt the unemployment among women as well as the general discomfort and disorganisation is increased by the fact that some of those who have been in domestic service would rather starve than go back to it, and that few of those who have done other work are willing to turn to this. This strong and widespread dislike is the inevitable result of the bad conditions that prevailed in the past. It will be modified as those conditions are reformed. For the moment the idea of degradation that belonged to them, is wrongly attributed to the work itself and the whole trade is judged by its abuses. The feeling is perhaps exaggerated, but it is quite inevitable. For the moment it complicates the situation in regard to the employment of women. But it does so mainly because, like most exaggerated sentiments, it produces an exaggerated sentiment in opposition to it, and thus adds to the difficulties of organisation. It affects the real issue very little. Even if there were the same number of women in domestic service now as before the war (and we doubt whether in present conditions the servant-keeping class could afford to pay or to feed so many), this would still leave thousands of women out of work. And the type of girl who can do, and has done factory work is for the most part quite unfitted for domestic work. For five years women have been urged by their love of country, and by their love of their own homes, to leave those homes and go into factories where they could contribute to the defence of the nation. Many thousands of them have responded to the call. These thousands are now trained for and moulded by the work they have been doing; they are not and cannot be suited for a totally different kind of work and of life. Moreover, in spite of the efforts that are being made to organise domestic work on a non-resident basis, it is still in most places a living-in trade. For the present it seems that it must continue to be so. Even in towns there are very few hostels for domestic servants, and this is not the moment when they can be increased. In the country there are, as far as we know, none at all; and if there were it is difficult to see how they could be run. The vast majority of servants must still live in; and thousands of the women out of work cannot do this, because they have dependents,—children or aged parents, or invalid husbands. At the present moment, besides the men who are officially recognised as disabled there is a very large number of others whose minds and nerves have been so shaken by the years of war as to leave them very unsatisfactory breadwinners, and in these cases the family must necessarily depend upon the wife. It is no use then for the Government, or any one else to refuse to face the fact that the withdrawal of the unemployment donation to civilians will result in bitter and unmerited suffering for a very large number of people, and of families. This is something more than the kind of accidental hardship for a few individuals which was all Sir Robert Horne seemed to contemplate.

It was no doubt a surprise to the Minister of Labour and his colleagues to meet with such indignant and outspoken criticism as came to them from all parts of the House. The cries for economy have been long and loud, and the simple but unintelligent form of economy which consists in first taking away the work by which people live and then saying that those who are not working cannot expect to be helped to live, has enough support in and out of the House of Commons to give some excuse to the Government for thinking that it was all that was expected of them. On a free vote indeed, there was a majority of 94 (217-123) for stopping the doles. But the debate that preceded the Division must have shown the Government that this was not all that was expected of them by the most intelligent and conscientious of their own supporters.

The fact is, that though nobody thinks the dole system satisfactory, few responsible and compassionate public men are prepared to see it simply swept away without the substitution of some other method of dealing with the problems involved. The Government have done very little to organise employment among men and nothing to organise it among women. This was already known and caused no surprise; what did cause surprise among those Coalition members who would like to be able to give Ministers their intelligent support, was that the statement as to the cessation of doles was unaccompanied by any scheme for a permanent and general unemployment insurance. Sir Samuel Hoare expressed the feeling of many members of the House on this subject, and said, "I very much regret that to-day we are faced with the dilemma of dropping the present system altogether or continuing it, rather than with the choice between what is obviously a temporary or inadequate system, and a permanent system in which all the trades of the country should be immediately or gradually introduced." He went on to point out that the question of a permanent scheme had been under consideration for more than two years, and that two or three definite schemes had been put before the Government since February, 1918. In these circumstances it is not much satisfaction to be told that "a Committee is considering a scheme." The Government ought to have had their suggestions ready considered, to put forward at the same time as their announcement about "doles."

As they have not done this, it is almost incredible that the unemployed civilian workers, including all but an "inappreciable number" of unemployed women will be left to face the hard and bitter winter that is before us without even the alleviation of a dole. The hardship will not be fairly distributed between the sexes, it will not even be fairly distributed among all women workers. Sir Samuel Hoare quoted a striking example of this, the case of the women in the Army Pay Department of the War Office. At present there are thirteen thousand of these women, and as they are not members of the Mobile Corps they are not entitled to continue to draw unemployment benefit. They are daily expecting dismissal because in the permanent organisation of the War Office their work will be carried out, as it was before the war, by soldiers. During the war they have dealt with the complicated business of separation allowances. Sir Samuel Hoare said:—

> "During the whole period of the war they worked regularly on Saturdays and Sundays, and in many cases very excessive hours of overtime. Now they are faced with dismissal with a certainty that they will be entitled to no unemployment benefit at all. Their case is the more serious from the fact that during these five years they have been mainly filling up Army forms, work that does not qualify them immediately for any civilian occupation. They have been kept on up till now because their work was indispensable. Those who were dispensable were dismissed first, and the others, who were the very best, were kept on for the convenience of the State."

The hardship will not be evenly distributed among women, but there will be plenty of it for all. Many even among those who are lucky enough to get work will feel it—for it will inevitably result in a fall of wages among some of the worst-paid women. The dole has at least fixed a minimum, though a most inadequate minimum, below which the standard of wages could not fall. Now it has gone, and side by side with the miseries of unemployment we shall have the old miseries of the sweated wage. It is a horrible prospect, and one which no public-spirited citizen can face with composure. We earnestly hope that the Government will reconsider their decision, and continue the "dole" till they have something better to offer in its stead.

Unemployed Women.

It is incumbent upon employers, of course, to do their very utmost to find positions for the discharged soldiers, but it is only right at the same time that the nation should realise that this, combined with other circumstances—the return of peace itself, for example—is throwing large numbers of dependent women out of work. The old conditions have gone for ever. Thousands of women who, if there had been no war, would somehow or other have contrived to live outside the industrial system have in the last five years become as absolutely dependent upon the earnings of their daily work as any man.

We shall not get over this awkward new social factor by simply thrusting women out of the posts which during the war they have become accustomed to fill. Many of them are now suffering actual distress, and it is intolerable that this should be ignored or contemplated as a permanent condition. The national industry will have to absorb our industrial women as well as our industrial men, or, sooner or later, there will be serious trouble. What is more, we must look to these women's output as one of the main avenues to our indispensable increase of national production. With shortened working hours and over a million male workers dead or disabled, the country needs every worker that it can get, irrespective of sex.

WOMEN'S UNEMPLOYMENT PAY.

SUGGESTED EQUALITY WITH MEN.

Standing Committee C in the House of Commons yesterday resumed consideration of the Unemployment Insurance Bill.

Several members had put down amendments making it necessary for insurance officers to give decisions on the claims of unemployed persons within seven days. The SOLICITOR-GENERAL suggested "as soon as may be" instead, but this was refused, and eventually his offer of 14 days was accepted.

The SOLICITOR-GENERAL pointed out that there was no need for amendments making women eligible as deputy umpires, the Sex Disqualification Act having removed all disability in that and other directions.

On Clause 15, which provides that where there is danger of the fund becoming insolvent the Treasury may make temporary modification of the benefits, but not below 12s. for men and 10s. for women, the SOLICITOR-GENERAL resisted an amendment putting both on the 12s. basis, pointing out that women's contributions were less.

Several members urged equality in the contributions, but it was pointed out that anything which went beyond the Treasury minute on the subject was out of order.

Mr. TREVELYAN THOMSON said it would be better to send the Bill back to the House for revision than to continue the disparity.

Mr. CLYNES said that the clause gave ample protection to the Treasury. Women generally earned less than men, and that was why the State imposed a lesser contribution, but it was no reason why they should receive a lesser amount for maintenance.

Other speakers urged the Solicitor-General to do something towards meeting the amendment, and eventually the Committee agreed to his suggestion that the discussion be adjourned until they reached the schedules, he meanwhile consulting the Minister on the subject.

The Committee then adjourned.

RED TAPE PROCESSION.

WOMEN CIVIL SERVANTS' PROTEST IN WHITEHALL.

A young girl clerk, with her hands and feet tied with red tape, led a procession of about 20 women Civil Service employees, each carrying a poster and connected to each other with red tape, in Whitehall last evening. The procession was organized by the Federation of Women Civil Servants to mark their dissatisfaction with the Civil Service Sub-Committee's Whitley Council report.

The organizer of the procession told a Press representative that the members had decided upon this means of drawing public attention to the demand of women in the Civil Service for equal pay and equal opportunities with men.

NEW PATH FOR WOMEN

SCIENCE OPENS A WAY NOW ART IS TOO WELL-WORN.

The happiest existence of all for an actress, despite hard work and much study, is in a repertory theatre. Such is the opinion of Miss Lena Ashwell, expressed in an article on acting as a profession for women included in a new book, "Women Workers in Seven Professions" (George Routledge and Sons, Limited). Her reasons are that "the opportunities are great; ambition is not thwarted at every step; the day is filled with hard study, but the nights result in greater or smaller achievement. Everybody with whom she comes in contact is working as hard and earnestly as she is. Life invigorating, progressive, uplifting, is hers."

Apart from the very few who achieve world-wide fame and high salaries, the life of average actresses (that is to say, the great majority), even with success, is not a bed of roses. "It is becoming a profession in which it is only possible to survive if the worker has some private means or a supplementary trade," we are told.

One of the greatest drawbacks is the uncertainty of the work. Under present conditions an actress may find herself, for no particular reason, "raised to a pinnacle of importance" if she happens to have a good part in a popular play; but at the end of the run she may suddenly find herself, again for no particular reason, forgotten by the public and ignored by managers.

In addition, if the part was a "well-dressed" one in a London theatre, she has probably acquired a taste for expensive clothes wholly out of proportion to her income, which, averaging her sisters, is 12s. 6d. a week, or 1s. 9d. a day. This, we are told, is the usual dole of an actor, deducting travelling and other expenses, but only, the writer is careful to emphasise, "when working."

Under present conditions the ordinary day for an ordinary actress is one in which she looks for work, "a heart-rending and usually fruitless quest." But if she be successful in obtaining work and becomes proficient in her profession, it by no means follows that her value is increased and permanent employment assured. In this respect the actress is not so fortunately placed as a domestic servant, whose "character," if satisfactory, usually ensures re-engagement.

And success in one direction is not regarded as necessarily implying success in another, and the lack of definite aim is said to be "mentally demoralising."

There are certain remedies which, if applied, would make for better conditions. They are thus summed up: "More care in selection, more belief that an actress, if she be of any use, can represent a diversity of types; a shutting of the doors on those who are obviously unfitted, however cheap their labour may be. This would be salvation to the women who are trying to earn their bread in the theatre. For it is time we ceased to grovel before this misused word 'art,' which covers the wasteful cruelty the present conditions in the theatre permit."

Other departments of women's work are dealt with amongst others in the book. It may surprise some to know that the Board of Agriculture and Fisheries has recently employed women upon various kinds of scientific work. Five are engaged in the Fishery Branch, which deals with the natural history of fish, their diseases, their protection and capture and kindred topics. Two women assistants, too, are engaged in the Herbarium and Library of the Royal Botanic Gardens at Kew, where botanists from every country come for the purposes of study and research.

Manchester Guardian, Oct 26th 1914.

WOMEN'S WORK.

NEW TRADES: FOR AND AGAINST

Councillor Margaret Ashton and Councillor Tom Fox were the principal speakers at a joint demonstration of the Bradford and New Cross sections of the Independent Labour party held last night at the Don Picture Palace, Ashton New Road. Mr. W. Plant presided.

Miss Ashton said the Relief Committee had taken what steps they could—but they were by no means adequate—to find unemployed women and to bring relief to them, and to aid them until trade improved again. It was improving very satisfactorily, if one might call anything satisfactory in these days, and it was improving very satisfactorily in Manchester. How long that would continue in the present state of the cotton industry around Manchester they had yet to find out.

They were considering various new trades which might possibly be taken from the Germans. But it was no good to bring in a new trade as a permanent trade unless it was going to be a definitely well-paid trade. (Hear, hear.) By introducing yet another poorly paid trade for women they would only be cutting down wages. She was never anxious to see low-class trades introduced into large centres, because it prevented wages being kept up of trades already existing. If a shortage of labour could be created the improvement of wages would be very marked, and as chairman of the Women's Employment Committee she was very unwilling to recommend the adoption of ill-paid trades. In the matter of relief let none imagine that they were receiving charity. It was not charity; it was the nation's contribution towards the war. It should not have been called relief, but State-aid, for that was what it was. (Hear, hear.) It was no disgrace to anyone whose employment had been taken away and whose menfolk had gone that they should require State aid.

Southport Visiter, Oct. 24th. 1914.

Police and the Question.

"Is not this really a matter the police?" our representative queried, and the member of the Watch Committee replied, "Of course, if there is misconduct it comes immediately under the police, but you cannot expect a constable to go up to a young lady walking with a Territorial along the street and tell her she must not consort with him. You could not possibly expect the police to do that." Discussing another phase of the question, this Watch Committee member did not think women patrols would be any good if they were to be confined to the streets. To do any good their operations would have to extend over the quieter portions of the town, and the outskirts. Then it was most likely they would find themselves in a very awkward position in dealing with any matter of that kind for which these patrols were intended. Unless their position were legalised they would have no power, and it was not within the power of the Watch Committee to legalise it; that would have to be done direct from the Home Office. In conclusion he remarked that he did not know of anything in the nature of women patrols having been suggested in other parts of the country.

Another Member's View.

Another member of the Watch Committee stated that he feared the women patrols would land themselves in trouble if they acted without authority. It was a legal matter, and the Watch Committee had not yet considered it, though he thought it would be considered at their next meeting. Asked if this was not a police matter the member said "What power have the police? All I have got to say is that unless these young people have committed some offence the police have no power." Of course if the police found these young people behaving themselves indecently they would come under the ordinary limits of the law. That would be the ordinary work of the police. In conclusion this member remarked that he fully expected the matter would come up at the next meeting of the Watch Committee, after all this furore of public opinion, but he said "It is not the Territorials who are to blame, it is the girls. They fairly throw themselves at these men, and instead of the fellows taking the girls home you see the girls taking the fellows home."

WOMEN POLICE.

Sir,—There are frequent references in the Guardian nowadays to the very urgent need for more recruits for Lord Kitchener's army, and hundreds of women in Nottingham are longing to be directly useful in this most practical of all ways. They cannot knit socks or make shirts all day (as it is, they are accused of driving other women out of a livelihood by spending their leisure time in this way), and the nursing ranks are full to overflowing. Why cannot we women follow the example of our French sisters, who are acting as railway servants, postmen, tram drivers, and conductors, and in other ways temporarily filling the places of the men who are fighting? We do Nottingham the credit of believing that many men with home responsibilities would gladly volunteer if they could do so with a clear conscience as to the welfare of their families in their absence, and (more pressing still) without anxiety as to their "jobs" on their return. Our men are making tremendous sacrifices for home and country and for us; if the girls left at home, young and strong, eager and fit for work, ask to be allowed to make lesser sacrifices of time and pleasure and home life in the same great cause, will the authorities forbid them? Women filling the posts of such men as I refer to might hand over the greater proportion (if not the whole) of their weekly wage to the man's family, thus helping to solve his personal problem and freeing him from anxiety. It is quite possible, too, that a part of the temporary need of employment for working women might be thus met, the girls retaining half, perhaps, of the weekly wage, the deficit in which would be made up to the soldier's family by the separation allowance.

As regards the police force, there are other reasons why women should be appointed, in this case to supplement as well as to temporarily replace the men's services. Only last July Lord Henry Bentinck supported a large and influential deputation that visited the Home Office to press for the appointment of police women. They are urgently needed for the better protection and supervision of women and children in the streets and public places, and their appointment would help to solve some of the present critical problems with regard to women and the camps (which the National Union of Women Workers is attempting to meet by their scheme for women patrols), women in the public-houses, &c. In many large towns in America, also in Germany, police women have been tried with conspicuous success; and the present would certainly seem to be a most appropriate time for making this experiment in England.—I am, sir, &c.,

LOCAL TOY INDUSTRIES.

The British Toy Association, which has recently taken up its quarters in New Oxford-street, is hoping to do much to relieve war distress and unemployment during the coming winter. The possibilities of toy-making are enormous, and it would be well for the local distress committees which are now working throughout the country under the control of the Prince of Wales's Fund organisation to realise them. The policy dictated to these committees is to give "work," not "alms," wherever possible, and a most important part of the duty they have undertaken consists in finding and providing employment for sufferers from the war. The organisation of a local toy industry in any town or village should not prove a very difficult or expensive task under the direction of the central association.

Carpenters are likely to be especially hard hit by the war, and many of them will be only too glad to get regular employment in cutting up the toy material into parts. They will find no difficulty in doing such work after the very briefest course of expert instruction. The assembling of the parts and the subsequent painting and varnishing should offer interesting and fairly lucrative employment to innumerable men, women, and children with clever fingers. The Association, which has no financial axe to grind, and only seeks to establish the toy industry from purely philanthropic motives, is now appealing for the formation of committees throughout the country to organise local toy industries on the co-operative lines which have proved so successful in Germany.

The employment of women in grocers' shops was discussed at a large gathering of grocers' assistants held at Walthamstow. Mr. J. M. Allen, general secretary of the association, said that on Sunday the Central Management Committee had decided to support any member or body of members who declined to work with female labour, which decision showed that the association was prepared to make the most effective protest possible against the innovation. It now remained with the assistants to show unity and solidarity, and if they did that the evil would soon be crushed out. (p. 1002.)

NOTTINGHAM'S NEW INDUSTRY.

Girls Learning the Art of Toy-Making.

NOVELTIES FOR XMAS.

A new industry which, it is hoped, may have distinct commercial possibilities, was started in Nottingham yesterday. Premises at 31, Derby-road, where the local branch of the W.S.P.U. used to carry on their activities, have been transferred to a local committee, with Mrs. D'Oyley Ransom at the head, and here a dozen girls are being taught toy-making. The venture is under the auspices of the Women's Emergency Corps, of which Miss Eva Moore, who is appearing at the Nottingham Theatre Royal this week, was one of the promoters.

Miss McClure, a lady instructor attached to the corps, has come from London to take charge of the initial stages of the enterprise. Toy-making centres in London and its suburbs have been working satisfactorily since September, and there seems no valid reason why the trade carried on with such success in the Nuremburg and other districts of Germany should not be captured by the output of the various establishments now being set up in various parts of England.

In Nottingham a dozen girls have been selected. They include several typists and bookkeepers, a governess, and a lace pattern maker. Many of them have been out of employment since the commencement of the war. Other girls will be selected from a number with whom the committee, through the Labour Exchange, are in touch if the venture warrants it.

For the first week the girls receive free tuition but after this they will be paid weekly until they become sufficiently expert to be paid on piece-work.

Throughout yesterday the new toy-makers were engaged in constructing wooden models of wheel-barrows, cut out in sections by means of fretsaws and afterwards joined up. By making such simple articles they will gradually progress to achievements such as a complete doll's house. The toys will be in no sense copies of the German articles, for some striking and original English designs are being supplied. A doll's house in the Tudor style of architecture, for instance, will be an attractive novelty for the Christmas bazaars.

Islington Gazette Nov. 2nd 1914.

The hardships endured by our fighting men are legion. We trust that the end of the campaign of slaughter will not be long delayed, and that we shall have the opportunity at no far distant date of living once again in peace and tranquility. The amount of distress at home, apart from all other considerations is lamentable. It is with this aspect of war that I wish more particularly to deal. The amount of unemployment among men has, naturally, been on a large scale, but from statistics published it appears that women have been deprived of their situations wholesale. Nowhere, perhaps, was this more apparent than in Finsbury, where within a short time of the outbreak of hostilities considerably over a thousand women and girls were at their wits end to find a means of earning an honest and respectable livelihood. At the psychological moment the Queen's Work for Women Fund was inaugurated, and thanks to the enthusiasm which the Mayoress (Mrs. Corke) and other ladies who loyally supported her, threw into the movement, an altogether brighter outlook has been ensured for these hapless women and girls. The difficulty has been overcome—or at least ameliorated, by the opening of a factory at 21, City-road, where a number of deft fingers are now busily engaged daily in various ways earning sufficient for their immediate needs, and, incidentally, aiming a blow at Germany's fast dwindling trade. The factory comprises a cooking centre and a toy department, the latter sending out quantities of wooden blocks which children so much delight in at Christmas time. In making purchases for presents next month we cannot do better than make certain beforehand that the goods we buy are of British manufacture.

* * * *

The Mayor and Mayoress are anxious that the women and girls out of employment in the borough shall know of the existence of this department at City-road. They will here have an opportunity of learning a trade; they will be able to tide over their period of distress without resort to charity, and time will be given them to endeavour to find the work to which they have been accustomed. The toys made will be sent to that popular shopping rendezvous of the West End—Bond-street—and sold for the benefit of the Belgian refugees. A grant of £150 has been made to Finsbury from the Queen's Work for Women Fund, and I am requested to state that the Mayoress will be grateful for, and will acknowledge, any donations, large or small, sent to the Town-hall, Rosebery-avenue, in order that this beneficent work may be successfully carried out. The Mayoress has been appointed collector on behalf of the fund in the borough, and thanks all those who have generously subscribed. The work undertaken, however, will necessitate a large expenditure, and I feel certain that her appeal for funds, notwithstanding the many calls made upon the public at the present time, will not be made in vain. To find work for the women and girls in the borough, who have unfortunately fallen upon bad times, is a scheme which is worthy of the heartiest support, and I hope the work will not suffer through lack of funds.

TOWN GIRLS FOR COUNTRY.

BACK TO THE LAND SCHEME AND ITS OBJECTS.

One of the most interesting and suggestive experiments arising out of the war, is that of taking factory girls from the towns to the country. The Central Committee on Women's Employment, seeking new sources of employment for those whom the war has left destitute, is actively helping in this new departure.

The Marchioness of Crewe, Chairman of the Central Committee, in an interview with a Globe reporter, outlined the objects of the scheme.

"In any efforts made to relieve distress," she said, "care should be taken to provide work which will be permanent in character. Ordinary relief work, while mitigating distress, does not usually increase the value of those employed as members of the labour market, and our aim is to provide work which will develop skill and enable those engaged in it to earn a permanent livelihood.

"The back to the land scheme which we have inaugurated is based on this idea. We shall teach women and girls all the intricacies and technicalities connected with the growing of fruit, vegetables, and flowers. We intend also to assist the Development Commissioners of the Board of Agriculture in establishing the industry of fruit pulping, drying vegetables, and bottling new unsweetened fruit preserves. By means of this work hundreds of tons of fruit which would otherwise have been wasted will be dealt with, and supplies for the Army and other public sources provided, thus developing a trade which has hitherto been centred in Germany.

"In the far west of England a new factory is being started in which the women and girls of the surrounding districts may find employment in this new branch of industry; and it is hoped that within a short time this work will be established on a paying basis, and probably 100 persons will be enjoying the healthy life of the country. There is no reason why women and girls should not take a greater part (as is done on the Continent) in making this country self-supporting as regards its food supplies. This work will take girls from the unhealthy life in many of the factories and find them employment for which there is great demand.

"At Radlett, in Herts, East London girls will soon be hard at work developing a good acreage of land with fruit, vegetables, and flowers. This scheme owes its origin to Mr. R. Phillimore, a son of the well-known Judge, upon whose land the work is being carried on. The girls are to be under the direction of two lady gardeners, who will train them with a view to their being skilled market gardeners and fruit growers. During the winter months the girls are to be taught subsidiary industries, such as basket making.

"When the experiment on Mr. Phillimore's estate is brought to an end an expert will be called in and he will decide on the improved value of the land, for which payment will be made.

"We consider that many other schemes on the lines of those we are establishing might be inaugurated with the object of relieving the distress caused by the war and of benefiting the country permanently."

MAKING CHRISTMAS TOYS IN HIGHER BROUGHTON.

An effort is being made to capture the German toy trade. A workroom has been established at the Armstrong Memorial Institute, attached to St. John's Church, Higher Broughton, and a number of girls and women are employed making "Bunnies" and "Teddies" for Christmas. Women's Employment Bureau.

The Women's Employment Bureau, which started operations at the Friends' Meeting House, Portland-street, nearly five weeks ago, is doing excellent work. Last week was very encouraging. Not only were the largest number of goods turned out, but the quality was very much better, and the workers have shown considerable improvement in fashioning the various toys they have been taught to make. The toy industry has long been monopolised by Germany, and the opportunity of successfully establishing this industry in England should not be lost. That the toys can be well and attractively made is quite evident from the stock which was on view at Portland-street on Friday afternoon.

The dolls were a delight! Some in the costumes of the Allies and their Colonies, some in the height of fashion, and others in more sober attire, attracted a good deal of attention, and were worthy of close inspection, so well were they carried out. Toy rabbits and dogs are among the favoured animals made at the Bureau, and it is good to learn that orders for the various goods are continually being received, so that the industry has a hopeful future. The registered trade-mark is "Snactoi," with which every article is labelled. I have already seen some of the animals displayed in the local shops, and when purchasing I hope you will all look out for the trade-mark, in order that Southport manufacturers may be supported.

No less than 37 women and girls were employed at the Bureau last week, and 98 garments, 189 stuffed toys, and 68 dressed dolls were turned out. Remnants of cloth, serge, flannel, etc., will be welcomed by the committee, who can have them made up into garments for the children of Belgium refugees and others in distress. Material for shirts is also needed, and may I remind you that the office is open daily (Saturdays excepted) from 10 to 12 to receive orders for garments for those in distress; but the toys are sold only to the trade. In supporting the work at the Bureau a double benefit is effected, for work is given to women and girls who have lost their employment through the war, and the garments they make are given by those who order them to those in distress. This is surely enough to commend it to everybody.

MANUFACTURE OF TOYS.

GLASGOW SCHEME FOR EMPLOYMENT OF WOMEN.

A scheme for the employment of women has been formulated by a special committee of the Glasgow Burgh Distress Committee. At a meeting on November 2 it was stated that within a week 378 women had applied for work. It was agreed to approach the Corporation with a view to obtaining immediate help from the Prince of Wales's Fund and also to urge upon them the necessity for providing work. At a subsequent meeting it was agreed to recommend that a workroom should be established by the Distress Committee to employ women to dress dolls and to manufacture a certain class of stuffed toy animals. It is pointed out that in starting a workroom of this character no competition would be offered to British firms, as the trade until now has been almost entirely carried on by Germany. The committee recommend that premises for the proposed workroom should be taken at 9 Watson Street at a rent of £40 per annum, and that the Local Government Board should be asked for their approval of the scheme. It has been ascertained that owing to the stoppage of supplies from Germany there is a great demand for all classes of toys, notably among the cheaper and more easily manufactured articles, such as plush balls, swings, skipping ropes, teddy bears, stuffed dolls, and numerous small knitted articles. The recommendations will be placed before the Distress Committee at their meeting in the City Chambers on Tuesday.

WAR-CREATED INDUSTRY.

Vegetable-Drying and Fruit-Canning.

WORK FOR WOMEN IN THE MIDLANDS.

The two halves of Europe are locked in an internecine war, so down on the borders of Warwickshire and Worcestershire factory girls are learning fruit-canning and vegetable-drying. It is one of those interesting instances with which we are growing so familiar, of a relatively trifling reaction of the great struggle abroad on our industrial life at home.

Nevertheless some of these industrial experiments, representing just the margin of additional enterprise which would never have been exerted but for the stimulus of the present necessity, may have permanently beneficial results on the labour market at home. That, there is reasonable ground for hoping, will be the outcome of the new industry set on foot at the Studley Agricultural College.

It is no doubt going beyond the mark to say that there is no vegetable-drying or fruit-canning at all carried on in England at the present moment. The Studley experiment, however, does represent substantially a new trade in the making, so far as this country is concerned, and entirely new is the demonstration that it is hoped will be afforded of the commercial practicability of the establishment of local factories for thus treating fruit and vegetables in contiguity to any considerable small holding area.

Contributing Causes.

While the success of this experiment is not dependent on the war, it is to the war that its initiation was directly due. The conditions conspiring together at the middle of August were these: a fruit-crop so heavy—plums particularly—that good food was rotting on the trees; some fear of a national food shortage; the urgent need of the troops for dried vegetables—of which Germany is the principal source of supply; and the existence of a mass of unemployment among women at home.

It only needed an alert and executive brain, which was found in the head of one of the members of the Central Committee on Women's Employment, to conceive a scheme that would in its measure do something to relieve all the difficulties thus created. Surplus fruit could be canned, vegetables could be dried in England as well as in Germany, girls whose regular work had failed them could soon be trained to efficiency in the new industry—and the Development Commission and the Women's Committee could pay the bill, or most of it. (The Bill, of course, is only for capital outlay and for wages in the first few months. It is not intended that the factory, when once established, shall be run on other than commercial lines.)

That, in fact, is the course events have taken. The Board of Agriculture, approached by Mrs. H. J. Tennant, gave the scheme its approval, recommended Studley as the site for the experiment, and appointed a committee to control the enterprise and an expert to give the necessary guidance on the spot. As a result, in less than six weeks after the proposal was first mooted, the fruit-canning was in progress at Studley and the vegetable-drying in premises lent by Mr. C. S. Martin at Dunnington Heath, a few miles away. The extent of the work is temporarily limited while the necessary plant is being installed, but it is anticipated that in a week or two 150 girls, drawn principally from the Redditch and Birmingham district, will be given employment at the rates laid down by the Central Women's Committee, which is making itself responsible for their wages.

On a Commercial Basis.

As a contribution to the solution of the unemployment problem the work at Studley can clearly make only a modest claim. Its importance lies in the fact that if it can employ its 150 girls successfully on a commercial basis similar factories will, no doubt, spring up in many other localities. In the opinion of Dr. Lillias Hamilton, the Principal of Studley, and Mr. W. Spence, the official adviser to the scheme, it will be much more profitable to smallholders to dispose of their fruit and vegetables to a factory on the spot than to consign them, at heavy railway charges, to distant markets.

Dried vegetables are little known in this country, but the promoters of the present scheme have the incentive of knowing that there is a large export trade to India, South America, and elsewhere lately in the hands of Germany. During the South African war enormous sums were spent on dried vegetables from Germany for the British troops, and it is to our Expeditionary Force that practically the whole output of the new factory will go. The simplification of the transport problem is shown by the fact that a ton of fresh vegetables is said to compress into a hundredweight of dried, expanding when cooked to practically its original volume. Onions, parsnips, peas and beans, cabbages, and carrots can all be preserved by this treatment.

The fruit-preserving is on certain distinctive lines, and competes little, if at all, with any established home industry. The advantages claimed for the scheme in its two branches are briefly that it will help to conserve the food supplies of the country; that it will be of substantial financial benefit to smallholders; that it will establish a new rural industry to arrest the drift to the towns; and that it will provide a healthy and remunerative avenue of employment to women of both the educated and the "working" classes, wages for forewomen being likely to run, as in similar industries, to 35s. or £2 a week—well above the average typist's salary.

In drawing its first staff from the unemployed of other trades rather than from girls intending to find permanent employment in the new industry the Studley experiment starts under certain disadvantages, but in other respects there is obvious benefit to both sides in co-operation with Lady Crewe's Committee.

Like one or two other projects launched under the same pressure of circumstances the scheme may permanently broaden the prospects before women adopting industrial careers.

Women's Service League Scheme To Help Out-Of-Work Girls.

Will you buy a beautiful baby British Bimbo? What is a Bimbo? It is a new toy made by the Bee Toymakers, who are mostly West End dressmaker girls out of employment through the war, working in connection with the Women's Service Scheme.

Bimbo was originally a rabbit, but it developed into a doll—the quaintest of the quaint; its quaintness is assured, because Bimbo's designer is Miss Lloyd, the well-known Paris artist, who has exhibited at the salon, designed scenery, and made a hobby of pretty and amusing things for children.

Bimbos are to be seen at the Englishwoman Exhibition.

EMPLOYMENT SCHEMES FOR WOMEN.

UTILISING VACANT LAND.

A very promising scheme of constructive social reform has been evolved by the National Political League, an energetic organisation directed by educated women, which has its headquarters at 16, St. James's-street, London, S.W. The scheme will not only be of use in the present difficult conditions, but also have a permanent value. The intention is to create co-operative industries on the land which will give an independent living to men and women. Particular attention will be given to the problem of educated women of the professional class who are either thrown out of work or who cannot obtain work at the present time. The work also will be of value from the point of view of food supply, a most important aspect under "war conditions."

Among the bodies affiliated to the National Political League Land Council are:

The Vacant Land Society, which has under cultivation 50 acres, giving employment to 400 men and women; the Westmorland and Cumberland Scheme, the East of England Dairy Association the Colonial Intelligence Bureau.

Allotments and Smallholdings Association of England.

The Women's Co-operative Farmers Ltd.

The league have also enlisted the co-operation in training women of the Studley and Swanley Horticultural Colleges, and their scheme has been approved by the Board of Agriculture, which has offered the co-operation of the agricultural colleges throughout the country.

POULTRY FARMING.

The league's aim is to create industries on the land, which will benefit the country as well as establish women on a good business in independent positions. "Intensive poultry" schemes are already being organised, and are expected to be in full working order within a few weeks. This is a work of great public utility at the present time. Our country is particularly suited to such an industry, which would, if established, do away with the need of any shortage of this important food supply. Allotments of vacant land are being utilised in London and other parts of the country. Women are being placed on the land in other capacities as part of a carefully thought out plan.

Land to the extent of about 300 acres has been offered for utilisation by the leagues, and as far as possible each scheme will be worked out on a co-operative basis. Offers have come from Sussex, East Fife, Gloucestershire, Ballantrae, the Vale of Evesham, Glasgow, and Bournemouth.

In Gloucester it is hoped to establish a small co-operative colony which will undertake poultry schemes, dairying, fruit farming, market gardening. In all these offers the problem of housing has been solved, in most cases cottages having been given rent free for at least one year.

In the Vale of Evesham land has been offered to establish a jam factory, which is a great need, and so near to the land offered in Gloucestershire as to make co-operation possible.

NEED FOR FUNDS.

The executive make an earnest appeal for support in the extensive work they are undertaking to help the country at this crisis. The expenses include: A fund for administration and work over the country; necessary outlay for establishing industries; other general expenses in keeping up the league's work in all its branches.

In addition, offers of personal help, whether in connection with land industries or administrative work, would be much appreciated. Communications should be sent to the Secretary, Miss M. M. Farquharson, at the offices of the League, 16, St. James's-street, S.W.

The Glasgow News, Nov: 10th. 1914.

UNEMPLOYED WOMEN AND TOY-MAKING.

Unemployment amongst women in Glasgow at present is extensive. In one week alone there were 378 applications for work. The Glasgow Distress Committee was appealed to, with the result that that body has formulated a scheme of employment for women. It has been proposed to establish a workroom where the females can dress dolls and manufacture a certain class of stuffed toy animals. This class of work, it is stated, was almost entirely carried on by Germany, so that the proposed "factory" will not be in competition with any British firm. At one period a shortage of toys for Christmas was anticipated, but should the scheme be approved and work proceeded with immediately, the Santa Claus for Glasgow should have a well-filled bag. The committee have further recommended that premises in Watson Street be taken for use as a workroom.

Irish Times, Nov: 11th. 1914.

TOY-MAKING IN DUBLIN.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE IRISH TIMES.

Sir,—Some time ago you kindly published an appeal for evening recreation for the young people of Dublin. The response to that appeal was most generous, but for various reasons nothing definite could be done last winter. When war was declared the sudden cancelling of all social functions brought hundreds of girls employed in the dressmaking, millinery, box-making, biscuit, and sweet trades face to face with actual starvation. In the emergency I was empowered to use the money subscribed to start some industry. We thought that toy-making offered the best prospects of a quick return. The Suffrage Emergency Council gave me the use of the premises, 9 Nassau street, generously placed at their disposal by Mrs. Kingsley Tarpey. Lady Wright gave furniture, and we started at once.

Knowing how many calls every one has on every side, we have managed as long as we could. We have begged and borrowed and hired machines. The shops have been most generous in their terms for materials. Our voluntary helpers have been simply magnificent, and the Mansion House Fund has allowed us 75 per cent. of the wages of the girls recommended by them. Best of all, we are beginning to sell in some quantity and to get special orders. We have been able to keep fifty girls busy, but we have to pay trained instructors and forewomen. Our weekly expenses include heat, light, and materials, and the extra 25 per cent. of wages, as well as the whole wages of cases which the Prince of Wales's Fund cannot help.

We have lately been lent another house by Mr. Beatty, of Dame street, but still we are overflowing—the tide of unemployed girls keeps rising steadily. We could take another hundred girls at the toys, and an embroidery class (to capture a hitherto German trade) has been started, as well as the domestic training centres so badly needed. I should like to see a toy factory established by the business men of Dublin to make the toys that Irish children really want, not rubbish thrust on them by Germany, as well as the educational toys hitherto made in Germany and Italy. There is a chance this coming year that will never recur of building up a trade entirely suitable to our people, in which our disabled soldiers and sailors, who will soon be among us in thousands, could be employed.

We have hundreds of girls thrown out of work by no fault of their own. These young creatures are the very life blood of our country; more, they they are the future hope of devitalised Europe. They are very brave and uncomplaining; they ask nothing but to be allowed to work from 9 to 5 for 1/2 a day, and they work really well. Many—indeed, most of them—have mothers or little sisters depending on them, and such is the unconquerable spirit of Irish youth that, at their own request, they are now getting up a Christmas entertainment to raise funds for their comrades out of work, thus laying the foundation for the recreation hall quite naturally.

The Suffrage Emergency Council, working under the Mansion House Distress Fund, keeps well to the front the recommendation of the Prince of Wales—"It is my wish that money given to the National Relief Fund may, as far as possible, flow into productive channels, such as assisting schemes for male and female employment, and, perhaps, industrial training, for it is as repugnant to me as it must be to the recipients that assistance should be distributed only in the form of doles. What men must want is work, and what young people need is training."

I am quite sure the thinking Irish public only need to have these facts laid before them to come forward and help. We have the foundations of a splendid trade. We are offered £50 for machinery to develop it, if we can take permanent premises. We only want a guarantee that there will be sufficient money to carry on into next year. Every £1 means employment for a girl for a week; every £5 we get enables us to buy fresh materials. Help us to capture a German trade. Help us to keep the respectable hard-working girls of our city from starvation. Help us to build a business that will [illegible] Yours, etc.

Dundee Advertiser, November 10th. 1914.

TOY MAKING.

INTERESTING NEW INDUSTRY IN DUNDEE.

The works of the Women's War Relief Fund Committee are many and varied. Nothing is too small, nothing is too large, for their activities. They have accomplished in their short tenure an almost miraculous record of usefulness. Quite lately a Sub-Committee was formed in conjunction with the Emergency Committee, the members being Mrs Gilroy, Ballumbie; Miss Gilory, Mrs Godfrey Shepherd, Mrs Harold Gilroy, Mrs J. C. Methven, Mrs Rennie; Miss Margaret Cunningham, Hirsel; and Miss Mary Henderson, Hon. Secy.

Thanks to the joint efforts of these ladies, a new industry has been provided for women unemployed through the war—that of toy-making. If a visitor pops into the big, airy rooms at 77 Nethergate he will find them literally hives of industry. Seated at long tables, busy with needle and treadle, are bright-faced, happy women, busily employed turning out toys that will bring a wriggle to many a girlie's throat, a smile to many a sad eye. They are working away right merrily, these girls and women, their hours being short—from 10 a.m. till 1 p.m., and from 2 p.m. to 5 p.m. Mrs Lees, the cleverLady Superintendent, says that the work is peculiarly suited to women, but that men also will find toy-making lucrative.

The first toy on the market is a dear little Red Cross set of apron, sleeve, mob cap, with the Red Cross emblazoned on sleeve and apron; and even three tiny badges are included to make the owner imagine herself a "real live nurse." There is also a splendid new military game called "Storming the Fort." It consists of a series of forts, each with the name of a German stronghold, Essen, Berlin, &c., and the game is to run a coloured marble through the gate of each fort. When the player succeeds in "taking" a fort, then a flag of the Allies is planted on top of the battlements.

These interesting toys have been designed by two members of the W.W.R.F.C., and several others equally good are in course of completion. The Committee, which deserves great credit for its initiative and enterprise, hopes to be able to supply some of the toys required for the Christmas treat to the children of all Dundee men on active service.

PATRIOTIC DOLLS.

(To the Editor of the "Evening Mail.")

Sir,—Nothing, I think, gives one such an impression of the sterling courage of the Parisians as to read of the quiet way in which their autumn fashion shows are being carried through, and the orders that are being given, not, one may be sure, in order that one woman may outvie another in her dress, but rather in her quiet courage.

Our English women are doing their share in the same direction, but for all their efforts there are many who cannot make their accustomed purchases, and milliners and dressmakers are, to a great extent, without their usual work.

The Newcastle Women Workers' Committee has set up a small workroom at Hope House, Oxford Street, where these girls are being employed in dressing dolls in the uniforms of the Allied Armies. Thomas Atkins is there with all his little pockets and leather trappings; Piou-Piou in the crimson trousers that the Germans know so well, and his poor brother from Belgium; also a gorgeous Zouave is shortly to be joined by a Highlander and a Cossack.

Those who cannot make their usual purchases of winter smart clothes will, we are sure, still find a few shillings to spare in toys for their children friends at Christmas. If they will spend this money in purchasing these dolls, which will certainly be particularly popular and appealing to the children this Christmas, they will be able at the same time to give employment to those of their poorer sisters who are especially hard hit by the war.

Orders may be placed and dolls can be seen at the shop, 31, Blackett Street, or ordered from the Women Workers' Committee.—Yours, etc.,

TOY-MAKING IN DUBLIN.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE IRISH TIMES.

SIR,—Some time ago you kindly published an appeal for evening recreation for the young people of Dublin. The response to that appeal was most generous, but for various reasons nothing definite could be done last winter. When war was declared the sudden cancelling of all social functions brought hundreds of girls employed in the dressmaking, millinery, box-making, biscuit, and sweet trades face to face with actual starvation. In the emergency I was empowered to use the money subscribed to start some industry. We thought that toy-making offered the best prospects of a quick return. The Suffrage Emergency Council gave me the use of the premises, 9 Nassau street, generously placed at their disposal by Mrs. Kingsley Tarpey. Lady Wright gave furniture, and we started at once.

Knowing how many calls every one has on every side, we have managed as long as we could. We have begged and borrowed and hired machines. The shops have been most generous in their terms for materials. Our voluntary helpers have been simply magnificent, and the Mansion House Fund has allowed us 75 per cent. of the wages of the girls recommended by them. Best of all, we are beginning to sell in some quantity and to get special orders. We have been able to keep fifty girls busy, but we have to pay trained instructors and forewomen. Our weekly expenses include heat, light, and materials, and the extra 25 per cent. of wages, as well as the whole wages of cases which the Prince of Wales's Fund cannot help.

We have lately been lent another house by Mr. Beatty, of Dame street, but still we are overflowing—the tide of unemployed girls keeps rising steadily. We could take another hundred girls at the toys, and an embroidery class (to capture a hitherto German trade) has been started, as well as the domestic training centres so badly needed. I should like to see a toy factory established by the business men of Dublin to make the toys that Irish children really want, not rubbish thrust on them by Germany as well as the educational toys hitherto made in Germany and Italy. There is a chance this coming year that will never recur of building up a trade entirely suitable to our people, in which our disabled soldiers and sailors, who will soon be among us in thousands, could be employed.

We have hundreds of girls thrown out of work by no fault of their own. These young creatures are the very life blood of our country; more, they are the future hope of devitalised Europe. They are very brave and uncomplaining; they ask nothing but to be allowed to work from 9 to 5 for 7/ a day, and they work really well. Many—indeed, most of them—have mothers or little sisters depending on them, and such is the unconquerable spirit of Irish youth that, at their own request, they are now getting up a Christmas entertainment to raise funds for their comrades out of work, thus laying the foundation for the recreation hall quite naturally.

The Suffrage Emergency Council, working under the Mansion House Distress Fund, keeps well to the from the recommendation of the Prince of Wales—"It is my wish that money given to the National Relief Fund may, as far as possible, flow into productive channels, such as assisting schemes for male and female employment, and, perhaps, industrial training, for it is as repugnant to me as it must be to the recipients that assistance should be distributed only in the form of doles. What men most want is work, and what young people need is training."

I am quite sure the thinking Irish public only need to have these facts laid before them to come forward and help. We have the foundations of a splendid trade. We are offered £50 for machinery to develop it, if we can take permanent premises. We only want a guarantee that there will be sufficient money to carry on into next year. Every 5/ means employment for a girl for a week; every penny we sell enables us to buy fresh materials. Help us to capture a German trade. Help us to keep the respectable hardworking girls of our city from starvation. Help us to found a business that will be a lasting benefit to our city.—Yours, etc.,

TOY MAKING.

INTERESTING NEW INDUSTRY IN DUNDEE.

The works of the Women's War Relief Fund Committee are many and varied. Nothing is too small, nothing is too large, for their activities. They have accomplished in their short tenure an almost miraculous record of usefulness. Quite lately a Sub-Committee was formed in conjunction with the Emergency Committee, the members being Mrs Gilroy, Ballumbie; Miss Gilory, Mrs Godfrey Shepherd, Mrs Harold Gilroy, Mrs J. C. Methven, Mrs Rennie; Miss Margaret Cunningham, Hirsel; and Miss Mary Henderson, Hon. Secy.

Thanks to the joint efforts of these ladies, a new industry has been provided for women unemployed through the war—that of toy-making. If a visitor pops into the big, airy rooms at 77 Nethergate he will find them literally hives of industry. Seated at long tables, busy with needle and treadle, are bright-faced, happy women, busily employed turning out toys that will bring a gurgle to many a girlie's throat, a smile to many a sad eye. They are working away right merrily, these girls and women, their hours being short—from 10 a.m. till 1 p.m., and from 2 p.m. to 5 p.m. Mrs Lees, the clever Lady Superintendent, says that the work is peculiarly suited to women, but that men also will find toy-making lucrative.

The first toy on the market is a dear little Red Cross set of apron, sleeve, mob cap, with the Red Cross emblazoned on sleeve and apron; and even three tiny badges are included to make the owner imagine herself a "real live nurse." There is also a splendid new military game called "Storming the Fort." It consists of a series of forts, each with the name of a German stronghold, Essen, Berlin, &c., and the game is to run a coloured marble through the gate of each fort. When the player succeeds in "taking" a fort, then a flag of the Allies is planted on top of the battlements.

These interesting toys have been designed by two members of the W.W.R.F.C., and several others equally good are in course of completion. The Committee, which deserves great credit for its initiative and enterprise, hopes to be able to supply some of the toys required for the Christmas treat to the children of all Dundee men on active service.

Unemployment amongst women in Glasgow at present is extensive. In one week alone there were 378 applications for work. The Glasgow Distress Committee was appealed to, with the result that that body has formulated a scheme of employment for women. It has been proposed to establish a workroom where the females can dress dolls and manufacture a certain class of stuffed toy animals. This class of work, it is stated, was almost entirely carried on by Germany, so that the proposed "factory" will not be in competition with any British firm. At one period a shortage of toys for Christmas was anticipated, but should the scheme be approved and work proceeded with immediately, the Santa Claus for Glasgow should have a well-filled bag. The committee have further recommended that premises in Watson Street be taken for use as a workroom.

THE WORLD OF WOMEN.

Toy-making in Birmingham.

"Teddy Bears" No Longer Made in Germany.

SOME in furry yellow coats, others in smooth brown ones, a number of Teddy Bears lay sprawling in helpless confusion on the table winking at one another with little black beady eyes. They were the vanguard of the army with which Birmingham is going to capture Germany's Christmas toy trade.

All around the room where the pile of finished Teddy Bears sat in state were others, or portions of their anatomy, in various stages of development. There were legs and arms and bodies in process of being stuffed; yellow furry skins were being cut into approved Teddy Bear shapes, and, final process of all, the sewing on of little black buttons for eyes and the darning in black wool of pointed noses and padded paws were transforming the furry balls into real life-like Teddies.

Birmingham's first Teddy Bear factory was started a little over three weeks ago by Miss Matheson, of the Women's Settlement, in two club-rooms at the back of a small temperance public-house, where social workers from the settlement formerly held their meetings. These two rooms are now filled with women and girl workers, who, having been thrown out of regular employment by the war, are being taught how to make toys.

Unlike the toy factory started by the Women's Emergency Corps, which is run entirely by voluntary workers, the Settlement Factory is a commercial undertaking, and pays its workers trade wages. Miss Matheson, who is in charge of the factory, has had considerable experience in the toy trade, and has a number of orders on hand.

"We began with Teddy Bears, but we are extending our trade," said the superintendent of the factory as she began to explain some of their processes of manufacture. "We are making rag dolls and Esquimaux dolls, and find they take very well. And we have even started a doll to do at home. Then when we started the factory they stayed with us. At first we had only eight, now we have fourteen, workers, besides six or seven women who do such work as machining in their own homes."

Although the women were absolutely new to this kind of work, their teacher considered they had made remarkable progress, particularly as they had not had any technical teaching. Toy-making of any kind has been so little practised in England that it has been found almost impossible to obtain technical teachers for the toy factories which have now begun to spring up in different parts of England.

"As we couldn't get anyone to teach us," said the superintendent of the factory, "we bought a few of the best Teddy Bears on the market and pulled them to pieces. And although we have still something to learn in the art of making Teddy Bears, we consider that we have made splendid progress, for we now have as many orders on hand as we can fulfil."

To cater for the toy trade of the Midlands is the ambition of the settlement factory, and up to the present only the firms in Birmingham and the Midland towns have been approached for orders. The result, however, has been so satisfactory that it is anticipated that in a few weeks' time, when the factory has been moved to the more spacious quarters of the new hall adjoining the settlement, employment for more workers will be available.

A BELGIAN SOLDIER DOLL.

The modest price of the Belgian soldier doll is one shilling and sixpence."

Although, like the toy factory of the Women's Emergency Corps, the Settlement Factory was started primarily with the object of giving work to women thrown out of employment by the war, it is in no sense a charitable undertaking. "If I cannot place the factory on a business basis and pay the workers proper wages I shall give it up," said Miss Matheson when speaking of the financial side of the new venture. "In regard to wages we took the Trade Board minimum of 3d. per hour, so the workers' takings average about 10s. a week. If we can maintain the factory on a paying basis we shall keep it on. It is in no sense merely a temporary experiment to tide over the unemployment caused by the war. We want it to continue and win a recognised position in the toy trade of the Midlands." And in this aim all visitors to the factory who see its prosperous condition after three short weeks of existence will wish it success.

Unlike the toy factory started by the Women's Emergency Corps in London, where the workers are in many cases educated women, the employees of this new factory are working women and girls who live in the neighbourhood of the settlement and are known to its social workers.

HOW THE FACTORY WAS STARTED.

"We did not start straightaway with toy-making," explained Miss Preston, an old settlement student, who is in charge of the factory, when I visited it. "It developed out of a sewing class which we started at the beginning of the war. Women who were out of employment came to us and gave their time free, and in the evenings we gave them paid work factory, and up to the present only the firms in Birmingham and the Midland towns have been approached for orders. It is a Belgian soldier doll, and there is the most important part of it." Numbers of small round white plush balls were being turned in the hands of a lady assistant into soldier dolls' heads by the plentiful use of vermilion and black. "This is the finished article wearing the uniform of a Belgian soldier of the 9th Infantry Regiment, the regiment which gallantly held Liege for so long against the onslaught of the Germans. The Belgian soldier doll was kindly designed for us by a Belgian artist and sculptor from Malines, who has made his home in Birmingham, and thus the uniform is correct in every detail. He is to be registered as a Settlement Factory speciality, as will his companion, a lady doll, which has not yet left the hands of the designer.

A CHANGE FOR THE BETTER! THE GERMAN WAITER IN LONDON OUSTED BY THE ENGLISH GIRL.

While others have talked about substitutes for German waiters one great firm of restaurateurs have acted. Habitues of the balcony floor at the Popular Café, in Piccadilly, now find that instead of German waiters bright and attentive English girls serve them at table. As will be seen from an article on the opposite page, Messrs. Lyons and Co. have made the change to the complete satisfaction of their patrons. The pictures show members of the new staff grouped and at work. Over 100 London girls are employed at this establishment alone.

The Daily Graphic, Nov: 19th; 1914.

ENGLISH GIRLS AS WAITERS.

ALIEN STAFF DISPENSED WITH AT THE POPULAR CAFE.

One of the minor changes in the social life of London brought about by the war has been instituted at the "Popular" Cafe, one of the best known of Messrs. Lyons' cafe enterprises. The thinning out of the number of English waiters by enlistment and the decision to dispense with enemy alien waiters placed the "Popular" in a bit of a quandary.

The Lyons firm were told that for a Piccadilly trade such as theirs, composed of lunch, dinner and supper business, waiters were essential. They replied that they believed English girls could do all the work equally well, and they at once replaced the whole of the balcony and grand hall waiting staff with young women.

The experiment was no trifling one. It involved the engagement of about 100 bright and intelligent English girls, and although some of them were experienced, many were not. With characteristic thoroughness the firm established training classes for the latter, and in these the neophytes are put through their paces daily, being taught not only how to lay a table and how to hand food round at table—which, of course, "comes natural" to most of them—but also the composition and preparation of the dishes they serve. In this way they are not only made efficient waitresses, but receive a practical education in household economy which must prove of the greatest value to them when they come to marry, as most of them do.

SUCCESS IN EVERY WAY.

"The new system is a perfect success," the manager of the "Popular" told the DAILY GRAPHIC yesterday; "so much so that I doubt if we shall ever revert to the old one. There has been no complaint, while on the other hand many patrons have personally expressed satisfaction. They say that the work is more neatly and willingly done. Of course, we still have some male waiters—British—for those who specially wish for them."

"And is the work liked by the girls?"

"Very much, to judge from the number who wish to do it. We get applications from all over the country, from girls of good social position, who wish to do work and do not care for an office or serving behind a counter. We contend that the conditions and earnings compare favourably with those in other businesses. A girl who comes on duty at nine goes off about three, while those who begin at three finish soon after nine, each with a good hot meal during the interval. Every girl gets a fortnight's holiday per year on full pay, one day off a week and every other Sunday. Not bad conditions, are they?"

The fresh faces and the pleasantly independent bearing of these recruits to the working force which is replacing Germans and Austrians in London supply the best answer, while the average diner might add, slightly to alter Gilbert:—

When a man goes to eat,
These waitresses neat
Are a cheering sight to see.

NO MORE GERMAN TOYS.

There was an interesting exhibition of toys in the Bishop's Rooms, Church House, Manchester, yesterday. The toys were mostly indestructible cloth animals, etc., and were made by Salford women at the St. John's Institute, Higher Broughton. The purpose of the exhibition was to extend the toy market in Manchester, which until recently had been supplied almost entirely by Germany. The promoters of the exhibition were Miss Broadhurst, Miss Renshaw, and Miss Knox (daughter of the Bishop). The object of the Institute is to provide employment for the women of Salford who are out of work through the war.

Hampshire Independent, Nov: 21st 1914.

SUGGESTED NEW INDUSTRY.

The Rev. Father O'Mahony, a member of the local Juvenile Advisory Committee, mentioned that there were at present 241 girls, between the ages of 14 and 17, on the unemployed list. It had been reported to that Committee that an organization was in existence for the teaching of toy making, and that a sale for toys was assured. For the first three weeks the girls under tuition would pay 2s. weekly, receiving payment after that time. It had been suggested, he said, that he should apply to the Relief Committee for a grant towards the payment of the fees of as many as the Committee were generous to provide for. The Women's Emergency Corps was connected with the scheme, but the suggestion was that the money, if a grant was made, should be paid to the Advisory Committee.

Mrs. Palmer said that large orders had been received by the organisation for the Christmas trade, and if the girls were trained they could execute them. The total cost to the Committee would be only £10.

Dr. Stancomb said the work was well carried out, and quite in the spirit with the aims of the Committee. It was work of a new and non-competitive kind, based on the best principles.

Alderman Sharp also supported, believing the employment to be useful, and likely to be a save to the Committee. In addition it would mean the capture of some of the German trade.

Answering a question as to what the earning capacity of the girls would be, Mr. Elsey said that, after three weeks, it was possible for the girls to earn 5s. a week.

It was decided to make the grant.

GERMAN TRADE CAPTURE.

The endeavour to capture German trade has brought what promises to be an important new industry to Portsmouth.

Amongst the enormous quantities of German-made goods which flowed into this country before the outbreak of the war was a popular spiral wire corset busk, which was claimed to be unbreakable. The article could easily be produced in England, but its manufacture was protected by patent rights. Thousands of pounds have been expended in advertising the article, which bears the trade name of "Hercules."

The Warrington Woven Wire Co., Ltd., of Portsmouth, applied to the Comptroller of Patents for permission to work the patent, and have received an intimation from the Board of Trade that the license has been suspended so far as that firm is concerned. The firm is now empowered to proceed with the manufacture of the goods, the shortage of supplies of which has been a serious handicap to the corset trade.

The new industry will provide employment for a number of Portsmouth women and girls.

WOMEN'S LOCAL GOVERNMENT ASSOCIATION.

Women Park-keepers and Police.

The annual general meeting of the Paddington Branch was held on November 25, at 16, Sussex-square (by kind permission of Mrs. Thomasson). The Hon. Mrs. Spencer Graves presided. After the annual report and accounts had been submitted and adopted and the officers and committee elected, a short account of St. Hilda's Club was given by Miss F. A. Witt, who said that the members were making a lot of knitted and other garments, but that the club was suffering from lack of helpers.

Miss Rivington spoke of the workrooms opened for renovating garments for the Belgian refugees, thus giving temporary work to unemployed girls. A maintenance grant of threepence an hour was given to the workers, and the rooms, added to by the kindness of Miss Leigh Browne, were opened from ten till five on five days a week, so as to allow the girls to seek for better and permanent work. Unfortunately the funds are nearly exhausted, and work will have to cease, unless kind friends will come forward to support it speedily. The girls have been most grateful for assistance in their need and for the personal interest shown by the supervisors.

An address was then given by Mrs. Percy Bigland on "Women as Park-keepers," for whom there is a distinct need. The better class working woman will not allow her children to wander about in the parks alone, and this indicates the feeling that they should be safeguarded in some way, and can spend their time there with a sense of security. Those interested in Local Government should do what they could to press for this reform. The idea was started in 1911 by the Women's Industrial Council, a deputation attending the Parks Committee of the London County Council. In 1913 two other conferences were held, and it was unanimously decided that women as park-keepers were a necessity. In America women were employed both as park-keepers and police, also to oversee cinema shows and music-halls. Women are more observant of details than men, and could give a friendly warning to a child or a young girl. She thought that women were strongly needed as an addition to the Force. The civic order of our country should be shared by both women and men.

Votes of thanks concluded the proceedings.

Teaching Women New Trades.

BUSY DAY WITH THE EMPLOYMENT COMMITTEE.

I spent a day recently with the Central Committee on Women's Employment. It is a whirling centre sending out circles which increase and extend, until they seem as if they must catch in every unemployed woman in the land—which is what they are meant to do.

At the heart of all things is the secretary. No one who has spent a day in the great house in Grosvenor-place doubts that. You meet people loitering on the staircase, waiting patiently until Miss Macarthur's door shall open and she be disengaged, or preparing to burst in accidentally in the hope of being asked to remain.

There is always a wild scene following the departure of a visitor from the secretary's room. A determined score or so of typists push papers before her to sign; tumbling over one another come the people who have waited outside so long.

So it goes on all day. At 8 p.m. she is still there interviewing people, and the encampers are still outside.

In the Inquiry Room.

Half an hour in the inquiry room downstairs gives the key to the whole situation. One sees exactly how each little circle was thrown off from the centre, and exactly what it draws into its embrace.

On the notice-board hangs a list of the sub-committees:

Juveniles and Training.
Mayoral Schemes of Work.
New Trades.
Clerks and Typists.
Contracts, Purchase, and Workrooms.
Finance and General Purposes.

The tragedy of the war is enacted every day in this room. An old woman of seventy came in begging for a little work and a home.

"I only want 2s. 6d. a week, and I am a good cook. I left my place in the country to come up and see my son in the hospital. They've taken off his legs," and the brave old woman's eyes filled with tears.

Beside her is a girl who has walked all the way from Bow.

Using the Labour Exchange.

The answer to the demand for work is the same to everyone: "Register at the local labour exchange." And a shabby genteel woman said, with quivering lips, "I've never been to such a place"; and another, "It's no good. I have been every day for a week."

Then the interviewer explained that workers for all work the committee is initiating are obtained from the Labour Exchange, and that if there is not work one week there may be 50 workers wanted the next.

The shabby genteel lady was taken to the tea-room, where she broke down at the sight of food, and was too weak to eat it; she had been so long without.

The Contracts Department is in the drawing-room of the house, but at present it would puzzle one to tell what it is. A dust sheet lies on the floor, on which are piled samples of socks. On the table are belts—from people who have obviously never knitted belts before. Balaclava helmets rest on a chair, mufflers and knee-caps are lying elsewhere. Bales of cloth are stacked up in a corner and a buyer is proudly showing samples of cloth.

One looks round for Mr. Mallon, the head of the department. He is described as more elusive than Miss Macarthur. During other people's business hours he is flying round to them transacting business at the War Office, visiting employers who may want workers, fixing up big contracts, attending a conference on the Sweating question, darting into the committee with some well-laid plans, and when everyone else is going home, he is beginning his office work. Just now he is trying on a fearsome looking garment at the insistence of a lady whose "inspiration" it is for "the dear soldiers."

Search for New Trades.

Patent garments of all sorts are brought up to this department by philanthropic ladies who have been brooding over the hardships of the soldier. Men, too, present schemes of public utility which may, however, yield them a little profit in return.

One philanthropist has come up from Scotland to propound a scheme for a carpet factory in which he will employ voluntary Belgian refugee labour.

On the table lies a contract for 10,000 shirts per week, and one of the visitors has given an order for 90 yards of flannel to be made up.

This is an investigating department, so all possible and impossible toys find their way in. The same may be said of all new trades. If half of those that have been suggested had been practicable, a sufficient number of unemployed women would probably not have been found to work them!

A sign of encouragement to the schemers, however, who go away disappointed is the cradle at the door. Cradle-making is a new occupation, if not a new trade for women, which is flourishing in the relief workrooms.

The Typist's Chance.

A little bit of the practical part of the committee's work is seen in the adjoining room. A few of the 250 typists to be chosen for work or training have been sent from the Labour Exchanges to be interviewed. One is forty-four years old and a widow. "My grey hairs are against me," she says, ever so sadly. Another has an invalid husband and a child of seven and a half years to keep.

A girl in the waiting-room breaks down. The strain is too much for her. She had a nervous breakdown at the beginning of the year, and when she was ready for work in July she could not find it. The rest chatter among themselves trying to hide from each other how much this interview means to them. They have all been out of work since July, and some of them come from homes where fathers and brothers are out of work too.

The day is over, but it has been impossible to keep pace with the committee Great schemes of employment have been passed on with the recommendation for a grant to the Government Committee, programmes of education for unemployed juveniles have been discussed with the Education authorities, and at intervals bareheaded people could be seen trooping out of the front door on their way to "committee." Even this house of twenty enormous rooms is not big enough to contain them, and they meet in Lady Clementine Waring's own dining-room next door, which she has lent in addition to the Committee House.

Liverpool Post, December 2nd 1914.

Thanks to the initial impulse given to the movement by the Education Committee, Liverpool appears destined to become an important toy-making centre. In September the Education Committee established a toy-making shop at the Brae-street manual instruction annexe, the "hands" being twenty girls who had passed through the elementary schools, and were on the register of the Scholars' Employment Bureau. Surprisingly encouraging results followed. Toys of all kinds, including many original designs, were produced, and found ready sale. Three of the girls have been engaged by a professional toy-maker in the city. The latest development is that a local firm of good standing are equipping a large works for the manufacture of toys, and have engaged six of the girls from the Brae-street centre. As girls leave this centre to take up professional positions their places are taken by other girls, who are trained, and subsequently will be able to earn their living at the toy-making industry, which is getting a firm foothold in the city. This is an illustration of the aphorism that "Out of evil cometh forth good," since if it had not been for the war there would have been no Town Hall Relief Committee to suggest to the Education Committee the launching of the toy-making scheme.

TOYMAKERS.

A LITTLE LIVERPOOL INDUSTRY.

We have heard a great deal lately of the necessity of not only taking the toy trade from Germany, but also of doing the right thing by our children during the forthcoming Yuletide. The matter has been taken up in several directions at Liverpool, one effort being under the auspices of the Liverpool Branch of the Women's Emergency Corps. Thus, in a cosy little suite of rooms at 169, The Albany, Oldhall-street, several girls, some with relatives dependent on their earnings, and who have been badly hit by the war, are enabled to keep their modest homes together and tide over the present stress.

It is only a short time ago since Miss Palethorpe organised this venture, and set about the initiation of a few girls into the mysteries of toy-making. They had never before handled any of the tools employed for this art, but in the few weeks which have since elapsed remarkable progress has been made. In a visit to the workshop, if such comfortable apartments can be so described, a "Courier" representative saw a number of the girls showing a zeal which spoke volumes for the interest they take in their work. One of the girls was skilfully manipulating a fine foot-saw; another was concentrating her attention upon the fastenings of a doll's house, which required delicate handling. Others, again, were taking a keen delight in robing charming dolls in equally charming costumes; one was putting the finishing touches to various articles of woodwork, and another was modelling miniature fruits and vegetables for an old-fashioned market stall.

The finish given to the toys was really a remarkable feature. There was no shoddy workmanship; the construction was complete in every detail, and all the goods were strongly made. So far as possible, glue was banned, and small wire-tacks used for securing the woodwork. Two new features had already been turned out, both of which had been designed at this establishment. The most important is a dolls' house, designed on the lines of an old Cheshire cottage, with a drop roof and back, which will allow children to arrange their dolls in the interior of the structure without any trouble. The model is painted black and white with washable paint, and its novelty and picturesqueness is such that it is selling well at half a guinea. The other is a stable, which has been designed by one of the girls, and the models worked from her specifications. There has been a bigger demand for the dolls than the supply, particularly for Red Cross nurses. So far as the latter are concerned, some of the purchasers have expressed a wish to obtain patients in addition, but so far none of these have been turned out.

It is interesting to note that there has been no difficulty experienced in paying the wages of the girls who otherwise would have probably been in a very hopeless position. The old German articles and toys were often cheap but nasty; it is far better, surely, to secure a toy that will attract and endure, even if the price is a little higher than the article "made in Germany."

New Industry for Women.

A curious sidelight is thrown upon hitherto unsuspected avenues of employment for women by the report that the making of dolls' tea-sets is affording work for a good many women and girls in the Potteries district. Before the war these things were all made in Germany, and the demand for them, especially at Christmas time, is considerable. It was the shopkeepers at Stoke, it seems, who supplied the initiative, by urging the pottery ware manufacturers to take up this class of work, and, since the enterprise was commenced, there has been a quick sale for the British-made article. Toy dinner, tea, dessert, and toilet sets are being made by a process which is said to be easily learnt, and at which girls can speedily earn good wages. The making of boxes for the sets will give further work to women, and the packing is another definite employment which may be developed into an art, as it is in Germany.

HOW MANCHESTER EMPLOYS OUT-OF-WORK WOMEN.

The Local Relief Committee is doing its best to find work for unemployed women. 1. In a workroom in Police Street, lent by Messrs. Kendal, Milne and Co., thirty women are employed in doll dressing. 2. Women engaged in stuffing dolls and also painting their faces—the dolls' faces! 3. At Bridgewater Hall, Hulme, a hundred women make new clothes and cut down old clothing for free distribution among the needy.

ADVERTISING AS A PROFESSION FOR WOMEN.

A POINT OF VIEW ON WHICH CORRESPONDENCE IS INVITED.

(By Ernest C. Digby, of The Daily Express.)

The work of an advertisement representative on a London daily newspaper is varied in the extreme; he or she is daily in contact with keen business men thoroughly conversant with their own personal business interests. Hundreds of men and women enter this road, but few succeed in making a name for themselves or in reaping the reward of a good salary or income. The average man or woman who has failed in other lines of industry tries his or her hand at the advertising game, thinking that there is very little knowledge required, and all that is necessary is a fair amount of nerve in approaching and talking to business men. The woman who thinks she can do anything is the bane of the advertisement manager. To enter and be successful in seeking publicity business requires as much knowledge and skill as is required by the representative in any other line of business. No drapery house would put a traveller on the road who did not know something, and, with first-class firms, a great deal, about the trade.

How many newspapers employ men or women simply because they are good talkers and have a good personal appearance, yet with only the crudest knowledge of the wares they are out to sell? A publicity representative employed by a newspaper should have a thorough knowledge of the value of the space he offers for sale, a general idea of the value of face types, line cuts, and half-tone blocks, and know how a newspaper, especially the one he represents, is made up. In these matters women cannot compete with men; they have not the same facilities to obtain this information.

Women depend too much on obtaining publicity through the medium of personality. Personality may count for something, but it is very poor stuff to make publicity stick. Women are as a rule enthusiastic, and in a great many cases more patient than their men confrères, but it requires more than that to place the merits of a particular newspaper before a keen business man. It is necessary to put before him in a few straight, terse sentences the business reasons why he should spend his money, and why he can expect results. He expects to find someone who knows more of advertising than he himself, someone who can help and advise him in regard to his copy. The average woman is notoriously illogical. She expects to win out by the fact that she has a good appearance, a pleasing manner, and a flow of small talk. Of course there are a few women representatives who are a success, but their number is small indeed.

A special knowledge of the requirements of one trade is of great assistance to the woman canvasser, provided she has also a knowledge of her work. We find women canvassing the big drapery houses. Here she finds an advertisement manager who knows more about the value of newspaper publicity than she will ever acquire. She is not required to give any help in drafting or advising on copy, and as a rule she exerts little or no influence on the question of giving out copy. Again, women lack initiative, they are good servants led by a man, but are not as a rule capable of grasping an opportunity, and the advertising business is one full of opportunities, i.e., catching the psychological moment, to the successful advertisement canvasser.

After many years' experience in newspaper work, I am more than ever convinced that the advertising side of newspaper work is not woman's métier. Be she ever so patient and willing, it requires more than these qualifications to win out.
